OF

THE REV. JAMES HERVEY.

A REGARD to eminent writings, which display genius, learning, orthodoxy, and piety, naturally excites a desire to be acquainted with the writer; and this desire is the stronger, when these writings are not only truly excellent in themselves, but are universally admired, eagerly read by good people of all denominations, and calculated to promote the best interests of mankind. Hence one desires to know the author in private life, how he spent his time, how he sustained his character as a public teacher of religion, what influence the doctrines of grace, which he so warmly inculcated on others, had on his own heart and conversation; and finally, how he closed the last scene. Abundant satisfaction as to all these particulars will be obtained from the following account.

MR. JAMES HERVEY was born on Friday the 26th of February 1713-14, at Hardingstone, a country village, one mile from Northampton, his father being then minister of the parish of Collingtree, within two miles of Hardingstone. His first instruction was from his mother, who taught him his letters, and to read. Under her tuition he continued till he was seven years of age, when he was sent as a day-scholar to the free grammar-school at Northampton, of which the Rev. Mr. Clarke, vicar of St. Sepulchre's in the said town, was at that time master.

At this school he remained till he was seventeen years old, and learned the Latin and Greek languages; in which his genius and memory would have enabled him to have made a much earlier progress, if it had not been prevented by his schoolmaster, who would not suffer him, or any other of his scholars, to learn faster than his own son. Whilst Mr. Hervey was at school, though he showed a remarkable dexterity at the innocent games usual among children, yet he had a perfect indifference for the acquisitions he made by his skill in these games, which he practised only for exercise and amusement.

In the year 1731, at the age of seventeen, he was sent by his father to the university of Oxford, and entered of Lincoln college there, under the tuition of the Rev. Mr. Hutchins, now Doctor, and rector of that college. He resided in the university seven years, and took the degree of Bachelor of Arts. The first two or three years were spent by him with some degree of indolence, or rather less application to his studies than he afterwards used. But in 1733, about his nineteenth year, becoming acquainted with some persons who began to distinguish themselves by their serious impressions of religion, and their zeal for the promotion of it, he was engaged by their influence in a stricter attachment both to piety and learning. He made himself master of Dr. James Keill's Anatomy, Dr. Durham's Physico-theology and Astrotheology, the Spectacle de la Nature (Nature Displayed) as translated by Mr. Humphreys; which last work he read with a peculiar satisfaction. Nor was he less delighted by the Essay on Pope's Odyssey, written by the Rev. Mr. Spence, now prebendary of Durham; to which elegant and judicious discourse Mr. Hervey often acknowledged, that he owed more of his improvement in style and composition, than to any other which he had ever read.

In 1734, at the persuasion of a much valued friend, he began to learn the Hebrew language without any teacher, by the Westminster Grammar itself; but soon found that Grammar too concise and difficult for the instruction of a learner; and therefore then despaired of ever attaining a competent knowledge of the Hebrew, though he afterwards made himself so thorough a master of that sacred language.

It appears, from his letters to his sister in 1733 and 1734, that though he then showed a pious and serious turn, yet these letters either speak a language different from free grace, for which we find he was afterwards so powerful an advocate, or at least, they treat very confusedly of it. The truth is, he was then a stranger to, and had strong prepossessions against, the doctrine of justification by faith in imputed righteousness; and he acknowledges, in a note on his Descant upon Creation, that Mr. Jenks's excellent treatise, entitled, Submission to the Righteousness of God, was the instrument of removing his prejudices, and reducing him to a better judgment.

He entered into holy orders as soon as his age and the canons of the church would allow; and though the precise time of his taking orders cannot be ascertained, yet it appears to have been in the end of the year 1736, or beginning of 1737; at least, it appears from one of his letters, that he had a curacy in the beginning of the latter year. Whilst he was at Oxford he had a small exhibition of about L.20 a-year; and, when he was ordained, his father pressed him very much to take some curacy in or near Oxford, and to hold his exhibition; but this he would by no means comply with, thinking it an injustice to detain it after he was in orders, from another person who might more want the benefit of that provision. On his leaving Oxford in 1736, he went to his father, and became his curate. He afterwards went to London; and, after staying some time there, became curate at Dummer. Here he continued about twelve months; and upon his leaving that curacy, in the year 1738, he was invited and went to Stoke-Abbey, in Devonshire, the seat of his worthy friend, the late Paul Orchard, Esq. Here he lived upwards of two years, in great esteem and friendship with that worthy gentleman, who valued him very much for his piety. A remarkable proof of the great regard he had for him on that account, he showed on the following occasion:—When his eldest son, the present Paul Orchard, Esq. to whom the second volume of the Meditations is dedicated, was to be baptized, he insisted that Mr. Hervey should be one of his godfathers, that he might have an eye to his Christian education; and this he did in preference to many gentlemen of large estates in the neighbourhood, who would have thought themselves honoured to have stood sponsors for Mr. Orchard's son.

In the year 1740 he undertook the curacy of Biddeford, fourteen miles from Stoke-Abbey, where he lived greatly beloved by his people. His congregation was large, though his stipend was small; his friends, therefore, made a collection yearly for him, which raised his income to L.60 a-year, so highly did they esteem him. At Biddeford he was curate about two years and a half; and remained so until there was a new rector of that church, who dismissed Mr. Hervey from his curacy, against the united requests of his parishioners, who offered to maintain him at their own expense. During the time that Mr. Hervey lived in the west, viz. from 1738 till the latter end of 1743, his family heard very little of him, by reason of the great distance he was from them; though he laboured diligently in the service of his Master. Here it was that he planned his Meditations, and probably wrote some part of them. He says, in his first volume of Meditations, that it was on a ride to Kilkhampton, in Cornwall, that he went into the church, where he lays the scene of his Meditations among the Tombs.

In August 1743, or thereabouts, he returned from Biddeford to Weston-Favell, leaving behind him many disconsolate friends, and officiated as curate to his father. Here he paid the greatest attention to his duty, and faithfully preached the gospel of Christ.

The first of his writings which raised the attention of the public, was his Meditations among the Tombs, Reflections on a Flower-garden, and a Descant upon Creation, published in February 1745-6. Of this kind of writing, we had before an example from no less a man than the great philosopher Mr. Boyle, in his Occasional Reflections on several subjects, written in his younger years.

Mr. Hervey's performance was so well received by the public, that it has already passed through about twenty editions in London, besides many surreptitious ones in Scotland and Ireland. A second volume, containing Contemplations on the Night and Starry Heavens, and a Winter-Piece, was published in December 1747.

In June 1750, his health being much impaired by his great attention to duty, and his family and friends judging that the change of air might be of benefit to him, they formed a design, which they executed, of conveying him to London, under a pretence of his riding a few miles in a friend's post-chaise, who was going thither; and of which he pleasantly complains in a letter, dated June 28, 1750, to a friend, upon his arrival there.

He staid in London until April or May 1752; during which time he was visited with a severe sickness, which had well nigh put a period to his life. But he recovered; and, upon his father's death in 1752, he returned to Weston, where he constantly resided till his death.

Mr. Hervey took his degree of Master of Arts at Cambridge in 1752, when he entered at Clarehall; and as he was of sufficient standing at Oxford, he staid only the few days required by the statutes to perform the university exercise.

It may be thought strange, that he who had refused to hold his exhibition at Oxford along with a curacy, should, upon his father's death, accept of the two livings of Weston-Favell and Collingtree, and hold them during his life. It was very far from being his choice, and it was what he had for a long time refused to do. He was determined against being a pluralist; and notwithstanding his father kept him at Oxford, with a design that he should take his degree of Master of Arts, and constantly urged him to do it, yet he could not be persuaded to yield to such a request, though he was of a sufficient standing to have taken the same, looking upon that step as a qualification intended for his future holding both his father's livings. When his father died, he remained determined to have Weston-Favell only; and this he frequently declared to his family and friends, and refused to accept of Collingtree, or to qualify himself for the same; insomuch that it was in danger of lapsing to the bishop. But at length, through the earnest and constant entreaties of his family, and of his friends, who, unknown to him, had sent to and procured from Oxford the necessary certificates of his being a Bachelor of Arts, in order to his taking his Master's degree at Cambridge, he was, after much importunity, prevailed on to comply with their requests, hoping that he might be thereby enabled to do so much the more good; and, when he waited upon Dr. Thomas, the then bishop of Peterborough, for institution to Collingtree, which was near six months after he had been inducted to Weston-Favell, he said to him, "I suppose your Lordship will be surprised to see James Hervey come to desire your Lordship to permit him to be a pluralist; but I assure you, I do it to satisfy the repeated solicitations of my mother and my sister, and not to please myself."

In November 1752 he published his Remarks on Lord Bolingbroke's Letters on the Study and Use of History, so far as they relate to the History of the Old Testament, and especially to the case of Noah denouncing a curse upon Canaan; in a Letter to a Lady of Quality.

The year following, having been called upon to preach, on the 10th of May, the sermon at the visitation of the Rev. Dr. John Browne, archdeacon of Northampton, at All-Saints' church in that town, he permitted it, the same year, for the benefit of a poor diseased child, to be printed, under the title of The Cross of Christ, the Christian's Glory. He had preached before this another sermon at the same church, which he had been solicited to print, but could not then be prevailed upon to do it. Since his death, it has been published under the title of the Mystery of Reconciliation, &c.

The same year he wrote a recommendatory preface to Burnham's Pious Memorial, or the Power of Religion on the Mind in Sickness and in Death; exemplified by the experience of many eminent persons at those important seasons.

His Theron and Aspasio, published in January 1755, in three volumes octavo, met with the same approbation from the public as his Meditations; and the demand for this work likewise was very uncommon, it having passed through three editions in one year.

In 1756, Mr. Hervey being informed of the design of reprinting the Gospel Mystery of Sanctification, by the Rev. Mr. Walter Marshall, and of prefixing to it, by way of recommendation, what he had said in its favour in Theron and Aspasio, he wrote a letter, dated Nov. 5, 1756, to his bookseller, giving his consent, and enlarging on that recommendation. This he did the more readily, as Mr. Marshall's book might (for so he has declared) be looked upon as no improper supplement to the dialogues and letters contained in Theron and Aspasio.

His Theron and Aspasio was attacked by several writers, particularly by Mr. Robert Sandeman, a congregational preacher at Edinburgh, in a book entitled Letters on Theron and Aspasio; wherein the doctrine of the gospel, under the title of the popular doctrine, is most abominably misrepresented, and its tendency aspersed. The Arminians, too, objected to that work; and Mr. John Wesley in particular wrote against it. Mr. Cudworth wrote a defence of Theron and Aspasio; and Mr. David Wilson, minister of the Scots congregation in Bow Lane, London, published a book, entitled Palemou's Creed Reviewed, &c., in which he vindicates Mr. Hervey's doctrine, and exposes that of Mr. Sandeman.

Mr. Hervey's own defence of Theron and Aspasio against the objections of Mr. John Wesley, was transcribed fair for the press from his short-hand copy, within a few pages; and would have been published in a volume of the same size with Theron and Aspasio, had he lived a few weeks longer. The manuscript was left in the possession of his brother, Mr. William Hervey, wine merchant in Miles' Lane, London; who published it in 1766, for the reasons given by him in a preface prefixed to it.

In August 1757, Mr. Hervey obliged the public with three sermons, preached by him on the late public fast-days; to which, in the third edition, in 1759, were added his visitation sermon, preached in 1753, his posthumous sermon on the ministry of reconciliation, and his considerations on the prevailing custom of visiting on Sundays. In a posterior edition of these, were given his remarks on Lord Bolingbroke's letters, and a treatise on the religious education of daughters.

In the same year, likewise, he published a new edition of his favourite author, Mr. Jenks's Meditations, in two volumes octavo; to which he wrote a very strong commendatory preface, showing the use of those meditations, and the reasons for such republication.*

He intended to have wrote a treatise on gospel holiness, as a supplement to Theron and Aspasio, and actually wrote a very excellent and judicious plan of it, which he communicated in letters to some of his correspondents; but he did not live to finish it, to the very great loss of the public.

His labours both in his ministerial office and in his study, were pursued by him as long as possible, under the disadvantage of a very weak constitution of body; which, together with the severity of his last illness, he supported not only with incredible patience, but without a single expression of peevishness. That illness had long been coming on him, but greatly increased in the beginning of October 1758, and grew very formidable in the December following. For, on Sabbath the third of that month, in the evening, after prayer in his family, he seemed to be arrested by the messenger of death; so that the united assistance of his sister and servant with difficulty enabled him to get up stairs into his room, from whence he never came down. His illness gaining ground every day, he soon became sensible that his end was approaching. He had frequent and violent returns of the cramp, which gave him most acute pain. He had likewise a hectic cough, which afflicted him so grievously in the night, that he could seldom lie in bed till four† in the morning; and was often obliged to rise at two, especially as opium (how much soever guarded by other medicines) would not agree with him. On the 15th of that month he complained of a pain in his side; for which, at his own desire, he was bled, though his physician, Dr. Stonehouse, in whom he placed the greatest confidence, had objected to it, apprehending him too weak to bear any evacuation of that kind. When the surgeon came, he could scarcely perceive any pulsation, and therefore took away no more than four ounces of blood; intimating to his relations and friends, that the case was desperate, and that he had blooded him very unwillingly, and merely to satisfy Mr. Hervey's desire, who had some hope that the pain might possibly be relieved by it. His curate, the Rev. Mr. Abraham Maddock, being much with him in the afternoon of that day, Mr. Hervey spoke to him in strong and pathetic terms of his assurance of faith, and of the great love of God in Christ. "Oh!" said he, "what has Christ, how much has Christ done for me; and how little have I done for so loving a Saviour! If I preached even once a-week, it was at last a burden to me. I have not visited the people of my parish as I ought to have done, and thus preached, as it were, from house to house. I have not taken every opportunity of speaking for Christ."

These expressions being accompanied with tears, which were too visible not to be observed; and lest his tears should be misinterpreted, as they had been conversing about his expected end, and of his assurance of happiness, he proceeded thus: "Do not think that I am afraid to die. I assure you I am not. I know what my Saviour hath done for me, and I wish to be gone. But I wonder and lament to think of the love of Christ in doing so much for me; and how little I have done for him." And in another conversation, discoursing likewise of his approaching dissolution, which he did with the utmost calmness and serenity; and of the little which we know of God's word, he said, "How many precious texts are there big with the most rich truths of Christ, which we cannot comprehend, which we know nothing of; and of those we do know, how few do we remember! Bonus textarius est bonus theologus—a good textuary is a good divine; and that is the armour, the word of God is the sword. Those texts are the weapons which I must use when that subtle spirit, that arch adversary of mankind, comes to tempt and sift me in my last conflict. Surely I had need be well provided with these weapons; I had need have my quiver full of them, to answer Satan with texts out of the word of God, when he assaults me. Thus did Christ when he was tempted in the wilderness."

On the 19th the pains of his body abated, and he grew drowsy and lethargic; but, in the night following, his immediate death was apprehended.

The next day, the 20th, he was visited by Dr. Stonehouse, who declared, that in his opinion Mr. Hervey could not live above three or four days; and happening to speak of the many consolations through Christ which a good man enjoys in the prospect of death, and discoursing on the emptiness of worldly honour to an immortal, and on the unprofitableness of riches to the irreligious, Mr. Hervey replied, "True, doctor, true, the only valuable treasures are in heaven. What would it avail me now to be archbishop of Canterbury? Disease would show no respect to my mitre. That prelate" is not only very great, but, I am told, he has religion really at heart. Yet, it is godliness, and not grandeur, that will avail him hereafter. The gospel is offered to me, a poor country parson, the same as to his Grace. Christ makes no difference between us. Oh! why then do ministers thus neglect the charge of so kind a Saviour, fawn upon the great, and hunt after worldly preferments with so much eagerness, to the disgrace of our order? These, these are the things, doctor, and not our poverty or obscurity, which render the clergy so justly contemptible to the worldlings. No wonder the service of our church, grieved I am to say it, is become such a formal lifeless thing, since it is, alas! too generally executed by persons deaf to godliness in all their conversation; whose indifference to religion, and worldly-minded behaviour, proclaim the little regard they pay to the doctrines of the Lord who bought them."

When the Doctor was going away, Mr. Hervey, with great tenderness, observed to him, that as not long ago he had a dangerous fall from his horse, by which he was much bruised, and as he had been lately ill, and then looked very pale, he hoped he would think on these narrow escapes, so often fatal to others, as a kind of warning from God to him, and remember them as such; adding, "How careful ought we to be to improve those years which remain, at a time of life when but few can remain for us!"

The day before his death, Mr. Hervey went a few steps across his room; but immediately finding his strength failing him, he sunk rather than fell down, his fall being broken by his sister, who, observing his weakness, ran and caught him; but he fainted away, and was in all appearance dead, it being a considerable time before any pulse could be perceived. When he came to himself, his brother, Mr. William Hervey, who was come from London to visit him, said, "We were afraid you was gone." He answered, "I wish I had." And well he might wish so, for his strength was quite exhausted, his body extremely emaciated, and his bones so sore, that he could not bear any one to touch him, when it was necessary to move him about. Yet, under all this calamity, he was ever praising God for his mercies, and for enduring him with patience.

On the 26th (Christmas-day,) on which he died, Mr. Maddock paying him his mourning visit, Mr. Hervey lifted up his head, and opened his eyes, as he sat in his easy-chair, (for he could not lie in bed,) to see who it was, and said, "Sir, I cannot talk with you." He complained much all this day of a great inward conflict which he had, laying his hand upon his breast, and saying, "Oh! you know not how great a conflict I have." During this he almost constantly lifted up his eyes towards heaven, with his hands clasped together in a praying form, and said two or three times, "When this great conflict is over, then—" but said no more; though it was understood he meant that then—he should go to rest.

Dr. Stonehouse came to him about three hours before he expired. Mr. Hervey urged strongly and affectionately to the Doctor the importance and care of his everlasting concerns, as here is no abiding place; and entreated him not to be overcharged with the cares of this life, but to attend, amidst the multiplicity of his business, to "the one thing needful:"

Which done, the poorest can no wants endure,
And which not done, the richest must be poor.*

FORE.

The Doctor seeing the great difficulty and pain with which he spoke, (for he was almost suffocated with phlegm and frequent vomitings,) and finding by his pulse that the pangs of death were then coming on, desired that he would spare himself. "No," said he, "Doctor, no. You tell me I have but a few moments to live; oh! let me spend them in adoring our great Redeemer." He then repeated the 26th verse of Psalm lxxiii. "Though my flesh and my heart fail me, yet God is the strength of my heart, and my portion for ever;" and he expatiated in a most striking manner on these words of Paul, 1 Cor. iii. 22, 23, "All things are yours; life and death, for ye are Christ's." "Here," says ye, "is the treasure of a Christian. Death is reckoned among this inventory; and a noble treasure it is. How thankful am I for death, as it is the passage through which I pass to the Lord and Giver of eternal life; and as it frees me from all the misery you now see me endure as long as God thinks fit! for I know he will by and by, in his own good time, dismiss me from the body. These light afflictions are but for a moment, and then comes an eternal weight of glory!—Oh! welcome, welcome death! Thou mayest well be reckoned among the treasures of the Christian. To live is Christ, but to die is gain." After which, as the Doctor was taking his final leave of him, Mr. Hervey expressed great gratitude for his visits, though it had been long out of the power of medicines to cure him. He then praised a little, and with great serenity and sweetness in his countenance, though the pangs of death were upon him, being raised a little in his chair, repeated those words, "Lord, now lettest thou thy servant depart in peace, according to thy most holy and comfortable word, for mine eyes have seen thy precious salvation." "Here, Doctor, is my cordial! What are all the cordials given to support the dying, in comparison of that which arises from the promises of salvation by Christ? This, this supports me." About three o'clock he said, "The great conflict is over. Now all is done." After which he scarce spoke any other words intelligibly, except now and then "precious salvation!"

During the last hour he said nothing, but leaned his head against the side of an easy chair, and without a sigh, groan, struggle, or the least emotion in the world, he shut his eyes, and died, between four and five in the afternoon, on Christmas day, 1758, in the forty-fifth year of his age. God grant that we may all live the life, and die the death of the righteous, and that our last end may be like his!

When his body was conveyed to church, it was covered, by his express desire, with the poor's pall, and he was buried under the middle of the communion-table, in the chancel of Weston-Favell church, on Friday, Dec. 28, in the presence of a numerous congregation, full of regret for the loss of so excellent a pastor. His funeral was indeed a most awful and very affecting sight. Mr. Maddock, his curate, who buried him, was himself in tears. Some were wringing their hands, others sobbing, many were silently weeping, but all were inwardly and sincerely grieved, as their looks sufficiently testified; and his attendants then bore a visible witness, that he had not been altogether unserviceable in his generation. The poor thankfully acknowledged it; and, as they looked into his grave, seemed to say within themselves, "There lies the man whose unwearied kindness was the constant relief of my various distresses; who tenderly visited my languishing bed, and readily supplied my indigent circumstances." Others, once ignorant and ungodly, looked at his grave, and seemed by their expressive sighs to say, "Here are the last remains of that sincere friend who watched for my soul. I tremble to think into what irretrievable ruin I might quickly have been plunged, had not his faithful admonitions and repeated exhortations, arrested me in the wild career. I was then unacquainted with the gospel of peace; but now, enlightened by his instructions, I see the all-sufficiency of my Saviour. His discourses are still warm on my heart, and I trust will be more and more operative on my life.

It may be truly said of Mr. Hervey, that few lives have ever been more heavenly, and few deaths more triumphant. He died in the Lord, and is now at rest, where even the wicked cease from troubling. His name is recorded in the annals of eternity; and the honours conferred on him by Christ will for ever continue blooming and incorruptible in the world of glory.

His character, both in his public and private capacity, was of the most exemplary kind.

As a minister, he performed all the duties of that office with the greatest strictness. In the pulpit he was earnest and fervent, and showed that he felt the efficacy of what he preached. Nor did he think it sufficient to preach on the Lord's day only, but set up a weekly lecture every Wednesday evening, at Weston-Favell church, which was very well attended. His zeal for the performance of his duty was, however, for some time before he died, much interrupted by the ill state of his health, which would not permit him personally to take due care even of the parish of Weston, where he resided—a circumstance that gave him inexpressible concern. The last two or three years of his life he could scarce do any thing more than preach once on the Lord's day, when people for many miles around flocked to hear him. His Wednesday evening lecture at seven, he discontinued for the last year. He had not been able to preach for some time at Collingtree,* or to visit his parishioners at their own houses, as his custom had been; but he encouraged them to come to him, and to converse freely on the subjects relating to their eternal interests; and on such occasions he would speak with a force and propriety peculiar to himself. He would frequently lament his inability to serve his people, comparing himself to a bleeding disabled soldier, and only not slain.

He always preached without notes, except on some very particular occasion; but his method was judicious, clear, and not encumbered with too many subdivisions. His weakness having rendered him, for several months before his death, incapable of speaking to his congregation as usual, he shortened his discourses, and took a most useful method of inculcating his instructions; for, after he had expounded his text, and divided his sermon into two heads, (rarely into more, and never exceeding three,) he would speak briefly, and, at the conclusion of each head, enforce what he had said by a pertinent text of Scripture, desiring his congregation (which was generally very numerous) to turn to their Bibles, and double down that text. "Now," added he, "my dear brethren, if you forget my sermon, you cannot forget God's word in this text, unless you wilfully throw your Bibles aside. Show these to your children, or the absent part of your family, when you return home." Then he gave a striking exhortation, and at the end of it another text for them to double down; so that they had always three texts; in order to their finding of which, he paused in the pulpit two or three minutes. This method was attended with another good effect; it obliged the generality of his hearers to bring their Bibles along with them; for those who were without a Bible lost the benefit of the texts, and were unemployed, while the majority who had one were very busy in looking for the passages referred to in his sermon.

He endeavoured as much as possible to divest himself, in his public discourses, of his usual elegance of style, and to adapt his language to the lowest capacity. In this he followed the example of Luther, who, in his Table-talk, says, "If in my preaching I were to pay a regard to Philip Melancthon, and other learned divines, then I should do little good. I preach in the plainest manner to the illiterate, and that gives content to all. Hebrew, Greek, and Latin, I spare till we learned ones come together." Mr. Hervey thought perspicuous language and evangelical doctrine of much more importance to his parishioners, than elaborate or ornamented discourses; though few men living, perhaps, were more capable of satisfying a polite or learned audience.

His method of catechising children in church, and of speaking to them in private, was very engaging and useful. He would put little questions to them, after they had repeated the words of the catechism; as for instance, "Well, my little maid, let me hear if you understand what you said. If you do understand the meaning of these words, you will then be able to answer the questions I shall put to you." He would at these times ask not only such questions as were suitable to the words of the catechism, but also such as would strike at the capital vices of his parishioners, yet without giving personal offence.

He did not forget that he was a minister in his house; for he worshipped God with his family twice a-day. He supped at eight every night, and at nine he expounded a text of Scripture for about a quarter of an hour, and seldom longer, except when some friend was present, to whom he thought his discourse might be useful, or when particularly requested to enlarge. After this he concluded with prayer.

He breakfasted at nine; and about eight he called his family together, and required each of his servants to repeat by heart the text which he had explained the preceding evening, and then he would recapitulate his exposition; by which method both his text and commentary were imprinted on their memories. After this he had prayers.

In the afternoon, when he was called down to tea, he used to bring his Hebrew Bible or Greek Testament with him, and would speak (as he was ever studious how he might promote the glory of God and improve time) either upon one or more verses, as occasion offered, in the most instructive and entertaining manner imaginable. And in the summer season he would now and then drink tea, when his health would permit him, with some of his most serious parishioners; and then five or six of the neighbours were invited, and Mr. Hervey's conversation was remarkably affecting, as he had a happy talent at spiritualizing almost every incident, and was naturally of a most obliging and cheerful disposition.

He was a member of an assembly formed for Christian improvement, which was established in his neighbourhood on the 7th of July 1747, and constantly attended it so long as he was able to ride to the place of meeting. A short account of the rules of this assembly is given at the end of his Tracts, together with two prayers composed by him for the use of the members thereof.

In the exercise of his charity, Mr. Hervey chose to clothe the poor, rather than give them money; and he would get some judicious person to buy linen, coarse cloth, stockings, shoes, &c. for them at the best hand; alleging, that the poor could not purchase on such good terms what they wanted, at the little shops, and with small sums of money. "I am," said he, "God's steward for the poor, and I must husband the little pittance I have to bestow upon them, and make it go as far as possible." But when money would be really serviceable to a family, as to a prudent housekeeper distressed by sickness or misfortunes, he would give five or more guineas at a time, taking care that it should not be known whence the money came. Pope's compliment to Mr. Allen of Bath might be justly applied to him, who would Do good by stealth, and blush to find it fame.

He was particularly desirous of getting the advice of a physician (or at least of some judicious apothecary) for the sick poor; and was very ready to procure them the best medicines—a most beneficial sort of charity to mankind, and in which it were to be wished he had many imitators. He would frequently petition such physicians of his acquaintance in different parts of the kingdom, as he apprehended thus charitably disposed, to give their advice occasionally, when they rode through a town, to such poor creatures as the clergyman of the place, or some substantial inhabitant, should recommend as real objects of compassion. Mr. Hervey would then, with great pleasure, and with as much gratitude to the physician as if done to himself, defray the expense of what medicines were wanted. He greatly disapproved indeed of the clergy's attempting to give medicines to their parishioners; as he judiciously inferred, that it was impossible for them to do it with the requisite judgment. "Let my brethren," he would say, "give them wine, bread, or beer, and get good spoon-meats made for them; but medicines are of too important a nature to be given indiscriminately." He observed, that by his own method the sick poor had the very best medicines, as the physician saw them himself, and bought them very cheap, because the apothecary, knowing they were for charitable uses, charged the physician for them no more than prime cost, with some little allowance merely for his trouble in compounding them; and as the physician knew what diseases were curable, there was no waste of medicines in fruitless attempts to cure cases which, though actually incurable, persons of less judgment could not pronounce to be so.

He gave away a great number of good books, with suitable instructions for their use, and especially Bibles. In the blank leaf he frequently wrote something capable of making an impression, or else stuck in a printed paper relating to the promises of God in and through Jesus Christ, or to creation, preservation, and redemption.*

All the future profits of his works he has left to some of the charitable uses above specified, except his Meditations; the copy of which he had sold, after it had passed through several editions: which sale of the copy, and the profits of the former impressions, amounted to about £.700, all of which he gave away in charity. He said, that it was devoted to God, and that he would on no account apply it to worldly uses; that he wrote not for profit or fame, but to serve the cause of God; and as Providence had blessed his attempt, he thought himself bound to relieve the distresses of his fellow-creatures with it.

In any expenses relating to himself he was extremely frugal, that he might be liberal to others; and it was always his desire to die just even with the world. "I will be my own executor," said he; and, as he died on Christmas-day, his fund expired almost with his life. What little remained, he desired might be given in warm clothing to the poor in that severe season.

To these instances of his charity, we may properly add an incident, which, how trifling soever in itself, yet affords a very strong proof, not only of the benevolence of his heart, but of his regard to practical religion, and to the doing of every good work within his power.

A day or two before his death, when he was reduced to such extreme weakness as to be unable to read, and could with difficulty speak, a little account being settled with him by a friend, on the balance of which he received 18s. looking on the money with great indifference, he expressed himself to this effect: "I would gladly dispose of this small sum in such manner as may do most good. It is the only act which I now am, and probably the last that I shall be, able to perform. Give yourself the trouble of looking amongst these books, and you will find Mr. Richards' pamphlet; at the latter end of which are, I remember, some hints concerning the means of promoting religion in ourselves or others, which (even with some additions and improvements which you might easily make) will not fill more than a sheet of paper,* and, if stuck up or framed, might be particularly useful in that form. Let, then, such a number of them be printed and given away as this money will admit of." His orders were properly executed; and the evidences of such an angelic temper were equally matter of edification and comfort to his friend, as this charitable legacy, if we may so call it, will be to all who receive and rightly use it.

This incident affords a striking evidence of the happy fruits and effects of his favourite doctrine, and strong expressions of the all-sufficient righteousness of Christ as the sole requisite to justification before God and acceptance with him, and shows that indeed his faith wrought by love. No man had ever a greater disregard for money, which he esteemed unworthy of his notice on any other account than as it furnished him with the means of doing good. Surely we may here borrow the sentiment and expression of the celebrated Mr. Pope, and justly conclude, that

He felt his ruling passion strong in death.

Mr. Hervey was indeed too negligent of his dress, which, though it could not in the least lessen the respect paid to him in his own parish and neighbourhood, where he was so well known, yet he would unquestionably have avoided it if he had lived in a public scene, where the decency and propriety of appearance are of much greater importance.

In learning he was inferior to few. Greek was almost as familiar to him as his native language. He was a great master of the classics; and, in the younger part of his life, had written some copies of verses, which showed no contemptible genius for poetry. He had a critical knowledge of the Hebrew tongue, and delighted in it.

With respect to his private capacity, he was never known to be in a passion. He

* See a copy of this printed paper among his Tracts.

* The Hints, &c. are subjoined to the Tracts.

lived as in heaven. No worldly concern (though he sometimes met with very trying ones) ever affected him. His humility rendered him invulnerable. When he was misrepresented and calumniated, he would say, "Our enemies are sometimes our best friends, and tell us truths; and then we should amend our faults, and be thankful for such information; and if what they say be not true, and only spoken through malice, then such persons are to be considered as diseased in their minds, and we should pray for them. They are to be pitied," says he, "and I might be as justly angry with a man who is diseased in his body."

All this he spoke with humility, seriousness, and sweetness; for it was the language of his heart, and not of affectation. In his ordinary transactions with others, he was ever cheerful, punctual, just, and candid to persons of every denomination.

He frequently wrote religious letters to his acquaintances, according to their different circumstances, in the most amiable and convincing manner; and he seemed to make it almost an invariable rule, not to write a letter on any occasion, without at least one pious sentence* in it; and that not introduced in a forced and awkward manner, but interwoven so as to appear naturally to arise from the subject. Of this kind some specimens may be seen in the note at the bottom of the page.†

Notwithstanding Mr. Hervey lived a very holy and exemplary life, preaching Jesus Christ and him crucified, and inculcating the practice of real religion and holiness in heart and life, yet his enemies (for strange as it is, even Mr. Hervey himself, the most inoffensive of men, had enemies) have not scrupled to assert, that "his tenets were dishonourable to God, subversive of all gospel-holiness, destructive even of common morality, and very injurious to society itself, by making men melancholy, and regardless of business." These were the very words of an abusive and anonymous letter sent to him by the post; on which

* Nulla dies sine linea, nulla epistola sine Christo, were Mr. Hervey's maxims.

† These specimens are taken from easy messages, cards, or billets, to some of his intimate friends.

"When I see my dear friend, we will talk about the contents of his last. My money is Christ's, and I only desire that he will give me benevolence to dispose of it willingly, discretion to bestow it prudently. I hope you have quite recovered, and adopted the Psalmist's resolution, Psalm cxvi. 8, 9. What do you think is the meaning of that remarkable expression, "I will walk before the Lord?"

In another billet to a person about retiring from business, he writes,—"Thanks for your Witsium de Economia Forerum. The time, I hope, is coming, when you will have leisure to read, a heart to relish, and a tongue to display such precious doctrines."

In another he writes,—"

"Let us all remember, my dear friend, that time is upon the wing; eternity is at our door; therefore what we do for our blessed Master we must do quickly."

that meek and most excellent man observed to an intimate friend, with all his usual mildness, "Indeed this gentleman may be said, I think, to write at random. Surely he has never read my work. If I knew where to direct to him, I should desire him to turn to what I have advanced in the ninth paragraph of my Contemplation on the Starry Heavens; and such a reply, I would hope, might convince him of his mistake."

Some of Mr. Hervey's friends thought he carried the Calvinistical tenets so far, that consequences disadvantageous to religion might be deduced from them, and which he himself, instead of assenting to them, would have started at and rejected with abhorrence. The fact is, the doctrine he delivered in his writings is purely scriptural, and agreeable to that contained in all the confessions of the reformed churches; and is so far from having a tendency to weaken the obligations to purity and holiness of life, that it promotes them in the most effectual manner, and has the most happy influence on morality. When persons of judgment have pointed out to him some expressions that were liable to be misunderstood in that respect, he always disavowed any such meaning; and affirmed, that the fault was not in the evangelical doctrine; so much insisted on by him, but in the misapprehension, ignorance, or inattention, of those who abused them to licentiousness. He would then add, he was ready to alter or retract any sentiment or expression which he apprehended to be really objectionable; but that to make things equally clear to every one's apprehension, or to have the same effect upon every one's mind, was an impracticable attempt; that he professed himself a Calvinist, and that consequently, the Arminians would not relish some things he advanced, though what he wrote was exactly conformable to the church articles, which are Calvinistical; yet he hoped they would not reject the whole, because they could not, in every point, concur with him; and that his writings in general might be useful, how much soever some of his particular (though truly scriptural) opinions might be doubted or censured. And on this head let us hear Mr. Hervey himself. He, in a letter written by him a very little before his happy death, thus expresses himself: "Do they who deny faith, and extol their good works, distinguish themselves by the practice of them? I will be bold to say, that, on an impartial examination, the majority will be found on the side of those who embrace the doctrine of the imputation of Christ's righteousness, and who expect salvation by him alone."

Of the compliments publicly paid to his piety and genius, it will be sufficient to insert a paragraph from the Northampton Mercury, which may be seen at the bottom of the page;* and the following eulogium extracted from the Rev. Mr. Dodd's poem on the Epiphany.

—THOU HERVEY, too,

Whose page and soul alike breathe the humblest love
To thy adored Redeemer, thou hast shown
That piety and polish'd elegance
May well together suit: and while remains
Or piety or elegance, thy works,
Like genuine gold, the touchstone will abide,
And grateful to thy countrymen remain:
Oh! may I to my lowly strains derive
Some merit from the friendship of thy name;
Strains, whose exalted subject fills thy heart
So constant with delight: and from thy tongue
In converse pours such streams of eloquence,
That the wrapt hearer wonders at his fears
Of death ere-while, and glowing with the love
Of Jesus, caught from thee, longs to behold
His Saviour in the clouds: for who can stand
Amidst the sweetness of Arabian groves,

* On Christmas-day, in the afternoon, died, in the 45th year of his age, the Rev. Mr. James Hervey, rector of Weston-Favell, near Northampton, and author of the Meditations among the Tombs, Flower Garden, &c. He was one of the most eminent instances of the power of Christianity upon the human mind. In his ministerial province he was pious, fervent, and indefatigable. In his ordinary connexions with the community he was ever cheerful, conscientiously punctual in all his dealings, and amiably candid to persons of every denomination. To his charities he set no bounds, scarcely leaving himself the mere requisites of his station. Under the severest trials of infirmity, for several years he displayed the highest example of fortitude, serenity, patience, and an entire resignation to the divine will. His writings most abundantly evidence his learning and ingenuity: But, reader, it is not the acquisitions of his understanding, but the improvements of his heart, and his confidence in the great Redeemer, which will now avail this most excellent man.

And not bear thence some fragrance?—Valued friend,
Proceed; and (thy too feeble strength renew'd)
May to hoar age thy journey be prolong'd,
And strew'd each step with blessings to mankind!

We shall close this account of Mr. Hervey's life with the following elegy on him.

URANIA, speak! in pensive numbers tell
How Zion trembled when great HERVEY fell!
When fail'd his strength, and when his pulse beat low,
Tell how she mourn'd to see the impending blow!
O thou, to whom all sacred themes belong,
Pour forth the sweetly melancholy song!
"Alas! grim death hath shot the fatal dart,
Which long seem'd pointed at his languid heart;
The insatiate tyrant, crown'd with funeral gloom,
In triumph drags him to the hollow tomb!
Who now so well can paint the blooming flower,
Or preach from sepulchres at midnight hour?
Who now so well the starry heavens scan,
And read the lectures nature meant for man?
No more his voice a careless world can move,
Or tell the wonders of redeeming love;
No more shall thousands round his pulpit throng,
To hear the heavenly precepts of his tongue;
For lo! above this gross impurer air,
Released from every pain and every care,
He soars aloft (angelic hosts his guide)
On wings new plumed, which ne'er before he triad.
With rapid speed his golden pinions rise
Through starry planes, and skim the empyrean skies.
And now, where sparkling portals wide display
The blissful regions of eternal day,
His Lord receives him 'midst celestial choirs,
Who crown his head, and strike their golden lyres:
Through heaven's glad courts the greeting anthems roll,
And joys new blooming feast his ravish'd soul;
Joys which to tell all eloquence is faint,
And which the loftiest muse can never paint."

* The reader may be assured, that these verses were wrote by a very serious and well-disposed young man, apprentice to a Jersey comber, in the town of Northampton, in a low station of life, and of no liberal education; whose mind, by Mr. Hervey's preaching and writings, had been very early impressed with the sacred ardour of piety and poetry.

TO

MISS R——— T———.

MADAM,

THESE Reflections, the one on the deepest, the other on the gayest, scenes of Nature, when they proceeded privately from the pen, were addressed to a Lady of the most valuable endowments, who crowned all her other endearing qualities by a fervent love of Christ, and an exemplary conformity to his divine pattern. She, alas! lives no longer on earth, unless it be in the honours of a distinguished character, and in the bleeding remembrance of her acquaintance.

It is impossible, Madam, to wish you a richer blessing, or a more substantial happiness, than that the same spirit of unfeigned faith, the same course of undefiled religion, which have enabled her to triumph over death, may both animate and adorn your life. And you will permit me to declare, that my chief inducement in requesting your acceptance of the following Meditations, now they make a public appearance from the press, is, that they are designed to cultivate the same sacred principle, and to promote the same excellent practice.

Long, Madam, may you bloom in all the vivacity and amiableness of youth, like the charming subject of one of these Contemplations. But, at the same time, remember, that with regard to such inferior accomplishments, you must one day fade (may it prove some very remote period!) like the mournful objects of the other. This consideration will prompt you to go on as you have begun, in adding the meekness of wisdom, and all the beauties of holiness, to the graces of an engaging person, and the refinements of a polite education.

And might—O! might the ensuing hints furnish you with the least assistance in prosecuting so desirable an end; might they contribute in any degree to establish your faith, or elevate your devotion; they would then administer to the author such a satisfaction as applause cannot give, nor censure take away—a satisfaction which I should be able to enjoy, even in those awful moments when all that captivates the eye is sinking in darkness, and every glory of this lower world disappearing for ever.

These wishes, Madam, as they are a most agreeable employ of my thought, so they come attended with this additional circumstance of pleasure, that they are also the sincerest expressions of that very great esteem with which I am,

MADAM,

Your most obedient most humble servant,

JAMES HERVEY.

Weston-Favell, near Northampton,
May 20, 1746.

PREFACE.

THE first of these occasional Meditations begs leave to remind my readers of their latter end; and would invite them to set, not their houses only, but, which is inexpressibly more needful, their souls in order; that they may be able, through all the intermediate stages, to look forward upon their approaching exit without any anxious apprehensions; and when the great change commences, may bid adieu to terrestrial things, with all the calmness of a cheerful resignation, with all the comforts of a well-grounded faith.

The other attempts to sketch out some little traces of the all-sufficiency of our Redeemer for the grand and gracious purposes of everlasting salvation; that a sense of his unutterable dignity and infinite perfections may incite us to regard him with sentiments of the most profound veneration, to long for an assured interest in his merits with all the ardency of desire, and to trust in his powerful mediation with an affianced not to be shaken by any temptations, not to be shared with any performances of our own.

I flatter myself, that the thoughts conceived among the tombs may be welcome to the serious and humane mind; because, as there are few who have not consigned the remains of some dear relations, or honoured friends, to those silent repositories, so there are none but must be sensible, that this is the house appointed for all living, and that they themselves are shortly to remove into the same solemn mansions. And who would not turn aside for a while from the most favourite amusements, to view the place where his once loved companions lie? who would not sometimes survey those apartments, where he himself is to take up an abode till time shall be no more?

As to the other little essay, may I not humbly presume, that the very subject itself will recommend the remarks? For who is not delighted with the prospect of the blooming creation, and even charmed with the delicate attraction of flowers? Who does not covet to assemble them in the garden, or wear them in a nosegay? Since this is a passion so universal, who would not be willing to render it productive of the sublimest improvement? This piece of holy frugality I have ventured to suggest, and endeavoured to exemplify, in the second letter; that while the hand is cropping the transient beauties of a flower, the attentive mind may be enriching itself with solid and lasting good. And I cannot but entertain some pleasing hopes, that the nicest taste may receive and relish religious impressions when they are conveyed by such lovely monitors; when the instructive lessons are found, not on the leaves of some formidable folio, but stand legible on the fine sarcoenet of a narcissus; when they savour not of the lamp and recluse, but come breathing from the fragrant bosom of a jonquil.

MEDITATIONS

IN

LETTER TO A LADY.

MADAM,

TRAVELLING lately into Cornwall, I happened to alight at a considerable village in that county; where, finding myself under an unexpected necessity of staying a little, I took a walk to the church.* The doors, like the heaven to which they lead, were wide open, and readily admitted an unworthy stranger. Pleased with the opportunity, I resolved to spend a few minutes under the sacred roof.

In a situation so retired and awful, I could not avoid falling into a train of meditations, serious and mournfully pleasing; which, I trust, were in some degree profitable to me, while they possessed and warmed my thoughts; and if they may administer any satisfaction to you, Madam, now they are recollected, and committed to writing, I shall receive a fresh pleasure from them.

It was an ancient pile: reared by hands, that ages ago were mouldered into dust.— Situate in the centre of a large burial-ground, remote from all the noise and hurry of tumultuous life.—The body spacious, the structure lofty; the whole magnificently plain. A row of regular pillars extended themselves through the midst, and supported the roof with simplicity and with dignity.— The light that passed through the windows, seemed to shed a kind of luminous obscurity; which gave every object a grave and venerable air.—The deep silence added to the gloomy aspect, and both heightened by the loneliness of the place, greatly increased the solemnity of the scene.—A sort of religious dread stole insensibly on my mind, while I advanced all pensive and thoughtful, along the inmost aisle. Such a dread as hushed every ruder passion, and dissipated all the gay images of an alluring world.

Having adored that eternal Majesty, who, far from being confined to temples made with hands, has heaven for his throne, and the earth for his footstool;—I took particular notice of a handsome altar-piece, presented, as I was afterwards informed, by the master-builders of Stow;* out of gratitude, I presume, to that gracious God, who carried them through their work, and enabled them to “bring forth their top-stone with joy.”

O! how amiable is gratitude! especially when it has the supreme Benefactor for its object. I have always looked upon gratitude, as the most exalted principle that can

* I had named, in some former editions, a particular church, viz. Kilkhampton; where several of the monuments, described in the following pages, really exist. But, as I thought it convenient to mention some cases here, which are not, according to the best of my remembrance, referred to in any inscriptions there: I have now omitted the name, that imagination might operate more freely, and the improvement of the reader be consulted, without any thing that should look like a variation from truth and fact.

* The name of a noble seat belonging to the late Earl of Bath, remarkable formerly for its excellent workmanship and elegant furniture; once the principal resort of the quality and gentry of the west; but now demolished, laid even with the ground, and scarce one stone left upon another.—So that corn may grow, or nettles spring where Stow lately stood.

actuate the heart of man. It has something noble, disinterested, and (if I may be allowed the term) generously devout. Repentance indicates our nature fallen, and prayer turns chiefly upon a regard to one's self. But the exercises of gratitude subsisted in paradise, when there was no fault to deplore; and will be perpetuated in heaven, when "God shall be all in all."

The language of this sweet temper is, "I am unspeakably obliged; what return shall I make?"—And surely, it is no improper expression of an unfeigned thankfulness to decorate our Creator's courts, and beautify "the place where his honour dwelleth." Of old, the habitation of his feet was glorious; let it not now be sordid or contemptible. It must grieve an ingenious mind, and be a reproach to any people, to have their own houses wainscotted with cedar, and painted with vermilion, while the temple of the Lord of hosts is destitute of every decent ornament.

Here I recollected and was charmed with Solomon's fine address to the Almighty, at the dedication of his famous temple. With immense charge, and exquisite skill, he had erected the most rich and finished structure that the sun ever saw. Yet upon a review of his work, and a reflection on the transcendent perfections of the Godhead, how he exalts the one, and abases the other! The building was too glorious for the mightiest monarch to inhabit; too sacred for unhallowed feet even to enter, yet infinitely too mean for the Deity to reside in. It was, and the royal worshipper acknowledged it to be, a most marvellous vouchsafement in uncreated excellency, to "put his name there." The whole passage breathes such a delicacy, and is animated with such a sublimity of sentiment, that I cannot persuade myself to pass on without repeating it.* But will God

* 1 Kings vii. 27. But will.—A fine abrupt beginning, most significantly describing the amazement and rapture of the royal prophet's mind!—God; he uses no epithets where writers of inferior discernment would have been fond to multiply them; but speaks of the Deity as an incomprehensible Being, whose perfections, and glories are exalted above all praise—Dwell: To bestow on sinful creatures a propitious look, to favour them with a transient visit of kindness, even this were an unutterable obligation: Will he then vouchsafe to fix his abode among them, and take up his stated residence with them?—Indeed; A word in this connexion, peculiarly emphatical; expressive of a condescension wonderful and extraordinary, almost beyond all credibility.—Behold: intimating the continued or rather the increasing surprise of the speaker, and awakening the attention of the hearer.—Behold! the heaven. The spacious concave of the firmament, that wide extended azure circumference, in which worlds unnumbered perform their revolutions, is too scanty an apartment for the Godhead.—Nay the heaven of heavens: those vastly higher tracks which lie far beyond the limits of human survey, to which our very thoughts can hardly soar; even these (unbounded as they are) cannot afford an adequate habitation for Jehovah: even these dwindle into a point when compared with the infinitude of his essence! even these "are as nothing before him."—How much less proportionate is this poor diminutive speech, which I have been erecting and embellishing, to so august a Presence, so immense a Majesty.

indeed dwell on earth? Behold! the heaven and heaven of heavens cannot contain thee; how much less this house that I have builded?—Incomparable saying, worthy the wisest of men. Who would not choose to possess such an elevated devotion, rather than to own all the glittering materials of that sumptuous edifice?

We are apt to be struck with admiration at the stateliness and grandeur of a masterly performance in architecture, and perhaps, on a sight of the ancient sanctuary, should have made the superficial observation of the disciples, "What manner of stones, and what buildings are here!"—But what a nobler turn of thought, and juster taste of things does it discover, to join with Israel's king, in celebrating the condescension of the divine Inhabitant! That the high and lofty One, who fills immensity with his glory, should, in a peculiar manner, fix his abode there! should there manifest an extraordinary degree of his benedictive presence; permit sinful mortals to approach his majesty, and promise "to make them joyful in his house of prayer!"—This should more sensibly affect our hearts, than the most curious arrangement of stones can delight our eyes.

Nay the everlasting God does not disdain to dwell in our souls by his holy Spirit, and to make even our bodies his temple.—Tell me, ye that frame critical judgments, and balance nicely the distinction of things: "is this most astonishing or most rejoicing?"—He humbleth himself, the scripture assures us, even to behold the things that are in heaven.* It is a most condescending favour, if HE pleases to take the least approving notice of angels and archangels, when they bow down in homage from their celestial thrones; will he then graciously regard, will he be united, most intimately united, to poor, polluted, breathing dust?—O! unparalleled honour! Invaluable privilege! Be this my portion, and I shall not covet crowns, nor envy conquerors.

But let me remember what a sanctity of disposition, and uprightness of conversation, so exalted a relation demands; Remember this, "and rejoice with trembling."—Durst I commit any iniquity, while I tread these hallowed courts? Could the Jewish High-Priest allow himself in any known transgression, while he made that solemn yearly entrance into the holy of holies;† and stood before the immediate presence of Jehovah? No, truly. In such circumstances, a thinking person must shudder at the most remote solicitation to any wilful offence. I should now be shocked at the least indecency of behaviour, and am apprehensive of every appearance of evil. And why do we not carry this holy jealousy into all our ordinary life? Why do we not in every place reverence ourselves;* as persons dedicated to the Divinity, as living temples of the Godhead? For, if we are real, and not merely nominal Christians, the God of glory, according to his own promise, dwells in us, and walks in us†—O! that this one doctrine of our religion might operate, with an abiding efficacy, upon our consciences; it would be instead of a thousand laws to regulate our conduct; instead of a thousand motives to quicken us in his holiness. Under the influence of such a conviction, we should study to maintain a purity of intention; a dignity of action; and to walk worthy of that transcendently majestic Being, who admits us to a fellowship with himself, and with his Son Jesus Christ.

* Psalm cxii. 6.

The next thing which engaged my attention, was the lettered floor: the pavement somewhat like Ezekiel's roll, was written over from one end to the other. I soon perceived the comparison to hold good in another respect; and the inscriptions to be matter of "mourning, lamentation, and woe."‡ They seemed to court my observation; silently inviting me to read them.—And what would these dumb monitors inform me of?—"That beneath their little circumferences were deposited such and such pieces of clay, which once lived, and moved, and talked; that they had received a charge to preserve their names, and were the remaining trustees of their memory."

Ah! said I, is such my situation? The adorable Creator around me, and the bones of my fellow creatures under me! Surely, then, I have great reason to cry out, with the revering patriarch, How dreadful is this place!§ Seriousness and devotion become this house for ever: May I never enter it lightly or irreverently; but with a profound awe, and godly fear!

Oh! that they were wise:§ said the inspired penman. It was his last wish for his dear people; he breathed it out, and gave up the ghost.—But what is wisdom? It consists not in refined speculations, accurate researches into nature, or an universal acquaintance with history. The divine lawgiver settles this important point in his next aspiration: Oh! that they understood this! That they had right apprehensions of their spiritual interests, and eternal concerns! that they had eyes to discern, and inclinations to pursue the things which belong to their peace!—But how shall they attain this valuable knowledge? I send them not, adds the illustrious teacher, to turn over all the volumes of literature: they may acquire, and much more expeditiously, this scene of life, by considering their latter end. This spark of heaven is often lost under the glitter of pompous erudition, but shines clearly in the gloomy mansions of the tomb. Drowned in this gentle whisper amidst the noise of mortal affairs, but speaks distinctly in the retirements of serious contemplation—Behold! how providentially I am brought to the school of wisdom!¶ The grave is the most faithful master;‡ and these instances of mortality, the most instructive lessons.—Come then calm attention, and compose my thoughts: come, thou celestial Spirit, and enlighten my mind; that I may so peruse these awful pages, as to "become wise unto salvation."

Examining the records of mortality, I found the memorials of a promiscuous multitude.‡ They were huddled, at least they rested together, without any regard to rank or seniority. None were ambitious of the uppermost rooms, or chief seats in this house of mourning. None entertained fond and eager expectations of being honourably greeted in their darksome cells. The man of years and experience, reputed as an oracle in his generation, was content to lie down at the feet of a babe. In this house appointed for all living, the servant was equally accommodated, and lodged in the same story with his master. The poor indigent lay as softly, and slept as soundly, as the most opulent possessor. All the distinction that subsisted, was a grassy hillock, bound with osiers; or a sepulchral stone ornamented with imagery.

Why then, said my working thoughts, Oh! why should we raise such a mighty stir about superiority and precedence, when the next remove will reduce us all to a state of equal meanness? Why should we exalt ourselves, or debase others; since we must all one day be upon a common level, and blended together in the same undistinguished dust? Oh! that this consideration might humble my own and other's pride; and sink our imaginations as low as our habitation will shortly be!

Among these confused relics of humanity, there are without doubt, persons of contrary interests, and contradicting sentiments: But death, like some able days-man, has laid his hands on the contending parties, and brought all their differences to an amicable conclusion.* Here enemies, sworn enemies, dwell together in unity. They drop every embittered thought, and forget that they once were foes. Perhaps their crumbling bones mix as they moulder; and those who, while they lived, stood aloof in irreconcilable variance, here fall into mutual embraces, and even incorporate with each other in the grave.—Oh! that we might learn from these friendly ashes, not to perpetuate the memory of injuries; not to foment the fever of resentment; nor cherish the turbulence of passion; that there may be as little animosity and disagreement in the land of the living as there is in the congregation of the dead!—But I suspend for a while such general observations, and address myself to a more particular inquiry.

* ——— PANTAN DE MALIS AISCUTREO SE AUTON, was the favourite maxim of Pythagoras, and supposed to be one of the best moral precepts ever given to the Heathen world. With what superior force, and very singular advantage, does the argument take place in the Christian Scheme! where we are taught to regard ourselves, not merely as intellectual beings, that have reason for our monitor, but as consecrated creatures, who have a God of the most consummate perfection ever with us, ever in us.

Yonder white stone, emblem of the innocence it covers, informs the beholder of one, who breathed out its tender soul almost in the instant of receiving it. There the peaceful infant, without so much as knowing what labour and vexation mean,† “lies still and is quiet; it sleeps, and is at rest.” Staying only to wash away its native impurity in the laver of regeneration, it bid a speedy adieu to time and terrestrial things—What did the little hasty sojourner find, so forbidding and disgusting in our upper world, to occasion its precipitant exit? It is written, indeed, of its suffering Saviour, that when he had tasted the vinegar mingled with gall, he would not drink:‡ And did our new come-stranger begin to sip the cup of life; but perceiving the bitterness, turn away its head, and refuse the draught? Was this the cause why the wary babe only opened its eyes; just looked on the light; and then withdrew into the more inviting regions of undisturbed repose?

Happy voyager; no sooner launched, than arrived at the haven.§—But more eminently happy they, who have passed the waves and weathered all the storms of a troublesome and dangerous world; who, “through many tribulations have entered into the kingdom of heaven;” and thereby brought honour to their divine Convoy, administered comfort to the companions of their toil, and left an instructive example to succeeding pilgrims.

Highly favoured probationer! accepted without being exercised! It was thy peculiar privilege not to feel the slightest of those evils which oppress thy surviving kindred; which frequently fetch groans from the most manly fortitude, or most elevated faith; the arrows of calamity, barbed with anguish, are often fixed deep in our choicest comforts. The fiery darts of temptation, shot from the hand of hell, are always flying in showers around our integrity. To thee, sweet babe, both these distresses and dangers were alike unknown.

Consider this, ye mourning parents, and dry up your tears. Why should you lament that your little ones are crowned with victory, before the sword was drawn, or the conflict begun?—Perhaps the supreme disposer of events foresaw some inevitable snare of temptation forming, or some dreadful storm of adversity impending. And why should you be so dissatisfied with that kind precaution, which housed your pleasant plant, and removed into shelter a tender flower, before the thunders roared; before the lightnings flew; before the tempest poured its rage?—O remember, they are not lost, but taken away from the evil to come.*

At the same time let survivors, doomed to bear the heat and burden of the day, for their encouragement, reflect—that it is more honourable to have entered the lists, and to have fought the good fight before they come off conquerors. They who have borne the cross, and submitted to afflictive providences, with a cheerful resignation, have girded up the loins of their mind, and performed their Master's will, with an honest and persevering fidelity;—these, having glorified their Redeemer on earth, will probably be as stars of the first magnitude in heaven. They will shine with brighter beams, be replenished with stronger joys, in their Lord's everlasting kingdom.

Here lies the grief of a fond mother, and the blasted expectation of an indulgent father.—The youth grew up like a well watered plant: he shot deep, rose high, and bid fair for manhood; but just as the cedar began to tower, and promised ere long to be the pride of the wood, and prince among the neighbouring trees:—behold the axe is laid unto the root; the fatal blow struck; and all its branching honours tumbled to the dust,—and did he fall alone? No: the hopes of his father that begat him, and the pleasing prospects of her that bare him, fell, and were crushed together with him.

Doubtless, it would have pierced one's heart to have beheld the tender parents following the breathless youth to his long home, perhaps drowned in tears, and all overwhelmed with sorrows, they stood like weeping statues, on this very spot,—methinks, I see the deeply distressed mourners attending the and solemnity; how they wring their hands, and pour floods from their eyes!—Is it fancy? or do I really hear the passionate mother, in an agony of affliction, taking her final leave of the darling of her soul? Dumb she remained, while the awful obsequies were performing; dumb with grief, and leaning upon the partner of her woes. But now the inward anguish struggles for vent; it grows too big to be repressed. She advances to the brink of the grave. All her soul is in her eyes. She fastens one look more upon the dear doleful object, before the pit shuts its mouth upon him, and as she looks she cries;—in broken accents, interrupted by many a rising sob, she cries;—“Farewell, my son! my son! my only beloved! Would to God I had died for thee!—Farewell my child! and farewell, all my earthly happiness.—I shall never more see good in the land of the living.—Attempt not to comfort me.—I will go mourning all my days, till my gray hairs come down with sorrow to the grave.”

From this affecting representation, let parents be convinced how highly it concerns them to cultivate the morals, and secure the immortal interests of their children. If you really love the offspring of your own bodies; if your bowels yearn over those amiable pledges of conjugal endearment; spare no pains, give all diligence; I entreat you to “bring them up in the nurture and admonition of the Lord.” Then may you have joy in their life, or consolation in their death. If their span is prolonged, their unblamable and useful conduct will be the staff of your age, and a balm for declining nature. Or, if the number of their years be cut off in the midst, you may commit their remains to the dust, with much the same comfortable expectations, and with infinitely more exalted views, than you send the survivors to places of genteel education. You may commit them to the dust with cheering hopes of receiving them again to your arms, inexpressibly improved in every noble and endearing accomplishment.

It is certainly a severe trial, and much more afflictive than I am able to imagine, to resign a lovely blooming creature, sprung from your own loins, to the gloomy recesses of corruption. Thus to resign him after having been long dandled upon your knees, united to your affections by a thousand ties of tenderness, and now become both the delight of your eyes, and the support of your family!—to have such a one torn from your bosom, and thrown into darkness, doubtless it must be like a dagger in your hearts.—But, O! how much more cutting to you, and confounding to the child, to have the soul separated from God; and for shameful ignorance or early impiety consigned over to places of eternal torment! How would it aggravate your distress, and add a distracting emphasis to all your sighs, if you should follow the pale corpse with these bitter reflections!—“This dear creature, though long ago capable of knowing good from evil, is gone out of the world before it had learned the great design of coming into it. A short-lived, momentary existence it received from me; but no good instructions, no holy admonitions, nothing to further its well-being in that everlasting state, upon which it is now entered. The poor body is consigned to the coffin, and carried out to consume away in the cold and silent grave. And what reason have I to suppose that the precious soul is in a better condition? May I not justly fear, that, sentenced by the righteous Judge, it is going, or gone away into the pains of endless punishment!—Perhaps, while I am bewailing its untimely departure, it may be cursing in utter darkness, that ever to be deplored, that most calamitous day, when it was born of such a careless ungodly parent as I have been.”

Nothing, I think, but the gnawings of that worm which never dies, can equal the anguish of these self-condemning thoughts. The tortures of a rack must be an easy suffering compared with the stings and horror of such a remorse.—How earnestly do I wish that as many as are entrusted with the management of children, would take timely care to prevent these intolerable scourges of conscience, by endeavouring to conduct their minds into an early knowledge of Christ, and a cordial love of his truth!

On this hand is lodged one whose sepulchral stone tells a most pitiable tale indeed! Well may the little images, reclined over the sleeping ashes, hang down their heads with that pensive air! None can consider so mournful a story without feeling some touches of sympathizing concern.—His age twenty-eight; his death sudden; himself cut down in the prime of life, amidst all the vivacity and vigour of manhood, while “his breasts were full of milk, and his bones moistened with marrow.”—Probably he entertained no apprehensions of the evil hour. And indeed, who could have suspected that so bright a sun should go down at noon? To human appearance, his hill stood strong. Length of days seemed written in his sanguine countenance. He solaced himself with the prospect of a long, long series of earthly satisfactions.—When lo! an unexpected stroke descends! descends from that mighty arm, which “overtumeth the mountains by their roots; and crushes the imaginary hero, before the moth;”* as quickly, and more easily, than our fingers press such a feeble fluttering insect to death.

Perhaps the nuptial joys were all he thought on. Were not such the breathings of his enamoured soul? "Yet a very little while, and I shall possess the utmost of my wishes. I shall call my charmer mine; and in her enjoy whatever my heart can crave."—In the midst of such enchanting views, had some faithful friend but softly reminded him of an opening grave, and the end of all things; how unseasonable would he have reckoned the admonition! Yet, though all warm with life, and rich in visionary bliss, he was even then tottering upon the brink of both."—Dreadful vicissitude! to have the bridal* festivity turned into the funeral solemnity. Deplorable misfortune! to be shipwrecked in the very haven! and to perish even in sight of happiness!—What a memorable proof is here of the frailty of man, in his best estate! Look, O, look on this monument, ye gay and careless? Attend to this date; and boast no more of to-morrow!

Who can tell, but the bride-maids, girded with gladness, had prepared the marriage-bed! had decked it with the richest covers, and dressed it in pillows of down? When,—Oh! trust not in youth or strength, or in any thing mortal! for there is nothing certain, nothing to be depended on, beneath the unchangeable God.—Death, relentless death, is making him another kind of bed in the dust of the earth. Unto this he must be conveyed, not with a splendid procession of joyous attendants: but stretched in the gloomy hearse, and followed by a train of mourners. On this he must take up a lonely lodging, nor ever be released, till "the heavens are no more."—In vain does the consenting fair one put on her ornaments and expect her spouse. Did she not, like Siser's mother, look out of the lattice: chide the delay of her beloved; and wonder "why his chariot was so long in coming?" Little thinking, that the intended bridegroom had for ever done with transitory things: that now everlasting cares employ his mind, without one single remembrance of his lovely Lucinda!—Go, disappointed virgin! go, mourn the uncertainty of all created bliss? Teach thy soul to aspire after a sure and immutable felicity! For the once gay and gallant Fidelio sleeps in other embraces, even in the icy arms of death! forgetful, eternally forgetful, of the world—and thee.

Hitherto one is tempted to exclaim against the king of terrors, and call him capriciously cruel. He seems, by beginning at the wrong end of the register, to have inverted the laws of nature. Passing over the couch of decrepit age, he has nipped infancy in its bud; blasted youth in its bloom; and torn up manhood in its full maturity.—Terrible indeed are these providences, yet not unsearchable the counsels:

For us they sicken, and for us they die.*

Such strokes must not only grieve the relatives, but surprise the whole neighbourhood. They sound a powerful alarm to heedless dreaming mortals, and are intended as a remedy for our carnal security. Such passing bells inculcate loudly our Lord's admonition: "Take ye heed; watch, and pray; for ye know not when the time is."—We nod like intoxicated creatures, upon the very verge of a tremendous precipice. These astonishing dispensations are the kind messengers of heaven, to rouse us from our supineness, and quicken us into timely circumspection. I need not surely accommodate them with language, nor act as their interpreter. Let every one's conscience be awake, and this will appear their awful meaning:—"O ye sons of men, in the midst of life you are in death. No state, no circumstances, can ascertain your preservation a single moment. So strong is the tyrant's arm, that nothing can resist its force; so true his aim, that nothing can elude the blow. Sudden as lightning, sometimes is his arrow launched: and wounds and kills in the twinkling of an eye. Never promise yourself safety in an expedient but constant preparation. The fatal shafts fly so promiscuously, that none can guess the next victim. Therefore, "be ye always ready; for in such an hour as ye think not, the final summons cometh."

Be ye always ready; for in such an hour as ye think not. Important admonition! Methinks it reverberates from sepulchre to sepulchre; and addresses me with line upon line, precept upon precept. The reiterated warning, I acknowledge, is too needful; may co-operating grace render it effectual! The

to the opinion of a judicious friend, who would render the passage more literally, "Before the face of a moth," making it to represent a creature so exceedingly frail, that even a moth flying against it may dash it to pieces.—Which besides its clear correspondence with the exact import of the Hebrew, presents us with a much finer image of the most extreme imbecility. For it certainly implies a far greater degree of weakness, to be crushed by the feeble flutter of the feeble creature, than only to be as easily crushed as that creature, by the hand of man.—The French version is very expressive and beautiful, à la rencontre d'un vermineau.

* A distress of this kind is painted in very affecting colours, by Pliny, in an epistle to Marc'linus: O triste plane acerbumque funus? O morte ipsa mortis tempus indignus! Jam destinata erat egregio juveni, jam electus nuptiarum dies; jam nos advocati. Quid gaudium quo moerore mutatum est! Non possum exprimere verbis, quantum animo vulnus acceperim quum audivi Fundanum ipsum (quod in luctuosa dolor invenit) praecepissent, ut in vestes, margaritas, gemmas, fuerat erogaturus, hoc in thura, et unguentis, et odores, impenderetur.

momentous truth, though worthy to be engraved on the tables of a most tenacious memory, is but slightly sketched on the transient flow of passion. We see our neighbours fall, we turn pale at the shock; and feel, perhaps, a trembling dread. No sooner are they removed from our sight, but driven in the whirl of business, or lulled in the languors of pleasure, we forget the providence, and neglect its errand. The impression made on our unstable minds, is like the trace of an arrow through the penetrated air, or the path of a keel in the furrowed wave. Strange stupidity! To cure it, another monitor bespeaks me, from a neighbouring stone. It contains the narrative of an unhappy mortal, snatched from his friends, and hurried to the awful bar; without leisure, either to take a last farewell of the one, or to put up so much as a single prayer preparatory for the other; killed, according to the usual expression, by a sudden stroke of casualty.

Was it then a random blow? Doubtless the stroke came from an aiming, though invisible hand. God presideth over the armies of heaven; God ruleth among the inhabitants of the earth; and God conducteth what men call chance. Nothing, nothing comes to pass through a blind and undiscerning fatality. If accidents happen, they happen according to the exact foreknowledge, and conformably to the determinate counsels of eternal wisdom. The Lord, with whom are the issues of death, signs the warrant, and gives the high commission. The seemingly fortuitous disaster, is only the agent, or the instrument appointed to execute the supreme decree. When the impious monarch was mortally wounded, it seemed to be a casual shot. "A certain man drew a bow at a venture."—At a venture as he thought. But his hand was strengthened by an omnipotent aid, and the shaft levelled by an unerring eye. So that what we term casualty, is really providence, accomplishing deliberate designs, but concealing its own interposition.—How comforting this reflection! Admirably adapted to soothe the throbbing anguish of the mourners, and compose their spirits into a quiet submission! Excellently suited to dissipate the fears of godly survivors and create a calm intrepidity even amidst innumerable perils!

How thin is the partition between this world and another! How short the transition from time to eternity! The partition nothing more than the breath in our nostrils; and the transition may be made in the twinkling of an eye.—Poor Chreumylus, I remember, arose from the diversions of a card-table, and dropt into the dwellings of darkness. One night Corinna was all gaiety in her spirits, all finery in her apparel, at a magnificent ball. The next night, she lay pale and stiff, an extended corpse, and ready to be mingled with the mouldering dead. Young Atticus lived to see his ample and commodious seat completed, but not to spend one joyous hour under the stately roof. The sashes were hung to admit the day; but the master's eyes were closed in endless night. The apartments were furnished to afford refreshment or invite repose; but their lord rests in the more peaceful chambers of the tomb. The gardens were planned, and a thousand elegant decorations designed; but, alas! their intended possessor is gone down to "the place of skulls;" is gone down to the valley of the shadow of death.

While I am recollecting, many, I question not, are experiencing the same tragical vicissitude. The eyes of that sublime Being—Who sits upon the circle of the earth, and views all its inhabitants with one comprehensive glance—even now behold many tents in affliction; such affliction as overwhelmed the Egyptians in that fatal night, when the destroying angel sheathed his arrows in all the pride of their strength.—Some sinking to the floor from their easy chair; and deaf even to the most piercing shrieks of their distracted relations.—Some giving up the ghost, as they sit retired, or lie reclined under the shady arbour to taste the sweets of the flowery scene.—Some as they sail, associated with a party of pleasure, along the dancing stream, and through the laughing meads. Nor is the grim intruder mollified though wine and music flow around. Some intercepted as they are returning home; and some interrupted, as they enter upon an important negotiation.—Some arrested with the gain of injustice in their hands; and some surprised in the very act of lewdness, or the attempt of cruelty.

Legions, legions of disasters, such as no prudence can foresee, and no care prevent, lie in wait to accomplish our doom. A starting horse may throw his rider; may at once dash his body against the stones, and fling his soul into the invisible world. A stack of chimneys may tumble into the street, and crush the unwary passenger under the ruins: even a single tile, dropping from the roof, may be as fatal as the fall of the whole structure.—So frail, so very attenuated is the thread of life, that it not only bursts before the storm, but breaks even at a breeze. The most common occurrences, those from which we suspect not the least harm, may prove the weapons of our destruction. A grape-stone, a despicable fly, may be more mortal than Goliath, with all his formidable armour. Nay, if God give command, our very comforts become killing. The air we breathe, is our bane! and the food we eat, the vehicle of death.—That last enemy has unnumbered avenues for his approach: yea, lies entrenched in our very bosom, and holds his fortress in the seat of our life. The crimson fluid, which distributes health, is impregnated with the seeds of death.* Heat may inflame it, or toil oppress it, and make it destroy the parts it was designed to cherish. Some unseen impediment may obstruct its passage, or some unknown violence may divert its course: in either of which case it acts the part of a poisonous draught, or a deadly stab.

Ah! in what perils is vain life engag'd?
What slight neglects, what trivial faults destroy
The hardest frame! of indolence, of toil,
We die; of want, of superfluity,
The all surrounding heaven, the vital air,
Is big with death.

Since then we are so liable to be dispossessed of this earthly tabernacle, let us look upon ourselves only as tenants at will; and hold ourselves in perpetual readiness to depart at a moment's warning. Without such an habitual readiness, we are like wretches that sleep on the top of a mast, while a horrid gulf yawns, or furious waves rage below. And where can be the peace, what the satisfaction of such a state! Whereas, a prepared condition will inspire a cheerfulness of temper, not to be displayed by any alarming accident, and create a firmness of mind, not to be overthrown by the most threatening dangers. When the city is fortified with walls, furnished with provision, guarded by able and resolute troops; what have the inhabitants to fear? what may they not enjoy? So, just so, or rather by a much surer band, are connected the real taste of life, and the constant thought of death.

I said, our very comforts may become killing.—And see the truth inscribed by the hand, sealed with the signet of fate. The marble, which graces yonder pillar, informs me, that near it are deposited the remains of Sophronia; the much lamented Sophronia, who died in child-bed.—How often does this calamity happen? The branch shoots, but the stem withers. The babe springs to light; but she that bare him breathes her last. She gives life, but gives it (O pitiable consideration!) at the expense of her own; and becomes at once a mother and a corpse.—Or else, perhaps, she expires in severe pangs, and is herself a tomb for her infant; while the melancholy complaint of a monarch's woe is the epitaph for them both; 'The children are come to the birth, and there is not strength to bring forth,*—Less to be lamented in my opinion, this misfortune than the other. Better for the tender stranger, to be stopped in the porch, than to enter only to converse with affliction. Better to find a grave in the womb than to be exposed on a hazardous world, without the guardian of its infantile years, without the faithful guide of its youth.

This monument is distinguished by its finer materials, and more delicate appendages. It seems to have taken its model from an affluent hand, directed by a generous heart, which thought it could never do enough for the deceased. It seems, also, to exhibit an emblematical picture of Sophronia's person and accomplishments. Is her beauty, or, what is more than beauty, her white robed innocence, represented by the snowy colour? The surface smoothly polished, like her amiable temper, and engaging manners. The whole elegantly adorned, without either extravagant pomp, or sordid negligence; like her undissembled goodness, remote from the least ostentation, yet in all points exemplary. But ah! how vain were all these endearing charms! How vain the lustre of thy sprightly eye! How vain the bloom of thy bridal youth! How vain the honours of thy superior birth! How unable to secure the lovely possessor from the savage violence of death! How ineffectual the universal esteem of thy acquaintance; the fondness of thy transported husband; or even the spotless integrity of thy character, to prolong thy span, or procure thee a short reprieve!—The concurrence of all these circumstances reminds me of those beautiful and tender lines,

How lov'd how valu'd once, avails thee not:
To whom related, or by whom begot.
A heap of dust alone remains of thee:
'Tis all thou art!—and all the proud shall be!†

Pope's Miscell.

* Isaiah xxxvii. 3.

† These verses are inscribed on a small, but elegant monument lately erected in the great church at Northampton; which, in the hieroglyphical decorations, corresponds with the description introduced above. In this circumstance particularly, that it is dedicated to the memory of an amiable woman, Mrs. ANNE STONEHOUSE, the excellent wife of my worthy friend, Dr. STONEHOUSE; who has seen all the power of that healing art, to which I, and so many others, have been greatly indebted, failing in their attempts to preserve a life dearer to him than his own.

Neque prosunt domino que profunt omnibus, artes.
Ovid.

No longer his all-healing art avails;
But every remedy its Master fails.

In the midst of his tender distress, he has sought some kind of consolation, even from the sepulchral marble, by teaching it to speak, at once his esteem for her memory; and his veneration for that religion, which she so eminently adorned. Nor could this be more significantly done, than by summing up her character, in that concise, but comprehensivè sentence, A SIBI PER CHRISTUM. Conceivè enough to be the motto for a

* As man, perhaps the moment of his breath, Receives the lurking principles of death,
'The young disease, that must subdue at length,
Grows with his growth, and strengthens with his strength.
Pope's Æliades.

Yet though unable to divert the stroke, Christianity is sovereign to pluck out the sting of death. Is not this the silent language of those lamps which burn; and of that heart which flames; of those palms which flourish; and of that crown which glitters, in the wall imitated and gilded marble? Do they not, to the discerning eye, describe the vigilance of her faith; the fervency of her devotion; her victory over the world; and the celestial diadem, which the Lord, the righteous Judge, shall give her at that day.*

How happy the husband, in such a sharer of his bed, and partner of his fortunes! their inclinations were nicely tuned unisons, and menning ring; yet, as comprehensive as the most enlarged sphere of personal, social, and religious worth. "For whatsoever things are pure, whatsoever things are lovely, whatsoever things are of good report;" are they not all included in that grand and noble aggregate—A SINCERE CHRISTIAN!

The first lines, considered in such a connexion, are wonderfully plaintive and pathetic;

How lov'd, how valu'd once, avails thee not;
To whom related, or by whom begot.

They sound, at least in my ears, like the voice of sorrow mingled with admiration. The speaker seems to have been lost, for a while in melancholy contemplation; suddenly breaks out in this abrupt exclamation, then melts into tears, and can proceed no farther. Yet in this case, how eloquent is silence! While it hints the universal esteem which attended, and the superiority of birth which distinguished the deceased wife; it expresses beyond all the pomp of words, the yearning affection, and heart-felt affliction, of the surviving husband. Amidst the group of monumental marbles, which are lavish of their panegyric, this, I think, resembles the incomparable address of the painter; who having placed round a beautiful expiring virgin, her friends in all the agonies of grief, represented the unequalled anguish of the father with far greater liveliness and strength, or rather with an inexpressible emphasis, by drawing a veil over his face.

If the last lines are a wild departure from the beaten track of our modern epithets, and the very reverse of their high-flown compliments,

A heap of dust alone remains of thee!
'Tis all thou art! and all the ground shall be,— they are not without a precedent, and one of the most consummate kind. Since they breathe the very spirit of that sacred elegy, in which all the heart of the hero and the friend seems to be dissolved; "How are the mighty fallen, and the weapons of war perished!" 2 Sam. i. 27. They remind the reader of that awful lesson which was originally dictated by the supreme Wisdom: "Dust thou art, and unto dust thou shalt return." Gen. iii. 19.—They inculcate, with all the force of the most convincing evidence, that solemn admonition delivered by the prophet: "Cease ye from man, whose breath is in his nostrils; for wherein is he to be accounted of?" Isa. ii. 22.

That no reader, however inattentive, might mistake the sense and design of this part of the last line, it is guarded above and beneath.—Above is an expanded book, that seems to be waved with an air of triumph, over the emblem of death; which we cannot but suppose to be the volume of inspiration, as it exhibits a sort of abridgment of its whole contents, in those animated words, "Be ye not slothful but followers of them, who through faith and patience inherit the promises," Heb. vi. 12.—Beneath, that every part might be pregnant with instruction, are these striking reflections; worthy the consideration of the highest proficient in knowledge and piety, yet obvious to the understanding of the most untaught reader: Life, how short! Eternity, how long!—May my soul learn the forcible purport of this short lesson in her contracted span of time! and all eternity will not be too long to rejoice in having learned it.

'Tis all thou art!

* Tim. iv. 9.

all their conversation was harmony. How silken the yoke to such a pair, and what blessings were twisted with such bands? Every joy was heightened, and every care alleviated. Nothing seemed wanting to consummate their bliss, but a hopeful progeny rising around them; that they might see themselves multiplied in their little ones; see their mingled graces transfused into their offspring; and feel the glow of their affection augmented, by being reflected from their children. "Grant us this gift," said their united prayers, "and our satisfactions are crowned, we request no more."

Alas! how blind are mortals to future events? how unable to discern what is really good! * Give me children, said Rachel, or else I die.† An ardour of impatience altogether unbecoming, and as mistaken as it was unbecoming. She dies not by the disappointment, but by the accomplishment of her desire. If children are to parents, like a flowery chaplet, whose beauties blossom with ornament, and whose odours breathe delight; death or some fell misfortune, may find means to entwine themselves with the lovely wreath. Whenever our souls are poured out, with passionate impertunity, after any inferior acquisition, it may be truly said, in the words of our divine Master, Ye know not what ye ask.—Does Providence withhold the thing that we long for? It denies in mercy; and only withholds the occasion of our misery, if not the instrument of our ruin. With a sickly appetite we often loathe what is wholesome, and hanker after our bane. Where imagination dreams of unmingled sweets, there experience frequently finds the bitterness of woe.

Therefore may we covet immoderately, neither this nor that form of earthly felicity; but refer the whole of our condition to the choice of unerring wisdom. May we learn to renounce our own will, and be ready to make a sacrifice of our warmest wishes, whenever they run counter to the good pleasure of God. For indeed, as to obey his laws is to be perfectly free, so to resign ourselves to his disposal, is to establish our own happiness, and to be secure from fear of evil.

Here a small and plain stone is placed upon the ground, purchased, one would imagine, from the little fund, and formed by the hand of frugality itself. Nothing costly; not one decoration added; only a very short inscription; and that so effaced, as to be scarcely intelligible.—Was the depository unfaithful to its trust? Or were the letters worn, by the frequent resort of the surviving family, to mourn over the grave, and revive the remembrance of a most valuable and beloved relative?—For I perceive upon a closer inspection, that it covers the remains of a father—A religious father, snatched from his growing offspring, before they were settled in the world, or so much as their principles fixed by a thorough education.

This, sure, is the most complicated distress, that has hitherto come under our consideration. The solemnities of such a dying chamber, are some of the most melting and melancholy scenes imaginable.—There lies the affectionate husband; the indulgent parent; the faithful friend; and the generous master. He lies in the last extremities, and on the very point of dissolution. Art has done its all. The raging disease mocks the power of medicine. It hastens with restless impetuosity, to execute its dreadful errand; to rend asunder the silver cord of life, and the more delicate tie of social attachment and conjugal affection.

A servant or two, from a revering distance, cast many a wishful look, and console their honoured master in the language of sighs. The condescending mildness of his commands was wont to produce an alacrity of obedience, and render their service a pleasure. Now the remembrance of both embitters their grief, and makes it trickle plentifully down their honest cheeks.—His friends, who have so often shared his joys, and gladdened his mind with their enlivening converse, are now miserable comforters. A sympathizing and mourning pity is all the relief they are able to contribute, unless it be augmented by their silent prayers for the divine succour, and a word of consolation suggested from the scriptures.*—Those poor innocents, the children croud around the bed; drowned in tears, and almost frantic with grief, they sob out their little souls, and passionately cry, “Will he leave us? leave us in a helpless condition! leave us to an injurious world!”

These separate streams are all united in the distressed spouse, and overwhelm her breast with an impetuous tide of sorrows. In her, the lover weeps, the wife mourns, and all the mother yearns. To her, the loss is beyond measure aggravated, by months and years of delightful society, and exalted friendship.—Where, alas! can she meet with such unsuspected fidelity, or repose such unreserved confidence? where find so discreet a counsellor, so improving an example, and a guardian so sedulously attentive to the interests of herself, and her children? See! how she hangs over the languishing bed; most tenderly solicitous to prolong a life, important and valuable, far beyond her own; or, if that be impracticable, no less tenderly officious to soothe the last agonies of her dearer self. Her hands, trembling under direful apprehensions, wipe the cold dews from the livid cheeks; and sometimes stay the sinking head on her gentle arms, sometimes rest it on her compassionate bosom.—See! how she gazes, with a speechless ardour on the pale countenance, and meagre features! While all her soft passions beat unutterable fondness, and her very soul bleeds with exquisite anguish.

The sufferer, all patient and adoring, submits to the divine will; and, by submission, becomes superior to his affliction. He is sensibly touched with the disconsolate state of his attendants, and pierced with an anxious concern for his wife and his children: his wife, who will soon be a destitute widow; his children, who will soon be helpless orphans. Yet, “though cast down, not in despair.” He is greatly refreshed by his trust in the everlasting covenant and his hope of approaching glory. Religion gives a dignity to distress. At each interval of ease, he comforts his very comforters; and suffers with all the majesty of woe.

The soul, just going to abandon the tottering clay, collects all her force, and exerts her last efforts. The good man raises himself on his pillow; extends a kind hand to his servants, who are bathed in tears; takes an affecting farewell of his friends; clasps his wife in a feeble embrace; kisses the dear pledges of their mutual love; and then pours all that remains of life and strength, in the following words;—“I die, my dear children: But God, the everlasting God, will be with you.—Though you lose an earthly parent, you have a Father in heaven, who lives for evermore.—Nothing, nothing but an unbelieving heart, and irreligious life, can ever separate you from the regards of his providence—from the endearments of his love.”

He could proceed no farther. His heart was full; but utterance failed.—After a short pause, prompted by affectionate zeal, with difficulty, great difficulty, he added—“You the dear partner of my soul; you are now the only protector of our orphans.—I leave you under a weight of cares.—But God, who defendeth the cause of the widow,—God, whose promise is faithfulness, and truth—God hath said, I will never leave thee, nor forsake thee.*—This revives my drooping spirits, let this support the wife of my bosom.—And now, O Father of compassions, into thy hands I commend my spirit.—Encouraged by thy promised goodness, I leave my fatherless——”

Here he fainted; fell back upon the bed; and lay for some minutes, bereft of his senses. As a taper upon the very point of extinction, is sometimes suddenly rekindled, and leaps into a quivering flame; so life, before it totally expired, gave a parting struggle, and once more looked abroad from the opening eye-lids. He would fain have spoke; fain have uttered the sentence he began. More than once he essayed; but the organs of speech were become like a broken vessel, and nothing but the obstructing phlegm rattled in his throat; his aspect, however, spoke affection inexpressible. With all the father, all the husband, still living in his looks, he takes one more view of those dear children, whom he had often beheld with a parental triumph. He turns his dying eyes on that beloved woman, whom he had never beheld but with a glow of delight. Fixed in this posture, amidst smiles of love, and under a gleam of heaven, they shine out their last.

Upon this, the silent sorrow bursts into loud laments. They weep, and refuse to be comforted. Till some length of time had given vent to the excess of passion; and the consolations of religion had stanch'd their bleeding woes. Then, the afflicted family search for the sentence, which fell unfinished from those loved, those venerable and pious lips. They find it recorded by the prophet Jeremiah, containing the direction of infinite wisdom, and the promise of unbounded goodness: “Leave thy fatherless children: I will preserve them alive: and let thy widows trust in me.”*—This now is the comfort of their life, and the joy of their heart. They treasure it up in their memories. It is the best of legacies, and an inexhaustible fund. A fund, which will supply all their wants, by entailing the blessing of heaven on all their honest labours.—They are rich, they are happy, in this sacred pledge of the divine favour. They fear no evil; they want no good; because God is their portion and their guardian God.

No sooner turned from one memento of my own, and memorial of another's decease, but a second, a third, a long succession of these melancholy monitors crowd upon my sight.†—That which has fixed my observation, is one of a more grave and sable aspect than the former. I suppose it preserves the relics of a more aged person. One would conjecture, that he made somewhat of a figure in his station among the living, as his mounment does among the funeral marbles. Let me draw near, and inquire of the stone. “Who or what is beneath its surface?”—I am informed, he was once the owner of a considerable estate: which was much improved by his own application and management: that he left the world in the busy period of life, advanced a little beyond the meridian.

Probably, replied my musing mind, one of those indefatigable drudges, who rise early, late take rest, and eat the bread of carefulness, not to secure the loving-kindness of the Lord, not to make provision for any reasonable necessity, but only to amass together ten thousand times more than they can possibly use. Did he not lay schemes for enlarging his fortune, and aggrandizing his family? Did he not purpose to join field to field, and add house to house, till his possessions were almost as vast as his desires? That, then, he would* sit down and enjoy what he had acquired, breathe a while from his toilsful pursuit of things temporal, and, perhaps, think a little of things eternal.

But see the folly of worldly wisdom! How silly, how childish is the sagacity of (what is called) manly and masterly prudence, when it contrives more solicitously for time, than it provides for eternity! How strangely infatuated are those subtle heads which weary themselves in concerting measures for phantoms of a day, and scarce bestow a thought on everlasting realities!—when every wheel moves on smoothly; when all the well-disposed designs are ripening apace for execution; and the long expected crisis of enjoyment seems to approach; behold! God from on high laughs at the Babel-builder. Death touches the bubble and it breaks; it drops into nothing. The cob-web, most finely spun indeed, but more easily dislodged, is swept away in an instant; and all the abortive projects are buried in the same grave with their projector. So true is that verdict which the wisdom from above passes on these successful unfortunates, “They walk in a vain shadow, and disquiet themselves in vain.”†

Speak ye that attended such a one in his last minutes; ye that heard his expiring sentiments, did he not cry out, in the language of disappointed sensuality, “O death! how terrible is thy approach to a man immersed in secular cares, and void of all concern for the never ending hereafter? Where, alas! is the profit, where the comfort of entering deep into the knowledge, and of being dexterous in the dispatch of earthly affairs; since I have all the while neglected the one thing needful? Destructive mistake! I have been attentive to every inferior interest. I have laid myself out on the trifles of a moment, but have disregarded heaven; have forgot eternal ages! Oh! that my days."—Here, he was going on to breathe some fruitless wishes, or to form I know not what ineffectual resolutions. But a sudden convulsion shook his nerves; disabled his tongue; and, in less than an hour, dissolved his frame.

May the children of this world be warned, by the dying words of an unhappy brother; and gather advantage from his misfortune.—Why should they pant with such impatient ardour; after white and yellow earth, as if the universe did not afford sufficient for every one to take a little! Why should they lade themselves with thick clay, when they are to "run for an incorruptible crown, and press towards the prize of their high calling?" Why should they overload the vessel, in which their everlasting all is embarked; or fill their arms with superfluities, when they are to swim for their lives? Yet so preposterous is the conduct of those persons, who are all industry, to heap up an abundance of the wealth which perisheth, but scarce so much as faintly desirous of being rich towards God.

O that we may walk from henceforth through all these glittering toys, at least with a wise indifference, if not with a superior disdain! Having enough for the conveniences of life, let us only accommodate ourselves with things below, and lay up our treasures in the regions above.—Whereas, if we indulge an anxious concern, or lavish an inordinate care, on any transitory possessions, we shall rivet them to our affections with so firm an union, that the utmost severity of pain must attend the separating stroke. By such an eager attachment to what will certainly be ravished from us, we shall only ensure to ourselves accumulated anguish, against the agonizing hour, we shall plant, aforehand, our dying pillow with thorns.*

Some, I perceive, arrived at threescore years and ten, before they made their exit: nay, some few resigned not their breaths, till they had numbered fourscore revolving harvests.—These, I would hope, "remembered their Creator in the days of their youth," before their strength became labour and sorrow;—before that low ebb of languishing nature, when the keepers of the house tremble, and those that look out of the windows are darkened;† when even the lighting down of the grasshopper is a burden on the bending shoulders, and desire itself fails in the listless lethargic soul;—before those heavy hours come, and those tiresome moments draw nigh in which there is too much reason to say, "We have no pleasure in them; no improvement from them."

If their lamps were unfurnished with oil, how unfit must they be, in such decrepit circumstances, to go to the market and buy!‡ For, besides a variety of disorders arising from the enfeebled constitution, their corruptions must be surprisingly strengthened, by such a long course of irreligion. Evil habits must have struck the deepest root; must have twisted themselves with every fibre of the heart, and be as thoroughly ingrained in the disposition, as the soot in the Ethiopian's complexion, or the spots in the leopard's skin. If such a one, under such disadvantages, surmounts all the difficulties which lie in his way to glory, it must be a great and mighty salvation indeed. If such a one escapes destruction, and is saved at the last, it must, without all peradventure, be—so as by fire.†

This is the season which stands in need of comfort, and is very improper to enter upon the conflict. The husbandman should now be putting in his sickle or eating the fruit of his labours; not beginning to break up the ground or scatter the seed.—Nothing, it is true, is impossible with God; he said, "Let there be light, and there was light" instantaneous light, diffused as quick as thought through all the dismal dominion of primeval darkness. At his command a leprosy, of the longest continuance, and of the utmost inveteracy, departs in a moment. He can, in the greatness of his strength, quicken the wretch, who has lain dead in trespasses and sins, not four days only, but fourscore years. Yet trust not, O trust not, a point of such inexpressible importance, to so dreadful an uncertainty. God may suspend his power; may withdraw his help; may swear in his wrath, that such abuses of his long-suffering shall "never enter into his rest."

Ye therefore, that are vigorous in health, and blooming in years, improve the precious opportunity. Improve your golden hours to the noblest of all purposes; such as may render you meet for the inheritance of the saints in light, and ascertain your title to a state of immortal youth, to a crown of eternal glory.—Stand not all the prime of your day idle; trifle no longer with the offers of this immense felicity; but make haste, and Night Thoughts, No. III.

† Eecl. xii. 3, 5. I need not remind my reader, that by the former of these figurative expressions is signified the enervated state of the hands and arms; by the latter, the dimness of the eyes, or the total loss of sight; that taken in connexion with other parts of the chapter, they exhibit by a series of bold and lively metaphors, a description of the various infirmities attendant on old age.

delay? not the time to keep God's commandments. While you are loitering in a gay insensibility, death may be bending his bow, and marking you out for speedy victims.—Not long ago, I happened to spy a thoughtless jay. The poor bird was idly busied in dressing his pretty plumes, or hopping carelessly from spray to spray. A sportsman coming by, observes the feathered rover. Immediately he lifts the tube and levels his blow. Swifter than whirlwind flies the leaden death; and in a moment, lays the silly creature breathless on the ground.—Such, such may be the fate of the man, who has a fair occasion of obtaining grace to-day, and wantonly postpones the improvement of it, till to-morrow. He may be cut off in the midst of his folly, and ruined for ever while he is dreaming of being wise hereafter.

Some, no doubt, came to this their last retreat full of piety, and full of days; “as a shock of corn, ripe with age and laden with plenty, cometh in, in his season.”†—These were children of light and wise in their generation; wise with that exalted wisdom which cometh from above; and with that enduring wisdom which lasts to eternity.—Rich also they were, more honourably and permanently rich than all the votaries of mammon. The wealth of the one has made itself wings, and is irrecoverably gone; while the wretched acquirers are transmitted to that place of penury and pain, where not so much as one drop of water is allowed to cool their scorching tongues, the stores of the other still abide with them; will never depart from them; but make them glad for ever and ever in the city of their God. Their treasures were such as no created power could take away, such as none but infinite beneficence can bestow, and (comfortable to consider!) such as I, and every indigent longing sinner may obtain treasures of heavenly knowledge, and saving faith; treasures of atoning blood and imputed righteousness.

Here† lie their bodies in “peaceful habitations, and quiet resting places.” Here they have thrown off every burden, and are escaped from every snare. The head aches no more; the eye forgets to weep; the flesh is no longer racked with acute, nor wasted with lingering distemper. Here they receive a final release from pain, and an everlasting discharge from sorrow. Here danger never threatens them with her terrifying alarms; but tranquillity softens their couch, and safety guards their repose.—Rest then, ye precious relics, within this hospitable gloom; rest in gentle slumbers, till the last trumpet proceeds from an excessive and mistaken delicacy. Let proper care be taken to secure from injury the foundations of the building, and to prevent the exhalation of any noxious effluvia from the putrefying flesh; and I cannot discover any inconveniences attending this practice.

The notion, that noisome carcases (as they are called) are very unbecoming a place consecrated to religious purposes, seems to be derived from the antiquated Jewish canon; whereby it was declared, that a dead body imparted defilement to the person who touched it, and polluted the spot where it was lodged. On which account the Jews were scrupulously careful to have their sepulchres built at a distance from their houses, and made it a point of conscience, not to suffer burial places to subsist in the city. But as this was a ritually ceremonial, it seems to be entirely superseded by the gospel dispensation.

I cannot forbear thinking, that under the Christian economy, there is a propriety and usefulness in the custom.—Usefulness, because it must render our solemn assemblies more venerable and awful. For, when we walk over the dust of our friends, or kneel upon the ashes of our relations, this awakening circumstance must strike a lively impression of our own mortality. And what consideration can be more effectual to make us serious and attentive in hearing, earnest and inopportune in praying.

As for the fitness of the usage, it seems perfectly suitable to the design of those sacred edifices. They are set apart for God: not only to receive his worshippers, but to preserve the furniture for holy ministrations, and what is in a peculiar manner appropriated to the divine Majesty. Are not the bodies of the saints the Almighty's property? Were they not once the objects of his tender love? Are they not still the objects of his special care? Has he not given commandment concerning the bones of his elect; and charged the ocean, and enjoined the grave, to keep them till that day? When rocks bright with gems, or mountains rich with mines, are abandoned to the devouring flames, will not these be rescued from the fiery ruin! will not these be translated into Jehovah's kingdom, and conjointly with the soul, made “his jewels,” made “his peculiar treasure;” made to “shine as the brightness of the firmament and the stars for ever and ever.”

Is not Christ the Lord of our bodies? Are they not bought with a price; bought not with corruptible things, as silver and gold, but with his divinely precious blood? And if the blessed Jesus purchased the redemption of our bodies at so infinitely dear a rate, can it enter into our hearts to conceive, that he should dislike to have them reposed under his own habitation?—Once more; Are not the bodies of the faithful “temples of the Holy Ghost?” and is there not upon this supposition, an apparent propriety, rather than the least indecorum, in committing those temples of flesh; to the temples made with hands? They are vessels of honour; instruments of righteousness; and, even when broken by death, like the fragments of a golden bowl, are valuable, are worthy to be laid up in the safest, most honourable repositories.

Upon the whole, since the Lord Jesus has purchased them at the expense of his blood; and the blessed Spirit has honoured them with his indwelling presence; since they are right dear in the sight of the adorable Trinity, and undoubted heirs of a glorious immortality; why should it be thought a thing improper to admit them to a transient rest in their heavenly Father's house? Why may they not lie down and sleep, in the outer courts; since they are soon to be introduced into the inmost mansions of everlasting honour and joy?

* May I be permitted to recommend, as a treasure of fine sentiments, Dr. Lucas's Inquiry after Happiness; and, as a treatise particularly apposite to my subject, that part of his inquiry which displays the method, and enumerates the advantages of improving life, or living much in a little time. Chap. iii. p. 158.—An author, in whom the gentleman, the scholar, and the Christian are remarkably united.—A performance, which in point of solid argument, unaffected piety, and a vein of thought amazingly fertile, has few superiors. Inasmuch that I know not how to wish my reader a more refined pleasure, or a more substantial blessing, than to have the maxims of this entertaining and pathetic writer's little piece, wove into the very texture of his heart. Unless I might be allowed to wish, that the writer himself had interspersed the glorious peculiarities of the gospel (on which our happiness so much depends) a little more liberally through all his works.

‡ Some, I know, are offended at our burying corpses within the church, and exclaim against it as a very great impropriety and indecency. But this, I imagine, shall give the welcome signal, and sound aloud through all your silent mansions, "Arise, shine; for your light is come, and the glory of the Lord is risen upon you." (Isa. lx. 1.)

To those, how calm was the evening of life! In what a smiling serenity did their sun go down! When their flesh and their heart failed, how reviving was the remembrance of an all-sufficient Redeemer; once dying for their sins, now risen again for their justification! How cheering the well grounded hope of pardon for their transgressions, and peace with God through Jesus Christ our Lord! How did this assuage the agonies, and sweeten the bitterness of death!—Where now is wealth, with all her golden mountains? Where is honour with her proud trophies of renown? Where are all the vain pomps of a deluded world? Can they inspire such comfort, can they administer any support in this last extremity? Can they compose the affrighted thoughts, or buoy up the departing soul, amidst all the pangs of dissolution?—The followers of the Lamb seem pleased and triumphant even at their last gasp. "God's everlasting arms are underneath" (Deut. xxxiii. 27.) their fainting heads. His spirit whispers peace and consolation to their consciences. In the strength of these heavenly succours, they quit the field, not captives but conquerors; with "hopes full of immortality."

And now they are gone—The struggles of reluctant nature are over. The body sleeps in death, the soul launches into the invisible state.—But who can imagine the delightful surprise, when they find themselves surrounded by guardian angels, instead of weeping friends? How securely do they wing their way, and pass through unknown worlds under the conduct of those celestial guides.—The vale of tears is quite lost. Farewell, for ever, the realms of woe, and range of malignant beings! They arrive on the frontiers of inexpressible felicity. They "are come to the city of the living God;" while a voice, sweeter than music in her softest strains, sweet as the harmony of hymning seraphim, congratulates their arrival, and bespeaks their admission: "Lift up your heads, O ye gates; and be ye lift up, ye everlasting doors, that the heirs of glory may enter in."

Here then let us leave the spirits and souls of the righteous, escaped from an entangling wilderness, and received into a paradise of delights! escaped from the territories of disquietude, and settled in regions of unmolest security! Here they sit down with Abraham, Isaac, and Jacob, in the kingdom of their Father. Here they mingle with an innumerable company of angels, and rejoice around the throne of the Lamb; rejoice in the fruition of present felicity, and in the assured expectation of an inconceivable addition to their bliss; when God shall call the heavens from above, and the earth, that he may judge his people.*

Fools account their life madness, and their end to be without honour; but they are numbered among the children of God, and their lot, their distinguished and eternal lot, is among the saints!† However, therefore, an undiscerning world may despise, and a profane world vilify the truly religious; be this the supreme, the invariable desire of my heart! "Let me live the life, and die the death of the righteous. Oh! let my latter end, and future state be like theirs."

What figure is that which strikes my eye, from an eminent part of the wall? It is not only placed in a more elevated situation than the rest, but carries a more splendid and sumptuous air than ordinary. Swords and spears, murdering engines, and instruments of slaughter, adorn the stone with a formidable magnificence.—It proves to be the monument of a noble warrior.

Is such respect, thought I, paid to the memory of this brave soldier, for sacrificing his life to the public good?—Then what honours, what immortal honours, are due to the great captain of our salvation? who, though Lord of the angelic legions, and supreme commander of all the heavenly hosts, willingly offered himself a bleeding propitiation for sinners.

The one died being a mortal, and only yielded up a life which was long before forfeited to divine justice; which must soon have been surrendered as a debt to nature, if it had not fallen as a prey to war.—But Christ took flesh and gave up the ghost, though he was the great I AM; the fountain of existence, who calls happiness and immortality all his own. He who thought it no robbery to be equal with God, he, whose outgoings were from everlasting; even he was made in the likeness of man, and cut off out of the land of the living. Wonder, O heavens! be astonished, O earth! He died the death, of whom it is witnessed, that he is "the true God, and eternal life." (1 John v. 20.)

The one exposed himself to peril in the service of his sovereign and his country; which, though it was glorious to do, yet

* Seneca's reflections upon the state of holy souls delivered from the burden of the flesh, are sparkling and fine; yet very indistinct and empty, compared with the particulars mentioned above, and with many others that might be collected from scripture. would have been ignominious, in such circumstances to have declined.—But Christ took the field, though he was the blessed and only potentate, the King of kings, and Lord of lords. Christ took the field, though he was sure to drop in the engagement; and put on the harness, though he knew beforehand that it must reek with his blood. That prince of heaven resigned his royal person, not barely to hazard but to the inevitable stroke; to death, certain in its approach, and armed with all its horrors.—And for whom? Not for those who were in any degree deserving; but for his own disobedient creatures; for the pardon of condemned malefactors, for a band of rebels, a race of traitors, the most obnoxious and inexcusable of all criminals; whom he might have left to perish in their iniquities, without the least impeachment of his goodness, and to the display of his avenging justice.

The one, it is probable, died expeditiously; was suddenly wounded, and soon slain. A bullet lodged in his heart, a sword sheathed in his breast, or a battle-axe cleaving the brain, might put a speedy end to his misery; dispatch him “as in a moment.”—Whereas the divine Redeemer expired in tedious and protracted torments. His pangs were as lingering, as they were exquisite. Even in the prelude to his last suffering, what a load of sorrows overwhelmed his sacred humanity! till the intolerable pressure wrung blood, instead of sweat from every pore; till the crimson flood bathed his body, stained all his raiment, and tinged the very stones.—But when the last scene of the tragedy commenced; when the executioner’s hammer had nailed him to the cross, O! how many dismal hours did that amiable and illustrious sufferer hang; a spectacle of woe to God, to angels, and to men! his temples mangled with the thorny crown! his hands and feet cleft with the rugged irons! his flesh covered with wounds smarting and agonizing in every nerve! and his soul, his very soul, pierced with pangs of unutterable distress!—So long he hung, that nature, through all her dominions, was thrown into sympathizing commotions. The earth could no longer sustain such barbarous indignities without trembling, nor the sun behold them without horror. Nay, so long did he hang in this extremity of torture, that the alarm reached even the remote regions of the dead.—Never, O my soul, never forget the amazing truth! The lamb of God was seized, was bound, was slaughtered with the utmost inhumanity, and endured death in all its bitterness, for thee! His murderers, studiously cruel, so guided the fatal cup, that he tasted every drop of its gall, before he drank it off to the very dregs.

Once again: the one died like a hero, and fell gallantly in the field of battle. But died not Christ as a fool dieth!* Not on the bed of honour, with scars of glory on his breast; but like some execrable miscreant, on a gibbet! with lashes of the vile scourge on his back! Yes, the blessed Jesus bowed his expiring head on the accursed tree, suspended between heaven and earth, as an outcast from both, and unworthy of either.

What suitable returns of inflamed and adoring devotion, can we make to the Holy One of God, thus dying, that we might live? dying in ignominy and anguish, that we might live for ever in the heights of joy, and sit for ever on thrones of glory.—Alas! it is not in us, impotent, insensible mortals, to be duly thankful. He only who confers such inconceivable rich favours, can enkindle a proper warmth of grateful affection. Then build thyself a monument, most gracious Immanuel, build thyself an everlasting monument of gratitude in our souls. Inscribe the memory of thy matchless beneficence not with ink and pen, but with that precious blood which gushed from thy wounded veins. Engrave it, not with the hammer and chisel, but with that sharpened spear, which pierced thy sacred side. Let it stand conspicuous and indelible, not on outward tables of stone, but on the very inmost tables of our hearts.

One thing more, let me observe before I bid adieu to this entombed warrior, and his garnished sepulchre. How mean are those ostentatious methods of bribing the vote of fame, and purchasing a little posthumous renown! What a poor substitute for a set of memorable actions, is polished alabaster, or the mimicry of sculptured marble! The real excellency of this bleeding patriot† is written on the minds of his countrymen; it would be remembered with applause, so long as the nation subsists, without this artificial expedient to perpetuate it.—And such, such is the monument I would wish for myself. Let me leave a memorial in the breasts of my fellow-creatures. Let surviving friends bear witness that I have not lived to myself alone, nor been altogether unserviceable in my generation. O!

* 2 Sam. iii. 33. Of this indignity our Lord complains, “Are ye come out as against a thief?” Matth. xxvi. 55.

† Sir Bevil Granville, slain in the civil wars at an engagement with the rebels.—It may possibly be some entertainment to the reader, to subjoin Sir Bevil’s character, as it is drawn by that celebrated pen which wrote the history of those unfortunate times.—“That which would have clouded any victory, says the noble historian, and made the loss of others less spoken of, was the death of Sir Bevil Granville. He was indeed an excellent person, whose activity, interest, and reputation, were the foundation of what had been done in Cornwall: his temper and affections so public, that no accident which happened, could make any impression upon him; and his example kept others from taking any thing ill, or at least seeming to do so. In a word, a brighter courage, and a gentler disposition, were never married together, to make the most cheerful and innocent conversation.—Clar. Hist. Reb. vol. II.” let an uninterrupted series of beneficent offices be the inscription, and the best interests of my acquaintance the plate that exhibits it.

Let the poor, as they pass by my grave, point at the little spot, and thankfully acknowledge.—“There lies the man, whose unwearied kindness was the constant relief of my various distresses; who tenderly visited my languishing bed, and readily supplied my indigent circumstances. How often were his counsels a guide to my perplexed thoughts, and a cordial to my dejected spirit! It is owing to God’s blessing on his seasonable charities, and prudent consolations, that I now live, and live in comfort.”—Let a person, once ignorant and ungodly, lift up his eyes to heaven, and say within himself, as he walks over my bones, “Here are the last remains of that sincere friend, who watched for my soul. I can never forget with what heedless gaiety I was posting on in the paths of perdition; and I tremble to think, into what irretrievable ruin I might quickly have been plunged, had not his faithful admonitions met me in the wild career. I was unacquainted with the gospel of peace, and had no concern for its unsearchable treasures; but now, enlightened by his instructive conversation, I see the all-sufficiency of my Saviour; and, animated by his repeated exhortations, I count all things but loss that I may win Christ. Methinks, his discourses, seasoned with religion, and blessed by grace, still tingle in my ears; are still warm on my heart; and, I trust, will be more and more operative, till we meet each other in the house not made with hands, eternal in the heavens.”

The only infallible way of immortalizing our characters, a way equally open to the meanest and most exalted fortune, is “to make our calling and election sure;” to gain some sweet evidence, that our names are written in heaven. Then, however they may be disregarded, or forgotten among men, they will not fail to be had in everlasting remembrance before the Lord.—This is of all distinctions far the noblest; this will issue in never dying-renown. Ambition, be this thy object, and every page of scripture will sanctify the passion; even grace itself will fan thy flame.—As to earthly memorials, yet a little while, and they are all obliterated. The tongue of those, whose happiness we have zealously promoted, must soon be silent in the coffin. Characters cut with a pen of iron, and committed to the solid rock, will, ere long, cease to be legible.* But as many as are enrolled “in the Lamb’s book of Life,” he himself declares, shall never be blotted out from those annals of eternity. (Rev. iii. 5.) When a flight of years has mouldered the triumphal column into dust; when the brazen statue perishes, under the corroding hand of time; those honours still continue; still are blooming and incorruptible, in the world of glory.

Make the extended skies your tomb;
Let stars record your worth;
Yet know, vain mortals, all must die,
As nature’s sickliest birth.

Would bounteous heav’n indulge my pray’r,
I frame a nobler choice;
Nor living, wish the pompous pile;
Nor dead, regret the loss.

In thy fair book of life divine,
My God, inscribe my name;
There let it fill some humble place,
Beneath the slaughter’d Lamb.

Thy saints, while ages roll away,
In endless fame survive;
Their glories o’er the wrongs of time,
Gradually triumphant live.

Yonder entrance leads, I suppose, to the vault. Let me turn aside and take one view of the habitation, and its tenants.—The sullen door grates upon its hinges; not used to receive many visitants, it admits me with reluctance and murmurs.—What meaneth this sudden trepidation, while I descend the steps, and am visiting the pale mansions of the dead?—Be composed my spirits: there is nothing to fear in these quiet chambers; here, even “the wicked cease from troubling.”

Good heavens! what a solemn scene! how dismal the gloom! Here is perpetual darkness, and night even at noon-day.—How doleful the solitude! Not one trace of cheerful society; but sorrow and terror seem to have made this their dread abode.—Hark! how the hollow dome resounds at every tread. The echoes, that long have slept, are awakened, and whisper along the walls.

A beam or two finds its way through the grates, and reflects a feeble glimmer from the nails of the coffins. So many of those sad spectacles, half concealed in shades, half seen dimly by the baleful twilight, add a deeper horror to these gloomy mansions.—I pore upon the inscriptions, and am just able to pick out, that these are the remains of the rich and renowned. No vulgar dead are deposited here. The most illustrious, and right honourable, have claimed this for their last retreat. And indeed, they retain somewhat of a shadowy pre-eminence. They lie, ranged in mournful order, and in a sort of silent pomp, under the arches of an ample sepulchre: while meaner corpses, without much ceremony, “go down to the stones of the pit.”

My apprehensions recover from their surprise. I find here are no phantoms, but such as fear raises. However, it still amazes me, to observe the wonders of this nether world. Those who received vast revenues, and called whole lordships their own, are here reduced to half a dozen feet of earth, or confined in a few sheets of lead. Rooms of state and sumptuous furniture, are resigned for no other ornament than the shroud, for no other apartment than the dark-some niche. Where is the star that blazed upon the breast; or the coronet that glittered round the temples? The only remains of departed dignity are, the weather-beaten hatchment, and the tattered escutcheon. I see no splendid retinue surrounding this solitary dwelling. The lordly equipage hovers no longer about the lifeless master. He has no other attendant than a dusty statue; which, while the regardless world is as gay as ever, the sculptor's hand is taught to weep.

Those who gloried in high born ancestors, and noble pedigree, here drop their lofty pretensions. They acknowledge kindred with creeping things, and quarter arms with the meanest reptiles. They say to corruption, Thou art my father; and to the worm, Thou art my mother and my sister.—Or should they still assume the style of distinction, alas! how impotent were the claim! how apparent the ostentation! it is said by their monument, here lies the great! how easily is it replied by the spectator?—False marble! Where! Nothing but poor and sordid dust lies here. Mortifying truth! sufficient, one would think, to wean the most sanguine appetite from this transitory state of things; from its sickly satisfactions, its fading glories, its vanishing treasures.

For now, ye lying vanities of life!
Ye ever tempting, ever cheating train!
Where are ye now, and what is your amount?*

What is all the world to these poor breathless beings?—What are their pleasures? A bubble broke.—What their honours? A dream that is forgotten.—What the sum-total of their enjoyments below? Once, perhaps, it appeared to inexperience and fond desire, something considerable; but now death has measured it with his line, and weighed it in his scale; what is the up-shot? Alas! it is shorter than a span, lighter than the dancing spark, and driven away like the dissolving smoke.

Indulge my soul, a serious pause. Recollect all the gay things that were wont to dazzle thine eyes, and inveigle thy affections. Here examine those baits of sense; here form an estimate of their real value. Suppose thyself first among the favourites of fortune, who revel in the lap of pleasure, who shine in the robes of honour, and swim in tides of inexhausted riches; yet how soon would the passing-bell proclaim thy exit! and when once that iron call has summoned thee to thy future reckoning, where would all these gratifications be? At that period, how will all the pageantry of the most affluent, conspicuous, or luxurious circumstances, vanish into empty air!—And is this a happiness so passionately to be coveted?

I thank you, ye relics of sounding titles, and magnificent names; ye have taught me more of the littleness of the world, than all the volumes of my library. Your nobility, arrayed in a winding-sheet; your grandeur, mouldering in an urn; are the most indisputable proofs of the nothingness of created things. Never, surely, did Providence write this important point, in such legible characters, as in the ashes of my Lord, or on the corpse of his Grace.—Let others, if they please, pay their obsequious court to your wealthy sons; and ignobly fawn, or anxiously sue for preferments; my thoughts shall often resort, in pensive contemplation, to the sepulchre of their sires; and learn from their sleeping dust—to moderate my expectations from mortals; to stand disengaged from every undue attachment to the little interests of time—to get above the delusive amusements of honour, the gaudy tinsels of wealth, and all the empty shadows of a perishing world.

Hark! what sound is that?—In such a situation, every noise alarms—Solemn and slow it breaks again upon the silent air.—It is the striking of the clock, designed, one would imagine, to ratify all my serious meditations. Methinks it says Amen, and sets a seal to every improving hint. It tells me, That another portion of my appointed time is elapsed. One calls it, “The knell of my departed hours.” It is the watchword to vigilance and activity. It cries, in the ear of reason, “Redeem the time. Catch the favourable gales of opportunity: O! catch them while they breathe; before they are irrecoverably lost. The span of life shortens continually. Thy minutes are all upon the wing, and hastening to be gone. Thou art a borderer upon eternity, and making incessant advances to the state thou art contemplating.” May the admonition sink deep into an attentive and obedient mind! May it teach me that heavenly arithmetic of “numbering my days, and applying my heart unto wisdom!”

I have often walked beneath the impending promontory's craggy cliff; I have sometimes trod the vast spaces of the lonely desert, and penetrated the inmost recesses of the dreary cavern; but never, never beheld nature lowering, with so tremendous a form; never felt such impressions of awe, striking cold on my heart, as under these black-browed arches, amidst these mouldy walls, and surrounded by such rueful objects: where melancholy, deepest melancholy, for ever spreads her raven-wings.—Let me now emerge from the damp and dreadful obscurity.—Farewell, ye seats of desolation, and shades of death!—Gladly I revisit the realms of day.

* Thomson's Winter, line 210 last edit.

* —Mors sola satetur

Having cast a superficial view upon these receptacles of the dead, curiosity prompts my inquiry to a more intimate survey. Could we draw back the covering of the tomb; could we discern what those are now, who once were mortals;—oh! how would it surprise and grieve us! Surprise us, to behold the prodigious transformation which has taken place on every individual; grieve us, to observe the dishonour done to our nature in general within these subterranean lodgments!

Here the sweet and winning aspect, that wore perpetually an attractive smile, grins horribly a naked, ghastly skull.—The eye, that outshone the diamond's brilliancy, and glanced its lovely lightnings into the most guarded heart, alas! where is it? Where shall we find the rolling sparkler!—How are all its sprightly beams eclipsed, totally eclipsed!—The tongue, that once commanded all the sweetness of harmony, and all the powers of eloquence, in this strange land has "forgot its cunning." Where are now those strains of melody, which ravished our ears? Where is that flow of persuasion, which carried captive our judgments? The great master of language, and of song, is become silent as the night that surrounds him.—The pampered flesh, so lately clothed in purple and fine linen, how is it covered rudely with clods of clay! There was a time when the timorously nice creature would scarce "adventure to set a foot upon the ground, for delicateness and tenderness," (Deut. xxviii. 53.) but is now enwrapped in clammy earth, and sleeps on no softer a pillow than the rugged gravel stones.—Here "the strong men bow themselves;" the nervous arm is unstrung: the brawny sinews are relaxed; the limbs, not long ago the seats of vigour and activity, lie down motionless; and the bones which were as bars of iron, are crumbled into dust.

Here the man of business forgets all his favourite schemes, and discontinues the pursuit of gain. Here is a total stand to the circulation of merchandize; and the hurry of trade. In these solitary recesses, as in the building of Solomon's temple, is heard no sound of the hammer and axe. The winding-sheet and the coffin are the utmost bound of all earthly devices; "Hitherto may they go, but no farther."—Here the sons of pleasure take a final farewell of their dear delights. No more is the sensualist anointed with oil, or crowned with rosebuds; he chants no more to the melody of the viol, nor revels any longer at the banquet of wine. Instead of sumptuous tables and delicious treats, the poor voluptuary is himself a feast for fattened insects; the reptile riots in his flesh, "the worm feeds sweetly on him," (Job xxiv. 20.)—Here also beauty fails; bright beauty drops her lustre here. O! how her roses fade, and her lilies languish in this bleak soil! How does the grand leveller pour contempt upon the charmer of our hearts! How turn to deformity, what captivated the world before!

Could the lover have a sight of his once enchanting fair one, what a startling astonishment would seize him!—"Is this the object I not long ago so passionately admired! I said she was divinely fair, and thought her somewhat more than mortal. Her form was symmetry itself; every elegance breathed in her air; and all the graces waited on her motions.—It was music when she spoke, but when she spoke encouragement, it was little less than rapture. How my heart danced to those charming accents!—And can that which some weeks ago was to admiration lovely, be now so insufferably loathsome!—Where are those blushing cheeks: where the coral lips; where that ivory neck, on which the curling jet in such glossy ringlets flowed; with a thousand other beauties of person, and ten thousand delicacies of action?—Amazing alteration! delusory bliss!—Fondly I gazed upon the glittering meteor; it shone brightly, and I mistook it for a star, for a permanent and substantial good.—But how is it fallen! fallen from an orb not its own! and all that I can trace on earth, is but a putrid mass."

Lie, poor Florello, lie deep as thou dost in obscure darkness. Let night with her impenetrable shades, always conceal thee. May no prying eye be witness to thy disgrace; but let thy surviving sisters think upon thy state, when they contemplate the idol in the glass. When the pleasing images rise gracefully to view, surrounded with a world of charms: and flushed with joy at the consciousness of them all;—then, in some minutes of temptation and danger, when vanity uses to steal into the thoughts;—then let them remember what a veil of horror is drawn over a face, which was once beautiful and brilliant as theirs. Such a seasonable reflection might regulate the labours of the toilet, and create a more earnest solicitude to polish the jewel, than to varnish the casket. It might then become their highest ambition, to have the mind decked with divine virtues, and dressed after the amiable pattern of their Redeemer's holiness.

And would this prejudice their persons, or depreciate their charms?—Quite the reverse: it would spread a sort of heavenly glory over the finest set of features, and heighten the loveliness of every other engaging accomplishment.—And what is yet a more inviting consideration, these flowers would not wither with nature, nor be tarnished by time: but would open continually into richer beauties, and flourish even in the winter of age.—But the most incomparable recommendation of these noble qualities is, that from their hallowed relics as from the fragrant ashes of the phoenix, will ere long arise an illustrious form, bright as the wings of angels, lasting as the light of the new Jerusalem.

For my part, the remembrance of this sad revolution shall make me ashamed to pay my devotion to a shrine of perishing flesh, and afraid to expect all my happiness from so brittle a joy. It shall teach me, not to think too highly of well proportioned clay, though formed in the most elegant mould, and animated with the sweetest soul. 'Tis heaven's last, best, and crowning gift, to be received with gratitude, and cherished with love, as a most valuable blessing; not worshipped with the incense of flattery, and strains of fulsome adoration, as a goddess.—It will cure, I trust, the dotage of my eyes: and incline me always to prefer the substantial "ornaments of a meek and virtuous spirit," before the transient decorations of white and red on the skin.

Here I called in my roving meditations from their long excursion on this tender subject. Fancy listened a while to the soliloquy of a lover; now judgment resumes the reins, and guides my thoughts to more near and self-interesting inquiries.—However, upon a review of the whole scene, crowded with spectacles of mortality and trophies of death, I could not forbear smiting my breast, and fetching a sigh, and lamenting over the noblest of all visible beings, lying in ruins under the feet of "the pale horse, and his rider." (Rev. vi. 8.) I could not forbear that pathetic exclamation, "O! thou Adam, what hast thou done!" (2 Esdr. vii. 41.) What desolation has thy disobedience wrought in the earth! See the malignity, the ruinous malignity, of sin! Sin has demolished so many stately structures of flesh; sin has made such havoc among the most excellent ranks of God's lower creation; and sin (that deadly bane of our nation) would have plunged our better part into the execrable horrors of the nethermost hell, had not our merciful Mediator interposed, and given himself for our ransom.—Therefore, what grateful acknowledgments does the whole world of penitent sinners owe; what ardent returns of love will a whole heaven of glorified believers pay to such a friend, benefactor and deliverer!

Musing upon these melancholy objects, a faithful remembrancer suggests from within—"Must this sad change succeed in me also? Am I to draw my last gasp, to become a breathless corpse, and to be what I deplore?" Is there a time approaching, when this body shall be carried out upon the bier, and consigned to its clay-cold bed? while some kind acquaintance, perhaps, may drop one parting tear; and cry, alas! my brother, —Is the time approaching?"—Nothing is more certain. A decree, much surer than the law of the Medes and Persians, has irrevocably determined the doom.

Should one of these ghastly figures burst from his confinement, and start up in frightful deformity before me;—should the haggard skeleton lift a clattering hand, and point it full in my view;—should it open the stiffened jaws, and with a hoarse tremendous murmur, break this profound silence;—should it accost me, as Samuel's apparition addressed the trembling king.— "The Lord shall deliver thee also into the hands of death; yet a little while, and thou shalt be with me."†—The solemn warning, delivered in so striking a manner: must strongly impress my imagination; a message in thunder would scarce sink deeper. Yet there is abundantly greater reason to be alarmed by that express declaration of the Lord God Almighty, "Thou shalt surely die."—Well then, since sentence is passed, since I am a condemned man, and know not when the dead warrant may arrive let me die to sin, and die to the world, before I die beneath the stroke of a righteous God. Let me employ the little uncertain interval of respite from execution, in preparing for a happier state and a better life! that, when the fatal moment comes, and I am commanded to shut my eyes upon all things here below, I may open them again, to see my Saviour in the mansions above.

† 1 Sam. xxxviii. 19. On this place, the Dutch translator of the Meditations has added a note; to correct, very probably, what he supposes a mistake. On the same supposition, I presume, the compilers of our rubric, ordered the last verse of Ecclus. xvi. to be omitted, in the daily service of the church. But that the sentiment hinted above, is strictly true; that it was Samuel himself (not an infernal spirit, personating the prophet) who appeared to the female necromancer at Endor: appeared not in compliance with any diabolical incantation, but in pursuance of the divine commission; this, I think, is fully proved in the Historical Account of the life of David, Vol. I. chap. 23.

Since this body, which is so fearfully and wonderfully made, must fall to pieces in the grave; since I must soon resign all my bodily powers to darkness, inactivity and corruption: let it be my constant care to use them well, while I possess them!—Let my hands be stretched forth to relieve the needy, and always be “more ready to give than to receive.”—Let my knees bend in deepest humiliation before the throne of grace; while my eyes are cast down to the earth in penitential confusion, or devoutly looking up to heaven for pardoning mercy!—In every friendly interview, let the “law of kindness dwell on my lips;” or rather if the seriousness of my acquaintance permits, let the gospel of peace flow from my tongue. O! that I might be enabled in every public concourse, to lift up my voice like a trumpet; and pour abroad a more joyful sound than its most melodious accents, in proclaiming the glad tidings of free salvation!—Be shut, my ears, resolutely shut, against the malevolent whispers of slander and the contagious breath of filthy talking; but be swift to hear the instructions of wisdom, be all attention when your Redeemer speaks; imbibe the precious truths, and convey them carefully to the heart.—Carry me, my feet, to the temple of the Lord; to the beds of the sick, and houses of the poor. May all my members, devoted entirely to my divine Master, be the willing instruments of promoting his glory.

Then, ye embalmers, you may spare your pains; these works of faith and labours of love; these shall be my spices and perfumes. Enwrapped in these, I would lay me gently down, and sleep sweetly in the blessed Jesus; hoping that God will “give commandment concerning my bones;” and one day fetch them up from the dust, as silver from the furnace purified,—“I say not seven times, but seventy times seven.”

Here my contemplation took wing; and, in an instant alighted in the garden adjoining to Mount Calvary. Having viewed the abode of my deceased fellow-creatures, methought I longed to see the place where our Lord lay. And, oh what a marvellous spectacle was once exhibited in this memorable sepulchre! He* “who clothes himself with light, as with a garment; and walks upon the wings of the wind;”† He was pleased to wear the habiliments of mortalities, and dwelt among the prostrate dead.—Who can repeat the wondrous truth too often? Who can dwell upon the transporting theme too long? He who sits enthroned in glory, and diffuses bliss among all the heavenly hosts, was once a pale and bloody corpse, and pressed this little spot.

O death! how great was thy triumph in that hour! Never did thy gloomy realms contain such a prisoner before.—Prisoner, did I say? No; he was more than conqueror. He arose far more mightily than Samson, from a transient slumber, broke down the gates, and demolished the strongholds of those dark dominions.—And this, O mortals, this is our only consolation and security. Jesus has trod the dreadful path, and smoothed it for our passage.—Jesus sleeping in the chambers of the tomb, has brightened the dismal mansion, and left an inviting odour in those beds of dust. The dying Jesus (never let the comfortable truth depart from your minds) is your sure protection, your unquestionable passport through the territories of the grave. Believe in him, and they shall prove a “highway to Sion;” shall transmit you safe to paradise. Believe in him; and you shall be no losers, but unspeakable gainers, by your dissolution. For hear what the oracle of heaven says upon this important point, Whoso believeth in me, shall never die.” (John xi. 26.)—What sublime and emphatical language is this! Thus much, at least, it must import;—“The nature of that last change shall be surprisingly altered for the better. It shall no longer be inflicted, as a punishment; but rather be vouchsafed as a blessing. To such persons, it shall come attended with such a train of benefits, as will render it a kind of happy inpropriety, to call it dying. Dying! No; ’tis then they truly begin to live. Their exit is the end of their frailty, and their entrance upon perfection. Their last groan is the prelude to life and immortality.”

O ye timorous souls, that are terrified at the sound of the passing-bell; that turn pale walketh in the circuit of heaven, to express the immensity of his presence, Job xxii. 13.—He walketh upon the wings of the wind, to signify the amazing swiftness of his operation, Psal. civ. 3.—In which last phrase, there is, I think, an elegance and emphasis, not taken notice of by our commentators, and yet unequalled in any writer.—Not he dieth; he runneth; but he walketh; and that on the very wings of the wind; one of the most impetuous elements, roused into its utmost rage, and sweeping along with inconceivable rapidity. A tumult in nature, not to be described, is the composed and sedate work of the Deity. A speed not to be measured, is (with reverence I use the expression, and to comport with our low methods of conception) the solemn and majestic foot-pace of Jehovah.—How fiat are the following lines, even in the great master of lyric song.

† The sacred scriptures, speaking of the supreme Being, say—He walketh upon the waves of the sea, to denote his uncatchable power, Job. ix. 8.—He at the sight of an opened grave; and can scarce behold a coffin, or a skull, without a shuddering horror; ye that are in bondage to the grisly tyrant, and tremble at the shaking of his iron rod; cry mightily to the Father of your spirits, for faith in his dear Son. Faith will free you from your slavery.* Faith will embolden you to tread on (this fiercest of) serpents, (Luke x. 19.) Old Simon, clasping the child Jesus in the arms of his flesh, and the glorious Mediator in the arms of his faith, departs with tranquillity and peace. That bitter persecutor Saul, having won Christ, being found in Christ, longs to be dismissed from cumbrous clay, and kindles into rapture at the prospect of dissolution, (Phil. i. 23. 2 Tim. iv. 7, 8.) Methinks I see another of Immanuel's followers, trusting in his Saviour, leaning on his Beloved, go down to the silent shades with composure and alacrity, (2 Pet. i. 14.) In this powerful name, an innumerable company of sinful creatures have set up their banners; and "overcome through the blood of the Lamb." Authorized by the Captain of thy salvation, thou also mayest set thy feet upon the neck of this king of terrors. Furnished with this antidote, thou also mayest play around the hole of the asp, and put thy undaunted hand on this cockatrice den, (Isa. xi. 8.) Thou mayest feel the viper fastening to thy mortal part, and fear no evil: Thou shalt one day shake it off by a joyful resurrection, and suffer no harm, (Acts xxviii. 35.)

Resurrection! that cheering word eases my mind of an anxious thought, and solves a most momentous question. I was going to ask, "Wherefore do all these corpses lie here, in this abject condition? Is this their final state? Has death conquered? and will the tyrant hold captivity captive? How long wilt thou forget them, O Lord? For ever?"—No, saith the voice from heaven, the word of divine revelation: The righteous are all "prisoners of hope;" (Zech. ix. 12.) There is an hour (an awful secret that, and known only to all-foreseeing wisdom) an appointed hour there is, when an act of grace will pass the great seal above, and give them an universal discharge, a general delivery from the abodes of corruption. Then shall the Lord Jesus descend from heaven, with the shout of the archangel, and the trump of God. Destruction itself shall hear his call, and the obedient grave give up her dead. In a moment, in the twinkling of an eye, they shake off the sleep of ten thousand years, and spring forth, like the bounding roe, "to meet their Lord in the air."

Believe, and look with triumph on the tomb.

These and some other quotations I am proud to borrow from the Night Thoughts, especially from Night the Fourth; in which energy of language, sublimity of sentiment, and the most exquisite beauties of poetry are the least perfections to be admired. Almost every line glows with devotion, rises into the most exalted apprehensions of the adorable Redeemer, and is animated with the most lively faith in his all-sufficient mediation. The author of this excellent performance has the peculiar felicity of embodying all the strength of style, and every delicacy of imagination, with the grand and momentous truths of Christianity. These thoughts give the highest entertainment to the Fancy, and impart the noblest improvement to the mind; they not only refine our taste, but prepare us for death, and ripen us for glory. I never take up this admirable piece, but I am ready to cry out,—"Tantum vivere ament, tectum abeant hincis, &c." "Inspire me with such a spirit, and life shall be delightful, nor death its funeral doom."

And, O! with what cordial congratulations, what transporting endearments, do the soul and body, those affectionate companions, re-unite! But with how much greater demonstrations of kindness, are they both received by their compassionate Redeemer! The Ancient of days, who comes in the clouds of heaven, is their friend, their father, their bridegroom. He comes with irresistible power, and infinite glory. But they have nothing to fear from his majestic appearance. Those tremendous solemnities, which spread desolation and astonishment through the universe, serve only to inflame their love, and lighten their hopes. The Judge, the awful Judge, amidst all his magnificence and splendour, vouchsafes to confess their names, vouchsafes to commemorate their fidelity, before all the inhabitants of the skies, and the whole assembled world.

Hark! the thunders are hushed. See! the lightnings cease their rage, the angelic armies stand in silent suspense; the whole race of Adam is wrapt in pleasing or anxious expectation.—And now that adorable person, whose favour is better than life, whose acceptance is a crown of glory, lifts up the light of his countenance upon the righteous. He speaks; and what ravishing words proceed from his gracious lips! What ecstasies of delight they enkindle in the breasts of the faithful! "I accept you, O my people! Ye are they that believed in my name. Ye are they that renounced yourselves, and are complete in me. I see no spot or blemish in you: for ye are washed in my blood, and clothed with my righteousness. Renewed by my Spirit, ye have glorified me on earth, and have been faithful unto death. Come, then, ye servants of holiness, enter into the joy of your Lord. Come, ye children of light, ye blessed of my Father, receive the kingdom that shall never be removed; wear the crown which fadeth not away, and enjoy pleasures for evermore!"

Then it will be one of the smallest privileges of the righteous, that they shall languish no more; that sickness will never again show her pale countenance in their dwellings.* Death itself, will be "swallowed up in victory." That fatal javelin which has drunk the blood of monarchs, and finds its way to the hearts of all the sons of Adam, shall be utterly broken. That enormous scythe, which has struck empires from their root, and swept ages and generations into oblivion, shall lie by in perpetual uselessness. Sin also which filled thy quiver, thou insatiate archer!—sin, which strung thy arm with resistless vigour, which pointed all thy shafts with inevitable destruction—sin, will then be done away. Whatever is frail or depraved, will be thrown off with our grave-clothes. All to come is perfect holiness, and consummate happiness; the term of whose continuance is eternity.

O Eternity! eternity! how are our nobles, our boldest, our strongest thoughts lost and overwhelmed in thee! Who can set landmarks to limit thy dimensions, or find plumbets to fathom thy depths! Arithmeticians have figures to compute all the progressions of time; Astronomers have instruments to calculate the distances of the planets; but what numbers can state, what lines can gauge, the lengths and depths of eternity? "It is higher than heaven; what canst thou do? deeper than hell; what canst thou know? The measure thereof is longer than the earth, broader than the sea." (Job xi. 8, 9.)

Mysterious, mighty existence! A sum not be lessened by the largest deductions; an extent not to be contracted by all possible diminutions! None can truly say, after the most prodigious waste of ages, "So much of eternity is gone." For when millions of centuries are elapsed, it is but just commencing; and when millions more have run their ample round, it will be no nearer ending. Yea, when ages, numerous as the bloom of spring increased by the herbage of summer, both augmented by the leaves of autumn, and all multiplied by the drops of rain, which drown the winter—when these, and ten thousand times ten thousand more—more than can be represented by any similitude, or imagined by any conception;—when all these are revolved and finished, eternity, vast, boundless, amazing eternity, will only be beginning.

What a pleasing, yet awful thought is this! full of delight, and full of dread. O may it alarm our fears, quicken our hopes, and animate all our endeavours! Since we are soon to launch into this endless and inconceivable state, let us give all diligence to secure our entrance into bliss.—Now let us give all diligence, because there is no alteration in the scenes of futurity. The wheel never turns; all is steadfast and immovable beyond the grave. Whether we are then seated on the throne, or stretched on the rack, a seal will be set to our condition, by the hand of everlasting mercy, or inflexible justice.—The saints always rejoice amid the smiles of heaven; their harps are perpetually tuned; their triumphs admit of no interruption.—The ruin of the wicked is irremediable. The fatal sentence, once passed, is never to be repealed. No hope of exchanging their doleful habitations. But all things bear the same dismal aspect for ever and ever.

* Isaiah, speaking of the new Jerusalem, mentions this as one of its impunities, The inhabitants thereof shall no more say, I am sick. Another clause in its royal charter runs thus, God shall wipe away all tears from their eyes; and there shall be no more death, neither sorrow nor crying; neither shall there be any more pain. Isa. xxxiii. 24. Rev. xxi. 4.

The wicked—My mind recoils at the apprehension of their misery.* It has studiously waved the fearful subject, and seems unwilling to pursue it even now.—But, 'tis better to reflect upon it for a few minutes, than to endure to eternal ages. Perhaps, the consideration of their aggravated misery may be profitably terrible; may teach me more highly to prize the Saviour, who, "delivers from going down to the bottomless pit;" may drive me, like the avenger's sword, to this only city of refuge for obnoxious sinners.

The wicked seem to lie here, like malefactors in a deep and strong dungeon, reserved against the day of trial.—"Their departure was without peace." Clouds of horror sat lowering upon their closing eyelids, most sadly foreboding "the blackness of darkness for ever." When the last sickness seized their frame, and the inevitable change advanced; when they saw the fatal arrows fitting to their strings; saw the deadly archer aiming at their heart; and felt the envenomed shaft fastened in their vitals.—Good God! what fearfulness came upon them! what horrible dread overwhelmed them. How did they stand shuddering and agast upon the tremendous precipice? excessively afraid to plunge into the abyss of eternity, yet utterly unable to maintain their standing on the verge of life.

O! what pale reviews, what startling prospects conspire to augment their sorrows! They look backward, and behold, a most melancholy scene! Sins unrepented of, mercy slighted, and the day of grace ending.—They look forward, and nothing presents itself but the righteous Judge, the dreadful tribunal, and a most solemn reckoning.—They roll around their affrighted eyes on attending friends.—If accomplices in debauchery, it sharpens their anguish, to consider this further aggravation of their guilt, that they have not sinned alone, but drawn others into the snare. If religious acquaintances, it strikes a fresh gash into their hearts to think of never seeing them any more, but only at an unapproachable distance separated by the impassable gulf.

At last, perhaps, they begin to pray. Finding no other possible way of relief, they are constrained to apply unto the Almighty; with trembling lips and a faltering tongue, they cry unto that sovereign Being, "who kills and makes alive."—But why have they deferred, so long deferred, their addresses to God? Why have they despised all his counsels, and stood incorrigible under his incessant reproofs? How often have they been forewarned of these terrors, and most importunately entreated to seek the Lord, while he might be found?—I wish they may obtain mercy at the eleventh, at the last hour. I wish that they may be snatched from the jaws, the opened, the gaping, the almost closing jaws of damnation. But, alas! who can tell, whether affronted Majesty will lend an ear to their complaint? whether the holy One will work a miracle of grace in behalf of such transgressors? He may, for aught any mortal knows, "laugh at their calamity, and mock when their fear cometh."

Thus they lie, groaning out the poor remains of life; their limbs bathed in sweat; their hearts struggling with convulsive throes; pains insupportable throbbing through every pulse; and innumerable darts of agony transfixing their conscience.

In that dread moment how the frantic soul
Raves round the walls of her clay tenement;
Runs to each avenue; and shrieks for help;
But shrieks in vain! how wishfully she looks
On all she's leaving, now no longer hers!
A little longer, yet a little longer,
O! might she stay, to wash away her crimes,
And fit her for her passage! Mournful sight!
Her very eyes weep blood; and every groan
She heaves, is big with horror; but the foe,
Like a staunch murderer steady to his purpose,
Pursues her close through every lane of life,
Nor misses once the track, but presses on;
Till forc'd at last to the tremendous verge,
At once she sinks.*

If this be the end of the ungodly, "My soul, come not thou into their secret! Unto their assembly, mine honour, be thou not united!"—How awfully accomplished is that prediction of inspired wisdom! "Sin, though seemingly sweet in the commission, yet at last it biteth like a serpent, and stingeth like an adder."

Happy dissolution; were this the period of their woes. But, alas! all these tribulations are only the "beginning of sorrows;" a small drop only from that cup of trembling, which is mingled for their future portion.—No sooner has the last pang dislodged their reluctant souls but they are hurried into the presence of an injured angry God; not under the conducting care of beneficent angels, but exposed to the insults of accursed spirits, who lately tempted them, now upbraid them; and will for ever torment them.—Who can imagine their confusion and distress, when they stand, guilty and inexcusable, before their incensed Creator? They are received with frowns: "The God that made them, has no mercy on them." (Isa. xxvii. 11.) The Prince of peace rejects them with abhorrence. He consigns them over to chains of darkness, and receptacles of despair, against the severer doom, and more public infamy, of the great day. Then all the vials of wrath will be emptied upon these wretched creatures. The law they have violated, and the gospel they have slighted; the power they have defied, and the goodness they have abused; will all get themselves honey in their exemplary destruction. Then God, the God to whom vengeance belongeth, will draw the arrow to the very head, and set them as the mark of his inexorable displeasure.

Resurrection will be no privilege to them; but immortality itself their everlasting curse.—Would they not bless the grave, "that land where all things are forgotten;" and wish to lie eternally hid in its deepest gloom? But the dust refuses to conceal their persons, or to draw a veil over their practices. They must also awake; must arise; must appear at the bar; and meet the Judge: a judge before whom "the pillars of heaven tremble, and the earth melts away;" a Judge once long-suffering and very compassionate, but now unalterably determined to teach stubborn offenders,—what it is to provoke the Omnipotent God-head; what it is to trample upon the blood of his Son, and offer despite to all the gracious overtures of his Spirit.

O! the perplexity! the distraction! that must seize the impenitent rebels, when they are summoned to the great tribunal! What will they do in this day of severe visitation! this day of final decision.—Where? how? whence can they find help?—To which of the saints will they turn? whether betake themselves for shelter or for succour? Alas! it is all in vain; it is all too late.—Friends and acquaintances know them no more; men and angels abandon them to their approaching doom; even the Mediator, the Mediator himself deserts them in this dreadful hour.—To fly, it will be impracticable: to justify themselves, still more impossible; and now to make any supplications, utterly unavailable.

Behold! the books are opened! the secrets of all hearts are disclosed! the hidden things of darkness are brought to light! How empty, how ineffectual now, are all those refined artifices, with which hypocrites imposed upon their fellow creatures, and preserved a character in the sight of men!—the jealous God, who has been about their path, and about their bed, and espied out all their ways, “sets before them the things that they have done.” They cannot answer him one in a thousand, nor stand in the awful judgment. The heavens reveal their iniquities, and the earth rises up against them. (Joh xx. 27.) They are speechless with guilt, and stigmatized with infamy before all the armies of the sky, and all the nations of the redeemed.—What a favour would they esteem it, to hide their ashamed heads in the bottom of the ocean, or even to be buried beneath the ruins of the tottering world!

If the contempt poured upon them be thus insupportable, how will their hearts endure, when the sword of infinite indignation is unsheathed, and fiercely waved around their defenceless heads, or pointed directly at their naked breasts! How must the wretches scream with wild amazement, and rend the very heavens with their cries, when the right aiming thunderbolts go abroad! go abroad with a dreadful commission, to drive them from the kingdom of glory; and plunge them—not into the sorrows of a moment, or the tortures of an hour, but into all the restless agonies of unquenchable fire, and everlasting despair.*

Misery of miseries! too shocking for reflection to dwell upon. But if so dismal to foresee, and that at a distance, together with some comfortable expectation of escaping it.—O! how bitter, inconceivably bitter, to bear without any intermission, or any mitigation, through hopeless and eternal ages!

Who has any bowels of pity? Who has any sentiments of compassion? Who has any tender concern for his fellow creatures? Who? in God's name, and for Christ's sake, let him show it by warning every man, and beseeching every man, to seek the Lord while he may be found; to throw down the arms of rebellion, before the act of indemnity expires; submissively to adore the Lamb, while he holds out the golden sceptre.—Here let us act the friendly part to mankind; here let the whole force of our benevolence exert itself: in exhorting relations, acquaintance, neighbours, whomsoever we may probably influence, to take the wings of faith unfledged, or repentance un-delayed, and flee away from this wrath to come.

Upon the whole, what stupendous discoveries are these! Lay them up in a faithful remembrance, O my soul. Recollect them with the most serious attention, when thou liest down, and when thou risest up. When thou walkest; receive them for thy companions; when thou talkest, listen to them as thy prompters; and whatever thou dost, consult them as thy directors.—Influenced by these considerations, thy views will be greaten, thy affections be exalted, and thou thyself raised above the tantalizing power of perishing things. Duly mindful of these, it will be the sum of thy desires, and the scope of thy endeavours, to gain the approbation of that sovereign Being, who will then fill the throne, and pronounce the decisive sentence. Thou wilt see nothing worth a wish, in comparison of having his will for thy rule; his glory for thy aim; and his Holy Spirit for thy ever actuating principal.

Wonder, O man; be lost in admiration, at those prodigious events, which are coming upon the universe; events, the greatness of which nothing finite can measure; such as will cause whatever is considerable or momentous in the annals of all generations, to sink into littleness or nothing. Events (Jesus prepare us for their approach! defend us, when they take place!) big with the everlasting fates of all the living and all the dead*.—I must see the graves cleaving, the sea teeming, and swarms unsuspected, crowds unnumbered, yea, multitudes of thronging nations, rising from both.—I must see the world in flames, must stand at the dissolution of all terrestrial things: and be an attendant on the burial of nature. I must see the vast expanse of the sky wrapt up like a scroll; and the incarnate God issuing forth from light inaccessible, with ten thousand times ten thousand angels, to judge both men and devils.—I must see the curtain of time drop; see all eternity disclosed to view, and enter upon a state of being, that will never, never have an end!

And ought I not (let the vainest imagination determine; ought I not) to try the sincerity of my faith, and take heed to my ways? Is there an inquiry, is there a care, of greater, of equal, of comparable importance?—Is not this an infinitely pressing call, to see that my loins are girded about, my lamp trimmed, and myself dressed for the Bridegroom's appearance: that, washed in the fountain opened in my Saviour's side, and clad with the marriage-garment, wove by his obedience, I may be found, in peace, unblameable, and unproveable.— Otherwise, how shall I stand with holdness, when the stars of heaven fall from their orbs? how shall I come forth erect and courageous, when the earth itself reels to and fro like a drunkard? (Isa. xxiv. 20.) how shall I look up with joy and see my salvation drawing nigh, when the hearts of millions and millions fail for fear.

Now, Madam, lest my meditations set in a cloud, and leave any unpleasing gloom upon your mind; let me once more turn to the brightening prospects of the righteous. A view of them and their delightful expectations, may serve to exhilarate the thoughts which have been musing upon melancholy subjects, and hovering about the edges of infernal darkness! just as a spacious field, arrayed in cheerful green, relieves and reinvigorates the eye which has fatigued itself by poring upon some minute, or gazing upon some glaring object.

The righteous seem to lie by in the bosom of the earth, as a wary pilot in some well sheltered creek, till all the storms, which infest this lower world, are blown over. Here they enjoy safe anchorage, are in no danger of foundering, amidst the waves of prevailing iniquity, or of being shipwrecked on the rocks of any powerful temptation. But ere long we shall behold them hoisting their flag of hope; riding before a sweet gale of atoning merit, and redeeming love; till they make with all the sails of an assured faith, the blessed port of eternal life.

Then may the honoured friend to whom I am writing, rich in good works, rich in heavenly tempers, but inexpressibly richer in her Saviour's righteousness.—Oh! may she enter the harbour, like a gallant stately vessel, returned successful and victorious from some grand expedition, with acclamations, honour and joy! while my little bark, attendant on the solemnity, and a partaker of the triumph, glides humbly after; and both rest together in the haven,—the wished-for blissful haven, of perfect security, and everlasting repose.

REFLECTIONS

ON A

FLOWER-GARDEN,

IN A

LETTER TO A LADY.

MADAM,

SOME time ago, my meditations took a turn among the Tombs; they visited the awful and melancholy mansions of the dead;* and you was pleased to favour them with your attention.—May I now beg the honour of your company, in a more inviting and delightful excursion, in a beautiful Flower-Garden, where I lately walked, and at once regaled the sense, and indulged the fancy?

* "Discourses on the vanity of the creature which represent the barrenness of every thing in this world, and its incapacity of producing any solid or substantial happiness, are useful.—Those speculations also which show the bright side of things, and lay forth those innocent entertainments, which are to be met with among the several objects that encompass us, are no less beneficial," Spect. vol. v. No. 323. Upon the plan of these observations, the preceding and following reflections are formed.

It was early in a summer-morning, when the air was cool, the earth moist, the whole face of the creation fresh and gay. The noisy world was scarce awake. Business had not quite shook off his sound sleep; and riot had but just reclined his giddy head. All was serene, all was still, every thing tended to inspire tranquillity of mind, and invite to serious thought.

Only the wakeful lark had left her nest, and was mounting on high, to salute the opening day. Elevated in the air, she seemed to call the laborious husbandman to his toil, and all her fellow songsters to their notes.—Earliest of birds, said I, companion of the dawn, may I always rise at thy voice! rise to offer the matin-song, and adore that beneficent Being, "who maketh the outgoings of the morning and evening to rejoice."

How charming to rove abroad at this sweet hour of prime! to enjoy the calm of nature, to tread the dewy lawns, and taste the unripled freshness of the air!

The greyness of the dawn decays gradually. Abundance of ruddy streaks tinges the fleeces of the firmament; till at length the dappled aspect of the east is lost in one ardent and boundless blush.—Is it the surmise of imagination, or do the skies really redden with shame to see so many supinely stretched on their drowsy pillows? Shall man be lost in luxurious ease? Shall man waste these precious hours in idle slumbers! while the vigorous sun is up, and going on his Maker's errand? while all the feathered choir are hymning their Creator, and paying their homage in harmony?—No. Let him heighten the melody of the tuneful tribes, by adding the rational strains of devotion. Let him improve the fragrant oblations of nature, by mingling with the rising odours the more refined breath of praise.

It is natural for man to look upward,‡ to throw his first glance upon the objects that are above him.

illimitable tracts of air, and sea, and firmament! which pardons crimes of the most enormous size, and the most horrid aggravations: pardons them in consideration of the Redeemer's atonement, with perfect freeness and the utmost readiness! more readily, if it were possible, than this all-surrounding expanse admits, within its circuit, a ridge of mountains, or even a grain of sand.

Come hither, then, ye awakened trembling sinners. Come* weary and heavy laden with a sense of your iniquities. Condemn yourselves. Renounce all reliance on any thing of your own. Let your trust be in the tender mercy of God, for ever and ever.

In them hath he set a tabernacle for the sun, (Psal. xix. 4.) Behold him coming forth from the chambers of the east. See! the clouds, like floating curtains, are thrown back at his approach. With what refulgent majesty does he walk abroad! How transcendently bright is his countenance, shedding day and inexhaustible light through the universe! Is there a scene, though finished by the most elaborate and costly refinements of art, "comparable to these illustrious solemnities of opening sunshine? Before these all the studied pageantry of the theatre, the glittering economy of an assembly, or even the heightened ornaments of a royal palace, hide their diminished heads, and shrink into nothing."—I have read of a person so struck with the splendours of this noble luminary, that he imagined himself made on purpose to contemplate its glories. O! that Christians would adopt this persuasion, and transfer it to the Sun of Righteousness! Thus applied, it would cease to be a chimerical notion, and become a most important truth. For sure I am, it is the supreme happiness of the eternal state. And therefore may well be the ruling concern of this present life, to know the only true God, and Jesus Christ whom he hath sent.

* The lines which follow are admirably descriptive of the spirit and practice hinted above. In them desire pants; prayer wrestles; and faith, as it were, grasps the prize:—I take leave to transplant them into this place; and I could wish them a better, a more conspicuous situation than even their own or their native soil. Their native soil is no other than the lamentations of a sinner, written by Mr. Sternhold. Notwithstanding the unpromising genius of the performance, I think we may challenge the greatest masters to produce any thing more spirited and importunate; more full of nature, or more flushed with life.

Mercy, good LORD, mercy I crave;

This is the total sum;

For mercy, LORD, is all my suit;

LORD, let thy mercy come.

The short sentences;—not a single copulative;—the frequent repetition of the Divine name;—the almost incessant reiteration of the blessing, so passionately desired, and inexpressibly needed;—This is the genuine language of ardour; these are beauties obvious to every eye, and cannot fail either to please the judicious taste, or to edify the gracious heart.

—Nor do I stand alone in this opinion. The very best judge of whatever is valuable in science, or perfective of our nature; a judge who formed his taste on the maxims of paradise, and received the finishings of his education in the third heavens; this judge determines to know nothing but Jesus Christ, and him crucified. He possessed, in his own person, the finest, the most admired accomplishments; yet pronounces them no better than dung, in comparison of the super-eminent excellency of this saving knowledge. (Phil. iii. 8.)

Metinks I discern a thousand admirable properties in the sun. It is certainly the best material emblem of the Creator. There is more of God in its lustre, energy, and usefulness, than in any other visible being. To worship it as a deity was the least inexcusable of all the heathen idolatries. One scarce can wonder, that fallen reason should mistake so fair a copy for the adorable original. No comparison in the whole book of sacred wisdom, pleases me more than that which resembles the blessed Jesus, to yonder regent of the day;* who now advances on his azure road, to scatter light and dispense gladness through the nations.

What were all the realms of the world, but a dungeon of darkness, without the beams of the sun? All their fine scenes, hid from our view, lost in obscurity.—In vain we roll around our eyes in the midnight gloom. In vain we strive to behold the features of amiable nature. Turn whither we will, no form or comeliness appears. All seems a dreary waste, an undistinguished chaos, till the returning hours have unbarred the gates of light, and let forth the morn. Then what a prospect opens! the heavens are paved with azure, and strewed with roses. A variety of the liveliest verdures array the plain. The flowers put on a glow of the richest colours. The whole creation stands forth, dressed in all the charms of beauty. The ravished eye looks round, and wonders.

And what had been the condition of our intellectual nature, without the great Redeemer, and his divine revelation?—Alas! what absurd and unworthy apprehensions did the Pagan sages form of God! What idle dreams, what childish conjectures, were their doctrines of a future state!—How did the bulk even of that favoured nation, the Jews, weary themselves in very vanity, to obtain peace and reconciliation with their offended Jehovah! till Jesus arose upon our benighted minds, and brought life and immortality to light: till He arose, to enlighten the wretched Gentiles, and to be the glory of his people Israel.

Now, we no longer cry out with a restless impatience, Where is God my Maker? for we are allowed to contemplate the brightness of his glory, and the express image of his person, in the face of Jesus Christ. Now, we no longer inquire, with an unsatisfied solicitude, “which is the way to bliss?” because Jesus has marked the path, by his shining example; and left us an unerring clue in his holy word.—Now, we have no more reason to proceed with misgiving hearts in our journey to eternity, or to ask anxiously as we go, “Who will roll away the stone, and open the everlasting doors? Who will remove the flaming sword, and give us admission into the delights of paradise?” For it is done, all done by the Captain of our salvation. Sin he has expiated, by the unblemished sacrifice of himself. The law he has fulfilled, by his perfect obedience. The sinner he transforms, by his sanctifying spirit.—In a word, he hath both presented us with a clear discovery of good things to come; and administered to us an abundant entrance into the final enjoyment of them.

Whenever, therefore, we bless God for the circling seasons, and revolving day, let us adore—thankfully adore—him, for the more precious appearance of the Sun of Righteousness, and his glorious gospel. Without which, we should have been groping even to this hour, in spiritual darkness, and the shadow of death; without which we must have wandered in a maze of inextricable uncertainties; and have “stumbled upon the dark mountains” of error, till we fell into the bottomless pit of perdition.

Without that grand enlivening principle, what were this earth, but a lifeless mass? a rude lump of inactive matter? The trees could never break forth into leaves, nor the plants spring up into flowers. We should no more behold the meadows mantled over with green, nor the vallies standing thick with corn. Or, to speak in the beautiful language of a prophet, (Hab. iii. 17.) “No longer would the fig-tree blossom, nor fruit be in the vine: The labour of the olive would fail, and the fields could yield no meat: The flocks must be cut off from the fold, and there would be no herd in the stalls.—The sun darts its beams among all the vegetable tribes, and paints the spring, and enriches the autumn. This pierces to the roots of the vineyard and the orchard; and sets aloft these fermenting juices, which, at length, burst into floods of wine, or bend the boughs with a mellow load.—Nor are its favours confined to the upper regions, but distributed into the deepest recesses of creation. It penetrates the beds of metal, and finds its way to the place of sapphires. It tinctures the seeds of gold that are ripening into ore; and throws a brilliancy into the water of the diamond, that is hardening on its rocks. In short, the beneficial agency of this magnificent luminary is inexpressible. It beautifies and impregnates universal nature. "There is nothing hid from the heat thereof."

Just in the same manner were the rational world dead in trespasses and sins, without the reviving energy of Jesus Christ. He is "the resurrection and the life:" the overflowing fountain of the one, and the all-powerful cause of the other. The second Adam is a quickening spirit, and all his saints live through him. He shines upon their affections, and they shoot forth into heavenly graces, and abound in the fruits of righteousness. Faith unfeigned, and love undisssembled, those noblest productions of the renewed nature, are the effect of his operation on the mind. Not so much as one divine disposition could spread itself, not one Christian habit unfold and flourish, without the kindly influences of his grace.

As there is no fruitfulness, so likewise no cheerfulness, without the sun.*—When that auspicious sovereign of the day diffuses the mildness of his morning-splendour, he creates an universal festival. Millions of glittering insects awake into existence and bask in his rays. The birds start from their slumbers, and pour their delighted souls in harmony. The flocks, with bleating accents hail the welcome blessing. The herds, in lowing murmurs, express their hoarser acclamations. The valleys ring with rural music; the hills echo back the artless strains. All that is vocal, joins in the general choir; all that has breath, exults in the cheering influence:—Whereas, was that radiant orb extinguished, a tremendous gloom would ensue, and horror insupportable. Nay, let it only be eclipsed for a few minutes, and all nature assumes an air of sadness. The heavens put on a kind of mourning. The most sprightly animals hang down their dejected heads. The songsters of the grove are struck dumb. Howling beasts roam abroad for prey; ominous birds come forth and screech; the heart of man fails, or a sudden pang seizes the foreboding mind.—So, when Christ hides away his face, when faith loses sight of that consolation of Israel! how gloomy are the prospects of the soul! Our God seems to be a consuming fire, and our sins cry loudly for vengeance. The thoughts bleed inwardly, the Christian walks heavily; all without is irksome, all within is disconsolate. Lift up then, most gracious Jesus, thou nobler day-spring from on high; O lift up the light of thy countenance upon thy people! Reveal the fulness of thy mediatorial sufficiency; make clear our title to this great salvation: and thereby impart

What nothing earthly gives, or can destroy,
The soul's calm sun-shine, and the heart-felt joy.
Pope's Eth. Ep.

In one instance more, let me pursue the similitude. The sun, I observe, pours his lustre all around, to every distance, and in every direction. Profusely liberal of his gifts, he illuminates and cheers all the ends of the earth, and the whole compass of the skies. The east reddens with his rising radiance, and the western hills are gilded with his streaming splendours. The chilly regions of the north are cherished by his genial warmth, while the southern tracts glow with his fire.—Thus are the influences of the Sun of Righteousness, diffusive and unconfined. The generations of old felt them, and generations yet unborn will rejoice in them. The merits of his precious death extended to the first, and will be propagated to the last ages of mankind. May they, ere long, visit the remotest climates, and darkest corners of the earth! Command thy gospel, blessed Jesus, thy everlasting gospel, to take the wings of the morning, and travel with yonder sun. Let it fly upon strong pinions among every people, nation, and language; that where the heat scorches, and the cold freezes, thou mayest be known, confessed, and adored; that strangers to thy name, and enemies to thy doctrine, may be enlightened with the knowledge, and won to the love of thy truth! O! may that best of eras come; that wished-for period advance, when all the ends of the world shall remember themselves, and be turned unto the Lord; and all the kindreds of the nations worship before him! (Psal. xxii. 27.)

From the heavens we retire to the earth.—Here the drops of dew like so many liquid crystals sparkle upon the eye.* How brilliant, and unsullied, is their lustre! How little inferior to the proud stone, which irradiates a monarch's crown? They want nothing but solidity and permanency to equal them with the finest treasures of the jeweller's casket.—But here, indeed, they are greatly deficient; short-lived ornaments, possessed of little more than a momentary radiance. The sun that lights them up, will soon exhale them. Within another hour, we may "look for their place, and they shall be away." O! may every good resolution of mine, and of my flocks; may our united breathings after God, not be like these transient decorations of the morning, but like the substantial glory of the growing day! The one shines more and more with augmented splendours: while the other, having glittered gaily for a few moments, disappear, and are lost.

* "The sun, which is as the great soul of the universe, and produces all the necessities of life, has a particular influence in cheering the mind of man, and making the heart glad."—Spect. Vol. 6. No. 337.

How sensibly has this dew refreshed the vegetable kingdoms! The fervent heat of yesterday's sun had almost parched the face, and exhausted the sweets of nature. But what a sovereign restorative are these cooling distillations of the night! How they gladden and invigorate the languishing herbs! Sprinkled with these reviving drops, their verdure deepens; their bloom is new-flushed: their fragrance, faint or intermitted, becomes potent and copious.—Thus does the ever blessed Spirit revive the drooping troubled conscience of a sinner. When that almighty Comforter sheds his sweet influence on the soul, displays the all-sufficient sacrifice of a divine Redeemer, and “witnesses with our spirit,” that we are interested in the Saviour, and, by this means are children of God; then what a pleasing change ensues! Former anxieties are remembered no more. Every uneasy apprehension vanishes. Soothing hopes and delightful expectations succeed. The countenance drops its dejected mien; the eyes brighten with a lively cheerfulness, while the lips express the heartfelt satisfaction in the language of thanksgiving and the voice of melody.—In this sense, merciful God, be as the dew unto Israel! “Pour upon them the continual dew of thy blessing.” And, O! let not my fleece be dry, while heavenly benediction descends upon all around.

Who can number these pearly drops? They hang on every hedge; they twinkle from every spray, and adorn the whole herbage of the field. Not a blade of grass, not a single leaf, but wears the watery pendants. So vast is the profusion, that it baffles the arithmetician's art.—Here let the benevolent mind contemplate and admire that emphatical scripture, which from this elegant similitude describes the increase of the Messiah's kingdom. The royal prophet, speaking of Christ, and foretelling the success of his religion, has this remarkable expression,* “The dew of thy birth is of the womb of the morning;” that is, As the morning is the mother of dews; produces them, as it were, from a prolific womb; and scatters them with the most lavish abundance, over all the surface of the earth, so shall thy seed be. O thou everlasting Father! by the preaching of thy word, shall such an innumerable race of regenerate children be born unto thee, and prove an ornament and a blessing to all ages. Millions, millions of willing converts from every nation under heaven, shall crowd into thy falustrate the propriety of the phrase used in this connexion; “Hath the rain a father, or who hath begotten the drops of dew?” It seems the oriental writers delighted to represent the dew as a kind of birth, as the offspring of the morning. And if so, surely there could be no image in the whole compass of the universe better adapted to the Psalmist's purpose, or more strongly significant of those multitudes of proleptics, which were born, not of blood, nor of the will of the flesh, nor of the will of man, but of God, by the powerful energy of his word and spirit. Upon this supposition the whole verse describes

The willing subjection,
The gracious accomplishments, } of Christ's converts.
And the vast number,
g. d. In the day of thy power, when thy glorious gospel shall be published in the world, and accompanied with marvellous efficacy,—in that memorable period, thy people discontinuing the former obligations, commanded under the Mosaic law, shall devote themselves as so many living sacrifices to thy honour, not constrained by force, but charmed with thy excellency, they shall come in volunteers to thy service, and be free-will offerings in thy church.—Neither shall they be “empty vines,” or bare professors; but shall walk in all the beauties of holiness, and bring forth such amiable fruit, as will adorn the doctrine they embrace.—What is still more desirable, they shall be as numerous as they are willing and holy. Born to thee in numbers, immense and inconceivable, exceeding even the countless myriads of dew-drops, which are begotten by the night, and issue from the womb of the recent morning.

By this interpretation, the text, I think, is cleared of its obscurity, and appears both truly sublime, and perfectly just.

May I be pardoned the digression, and acquitted from presumption, if on this occasion, I take leave to animadvert upon what seems harsh and unnatural in the common exposition of the last verse of this psalm? All the commentators (as many at least as I have consulted) inform their readers, that to drink of the brook in the way, signifies to undergo sufferings and death; which, in my opinion, is a construction extremely forced, and hardly supportable; altogether remote from the import of such poetical forms of diction usual among the eastern nations. In those sultry climes, nothing could be more welcome to the traveller than a brook streaming near his path. To quench his thirst and lave his feet in the cooling current, was one of the greatest refreshments imaginable; and re-animating him to pursue his journey. For which reason, among others, brooks are a very favourite image with the inspired penman; used to denote a situation fertile and delightful, or a state of pleasure and satisfaction; but never, that I can recollect, to picture out the contrary condition of tribulation and distress.

The water-floods, indeed, in the sacred writings, often represent some imminent danger or grievous affliction. But then they are not—s reams so calm, that they keep within their banks, and glide quietly by the traveller's footsteps; so clear that they are fit for the way-faring man's use, and invite his lips to a draught; both which notions are plainly implied in the text. They are rather boisterous billows, bursting over a ship, or dashing themselves with dreadful impetuosity upon the shore; or, sweeping inundations, which bear down all before them, and down the neighbouring country. Besides, in these instances of horror, we never find the words—He shall drink; which conveys a pleasing idea (unless when it relates to a cup, filled with bitter, intoxicating, or imposed liquors; a case quite different from that under con-

* Psalm cx. 3. The most exact translation of this difficult passage, is I apprehend as follows: Prae rore utere aurorae, tibi est res juvenutinis vel proli tuae. i. e. The dew of thy birth is larger, more copious, than the dew which proceeds from the womb of the morning.—I cannot acquiesce in the new version, because that disjoins the womb of the morning from the dew of thy birth; whereas they seem to have a clear affinity, and a close connexion. The womb of the morning is, with the utmost pertinency applied to the conception and production of dews; agreeably to a delicate line, in that great master of just description and lively painting, Mr. Thomson.

The meek ey'd morn appears, mother of dews.

Summer.

We meet with a fine expression in the book of Job, which may serve to confirm this remark, and may il-mily, and replenish thy church; till they become like the stars of the sky, or the sands of the sea, for multitude; or even as numberless as these fine spangles, which now cover the face of nature.—Behold then, ye obstinately wicked, though you “are not gathered, yet will the Saviour be glorious.” His design shall not miscarry, nor his labour prove abortive, though you render it of none effect with regard to yourselves. Think not that Immanuel will want believers, or heaven inhabitants, because you continue incorrigible. No: the Lamb that was slain, will “see of the travail of his soul, and be satisfied,” in a never-failing series of faithful people below, and an immense choir of glorified saints above; who shall form his retinue, and surround his throne, in shining and triumphant armies, such as no man can number.

Here I was reminded of the various expedients which Providence, unsearchably wise, uses to fructify both the material and intellectual world.—Sometimes you shall have impetuous and heavy showers, bursting from the angry clouds. They lash the plains, and make the rivers foam. A storm brings them, and a deluge follows them.—At other times these gentle dews are formed in the serene evening air; they steal down by slow degrees, and with insensible stillness; so subtle that they deceive the nicest eye; so silent that they escape the most delicate ear; and when fallen, so very light, that they neither bruise the tenderest, nor oppress the weakest flower,—very different operations! yet each concurs in the same beneficial end; and both impart fertility to the lap of nature.

So, some persons have I known reclaimed from the unfruitful works of darkness, by violent and severe means. The Almighty sideration,) but either, such words as import terror and astonishment, or else to rush upon, to overwhelm, and even to bury under the waves.

Upon the whole, may not the passage more properly allude to the influences of the Holy Ghost? which were communicated in unmeasurable degrees to our great High Priest, and were in fact the cause of his surmounting all difficulties.—These are frequently represented by waters: “Whoso believeth on me, out of his belly shall flow rivers of living waters.” The enjoyment of them is described by drinking; “He that drinketh of the water that I shall give him shall never thirst.”—Then the sense may run in this well-connected and perspicuous manner. It is asked, How shall the Redeemer be able to execute the various and important offices foretold in the preceding parts of the psalm; the Prophet replies, He shall drink of the brook in the way. He shall not be left barely to his human nature, which must unavoidably sink under the tremendous work of recovering a lost world, but, through the whole course of his incarnate state, through the whole administration of his mediatorial kingdom, shall be supported with omnipotent succours. He shall drink at the brook of Almighty power, and travel on in the greatness of an uncreated strength.—Therefore shall he lift up his head. By this means shall he be equal to the prodigious task, and superior to all opposition. By this means, shall he be thoroughly successful in whatever he undertakes, and greatly triumphant over all his enemies.

addressed their stubborn hearts, as he addressed the Israelites at Sinai, with lightning in his eyes, and thunder in his voice. The conscience, smit with a sense of guilt, and apprehensive of eternal vengeance, trembled through all her powers; just as that strong mountain tottered to its centre. Pangs of remorse, and agonies of fear, preceded their new birth. They were reduced to the last extremities, almost overwhelmed with despair, before they found rest in Jesus Christ.—Others have been recovered from a vain conversation, by methods more mild and attractive. The Father of spirits applied himself to their teachable minds, in “a still and small voice.” His grace came down, as the rain into a fleece of wool; or, as these softening drops, which now water the earth. The kingdom of God took place in their souls, without noise or observation. They passed from death unto life, from a carnal to a regenerate state, by almost imperceptible advances. The transition resembled the growth of corn; was very visible when affected; though scarce sensible, while accomplishing.—O thou Author and Finisher of our faith, recal us from our wanderings, and re-unite us to thyself! Whether thou alarm us with thy terrors, or allure us with thy smiles; whether thou drive us with the scourge of conviction, or draw us with the cords of love; let us, in any wise, return to thee; for thou art our supreme good; thou art our only happiness.

Before I proceed further, let me ascend the terrace, and take one survey of the neighbouring country.—What a prospect rushes upon my sight! How vast! how various! how “full and plenteous with all manner of store!” Nature’s whole wealth!—What a rich and inexhaustible magazine is here, furnishing subsistence for every creature! Methinks I read in these spacious volumes, a most lively comment upon that noble celebration of the divine beneficence, He openeth his hand, and filleth all things living with plenteousness.

These are thy glorious works, Parent of good!
Almighty! Thine this universal frame,
Thus wondrous fair! Thyself how wondrous then.
Milton.

The fields are covered deep, and stand thick with corn. They expand the milky grain to the sun, in order to receive from his beams a more firm consistence, and a golden hue; that they may be qualified to fill the barns of the husbandman with plenty, and his heart with gladness.

spontaneous crops of herbage; which, converted into hay, will prove a most commodious provision for the barrenness of winter; will supply with fodder our serviceable animals, when all the verdure of the plain is killed by frosts or buried in snows.—A winding stream glides along the flowery margin, and receives the image of the bending skies, and waters the root of many a branching willow. It is stocked, no doubt, with variety of fish, which afford a solitary diversion to the angler, and nourish for his table a delicious treat. Nor is it the only merit of this liquid element, to maintain the firm nations: it also carries cleanliness, and dispenses fruitfulness, wherever it rolls the crystal current.

The pastures with their verdant mounds, chequer the prospect, and prepare a standing repast for our cattle. There “our oxen are made strong to labour, and our sheep bring forth thousands and ten thousands.” There the horse acquires vigour, for the dispatch of our business; and speed, to expedite our journeys. From thence the kine bring home their udders distended with one of the richest and healthiest liquors in the world.

On several spots a grove of trees, like some grand colonnade, crests its towering head. Every one projects a friendly shade for the beasts, and creates an hospitable lodging for the birds. Every one stands ready, to furnish timber for a palace, masts for a navy; or with a more condescending courtesy, fuel for our hearths.—One of them seems skirted with a wild uncultivated heath; which, like well-disposed shades in painting, throws an additional lustre on the more ornamented parts of the landscape. Nor is its usefulness, like that of a foil, relative only, but real. There several valuable creatures are produced, and accommodated without any expense or care of ours. There likewise spring abundance of those herbs, which assuage the smart of our wounds, and allay the fiery tumults of the fever; which impart floridity to our circulating fluids, add a more vigorous tone to our active solids, and thereby repair the decays of our enfeebled constitutions.

Nearer the houses we perceive an ample spread of branches! not so stately as the oaks, but more amiable for their annual services. A little while ago, I beheld them; and all was one beauteous, boundless waste of blossoms. The eye marvelled at the lovely sight, and the heart rejoiced in the prospect of autumnal plenty. But now the blooming maid is resigned for the useful matron; the flower is fallen, and the fruit swells out on every twig.—Breathe soft, ye winds! O, spare the tender fruitage, ye surly blast! Let the pear-tree suckle her juicy progeny, till they drop into our hands and dissolve in our mouths. Let the plumb hang unmolested upon her boughs, till she fatten her delicious flesh, and cloud her polished skin with blue. And as for the apples, that staple commodity of our orchards, let no injurious shocks precipitate them immaturally to the ground; till revolving suns have tinged them with a ruddy complexion, and concocted them into an exquisite flavour. Then, what copious hoards, of what burnished rinds, and what delightful relishes, will replenish the store-room! Some, to present us with an early entertainment, and refresh our palates amidst the sultry heats; some, to borrow ripeness from the falling snows, and carry autumn into the depths of winter; some, to adorn the salver, make a part of the dessert, and give an agreeable close to our feasts;* others, to fill our vats with a foaming flood, which, mellowed by age, may sparkle in the glass, with a liveliness and delicacy little inferior to the blood of the grape.

I observe several small inclosures, which seem to be apprehensive of some hostile visit from the north; and therefore, are defended, on that quarter, by a thick wood or a lofty wall. At the same time, they cultivate an uninterrupted correspondence with the south, and throw open their whole dimensions to its friendly warmth. One, in particular, lies within the reach of a distinguishing view, and proves to be a kitchen-garden. It looks, methinks, like a plain and frugal republic. Whatever may resemble the pomp of courts, or the ensigns of royalty, is banished from this humble community. None of the productions of the oily affect finery, but all are habited with perfect decency. Here those celebrated qualities are eminently united, the utmost simplicity with the exactest neatness.†

A skilful hand has parcelled out the whole ground into narrow beds, and intervening alleys. The same discreet management has assigned to each verdant family a peculiar and distinct abode. So that there is no confusion amidst the greatest multiplicity; because every individual is associated with propriety, and all the tribes are ranged with regularity. If it be pleasing to behold their orderly situation, and their modest beauties; how much more delightful, to consider the advantages they yield! What a fund of choice accommodations is here! what a source of wholesome dainties! and all for the enjoyment of man. Why does the parsley, with her frizzled locks, shag the border; or, why the celery, with her whitening arms, perforate the mold, but to render his soups savoury? The asparagus shoots his tapering stems to offer him the first fruits of the season; and the artichoke spreads its turgid top, to give him a treat of vegetable marrow. The tendrils of the cucumber* creep into the sun; and, though basking in its hottest rays, they secrete for their master, and barrel up for his use the most cooling juices of the soil. The beans stand firm, like files of embattled troops; the peas rest upon their props, like so many companies of invalids; while both replenish their pods with the fatness of the earth, on purpose to pour it on their owner's table.—Not one species among all this variety of herbs is a cumberer of the ground. Not a single plant but it is good for food, or some way salutary. With so beneficent an economy are the several periods of their ministrations settled, that no portion of the year is left destitute of nourishing esculents. What is still more obliging, every portion of the year affords such esculents as are best suited to the temperature of the air, and the state of our bodies. Why then should the possessor of so valuable a spot envy the condition of kings,† since he may daily walk amidst rows of peaceable and obsequious, though mute subjects. Every one of which tenders him some agreeable present, and pays him a willing tribute, such as is most happily adapted both to supply his wants, and to regale his taste; to furnish him at once with plenty and with pleasure.

At a distance, one descries the mighty hills. They have their huge ridges among the clouds; and look like the barriers of kingdoms or the boundaries of nature. Bare and deformed as their surface may appear, their bowels are fraught with inward treasures! treasures lodged fast in the quarries, or sunk deep in the mines. From thence industry may draw her implements, to plough the soil, to reap the grain, and procure every necessary convenience. From thence, art may fetch her materials to rear the dome, to swell the organ, and form the noblest ornaments of politer life.

On another side, the great deep terminates the view. There go the ships; there is that leviathan; and there, in that world of waters, an inconceivable number of animals have their habitation. This is the capacious cistern of the universe, which admits as into a deep receptacle, and distributes as from a reservoir, whatever waters the whole globe. There is not a fountain that gushes in the unfrequented desert, nor a rivulet that flows in the remotest continent, nor a cloud that swims in the highest regions of the firmament, but is fed by this all-replenishing source. The ocean is the grand vehicle of trade, and the uniter of distant nations. To us it is peculiarly kind, not only as it wafts into our ports the harvest of every climate, and renders our island the centre of traffic, but also as it secures us from foreign invasion, by a sort of impregnable entrenchment.*

Methinks the view of this profuse munificence inspires a secret delight, and kindles a disinterested good-will. While the "little hills clap their hands," and the luxuriant "vallis laugh and sing," who can forbear catching the general joy? who is not touched with lively sensations of pleasure? While the everlasting Father is scattering blessings through his whole family, and crowning the year with his goodness, who does not feel his breast overflowing with a diffusive benevolence? My heart, I must confess, beats high with satisfaction, and breathes out congratulatory wishes upon all the tenants of these rural abodes: "Peace be within your walls, as well as plenteousness around your dwellings." Live ye highly favoured; live sensible of your benefits, and thankful to your benefactor. Look round upon these prodigiously large incomes of the fruitful soil, and call them (for you have free leave) all your own.—Only let me remind you of one very important truth, let me suggest, and may you never forget that you are obliged to Christ Jesus for every one of these accommodations, which spring from the teeming earth, and the smiling skies. For,

1. Christ† made them, when they were

* Whose rampart was the sea. Nah. iii. 8.

I hope this little excursion into the country will not be looked upon as a departure from my subject; because a rural view, though no essential part of a garden, is yet a desirable appendage, and necessary to complete its beauty.—As usefulness is the most valuable property which can attend any production, this is the circumstance chiefly touched upon in the survey of the landscape. Though every piece of this extensive and diversified scene is cast in the most elegant mould, yet nothing is calculated merely for show and parade. You see nothing formed in the taste of the ostentatious obelisk, or insignificant pomp of the pyramid. No such idle expenses were admitted into that consummate plan, which regulated the structure of the universe. All the decorations of nature are no less advantageous than ornamental; such as speak the Maker infinitely beneficent, as well as incomparably magnificent.

† When I ascribe the work of creation to the Son, I would by no means be supposed to withhold the same honour from the eternal Father, and ever-blessed Spirit. The acts of those inconceivably glorious persons are, like their essence, undivided and one. But I choose to state the important point in this manner, because this is the manifest doctrine of the new Testament, is the express belief of our church, and a most noble peculiarity of the gospel revelation.—1 not.—He fetched them up from utter darkness, and gave them both their being and their beauty. He created the materials of which they are composed, and moulded them into this endless multiplicity of amiable forms, and useful substances. He arrayed the heavens with a vesture of the mildest blue, and clothed the earth in a livery of the gayest green; his pencil streaked, and his breath perfumed whatever is beautiful or fragrant in the universe. His strength set fast the mountains; his goodness garnished the vales; and the same touch which healed the leper wrought the whole visible system into this complete perfection.

2. Christ recovered them when they were forfeited.—By Adam's sin, we lost our right to the comforts of life, and fruits of the ground: his disobedience was the most impious and horrid treason against the King of kings. Consequently his whole patrimony became confiscated; as well the portion of temporal good things, settled upon the human race during their minority; as, that everlasting heritage reserved for their enjoyment when they should come to full age. But the "seed of the woman," instantly interposing, took off the attainer, and redeemed the alienated inheritance. The first Adam being disinherited, the second Adam was appointed heir of all things,* visible as well as invisible; and we hold our possession of the former, we expect an instatement in the latter, purely by virtue of our alliance to him, and our union with him.

3. Christ upholds them, which would otherwise tumble into ruin.—By him says the oracle of inspiration, all things consist.* His finger rolls the seasons round, and presides over all the celestial revolutions. His finger winds up the wheels, and impels every spring of vegetative nature. In a word, the whole weight of the creation rests upon his mighty arm, and receives the whole harmony of its motion from his unerring eye.—This habitable globe, with all its rich appendages, and fine machinery, could no more continue, than they could create themselves. Start they would into instant confusion, or drop into their primitive nothing, did not his power support, and his wisdom regulate them every moment. In conformity to his will, they subsist steadfast and invariable in their orders; and wait only for his sovereign nod, to "fall away like water that runneth apace."

4. Christ actuates them,† which would otherwise be lifeless and insignificant.—Pensioners they are, constant pensioners on his bounty; and borrow their all from his fulness. He only has life; and whatever operates, operates by an emanation from his all sufficiency. Does the grape refresh you with its enlivening juices? It is by a warrant received, and virtue derived, from the Redeemer. Does bread strengthen your heart, and prove the staff of your life? Remember, that it is by the Saviour's appointment, and through the efficacy of his operation. You are charmed with his melody, when the "time of the singing of birds is come, and the voice of the nightingale is heard in our land." You taste his goodness in the luscious fig, the melting peach, and the musky flavour of the apricot. You smell his sweetness in the opening honey-suckle, and every odoriferous shrub. Could these creatures speak for themselves they would, doubtless, disclaim all sufficiency of their own, and ascribe the whole honour to their Maker.—"We are servants," would they say, "of him who died for you. Cisterns only, dry cisterns in ourselves, we transmit to mortals no more than the uncreated fountain transfuses unto us. Think not, that from any ability of our own, we choose it also, because I would take every opportunity of inculcating and celebrating the divinity of the Redeemer: a truth which imparts an unutterable dignity to Christianity; a truth, which lays an immovable foundation for all the comfortable hopes of a Christian; a truth which will render the mystery of our redemption, the wonder and delight of eternity; and with this truth every one will observe, my assertion is inseparably connected.

If any one questions, whether this be the doctrine of our church, let the creed, which we repeat in our most solemn devotions, determine his doubt: "I believe," says that form of sound words, "in one Lord Jesus Christ, very God of very God, by whom all things were made."—If it be farther inquired, from whence the Nicene fathers derived this article of their faith? I answer, from the writings of the beloved disciple, who lay on the Saviour's bosom; and of that great apostle who had been caught up into the third heaven. John i. 3. Col. i. 16.

* Heb. i. 2.—In this sense, at least, Christ is the Saviour of all men. The former and latter rain; the precious fruits of the earth, food to eat, and raiment to put on;—all these he purchased, even for his irreclaimable enemies. They eat of his bread, who lift up their heel against him.

We learn from hence, in what a peculiar and endearing light the Christian has to contemplate the things that are seen. Heathens might discover an eternal power and infinite wisdom, in the structure of the universe; heathens might acknowledge a most stupendous liberality, in the unreserved grant of the whole fabric, with all its furniture, to the service of men; but the Christian should ever keep in mind his forfeiture of them, and the price paid to redeem them. He should receive the gifts of indulgent providence, as the Israelites received their law from the hand of a mediator; or rather, to him they should come, not only issuing from the stores of an unbounded bounty; but swimming (as it were) in that crimson tide, which streamed from Immanuel's veins.

* Col. i. 17. I beg leave to recommend St. Chrysostom's pertinent and beautiful note upon the passage; by which it will appear, that the sentiment of these sections is not merely a private opinion, but the avowed belief of the primitive church.

† John v. 17. "My Father worketh hitherto and I work;" or, I exert that unremitting and unwearied energy, which is the life of the creation.—Thus the words are paraphrased by a masterly expositor, who has illustrated the life of our blessed Lord, in the most elegant taste of criticism, with the most amiable spirit of devotion, and without any mixture of the malignant leaven or low singularities of a party. See the Family Expositor, Vol. I. sect. 47.

furnish you with assistance, or administer to your comfort. It is the divine energy, the divine energy alone, that works in us, and does you good.—We serve you, O ye sons of men, that you may love him who placed you in these stations. O! love the Lord, therefore, all ye who are supported by our ministry; or we shall groan with indignation and regret at your abuse of our services. (Rom. viii. 22.)—Use us, and welcome; for we are yours, if ye are Christ's. Crop our choicest beauties; rifle all our treasures, accommodate yourselves with our most valuable qualities; only let us be incentives to gratitude, and motives to obedience."

Having surveyed the spacious sky, and sent a glance round the inferior creation, it is time to descend from this eminence, and confine my attention to the beautiful spot below.—Here nature, always pleasing, every-where lovely, appears with peculiar attractions. Yonder she seems dressed in her dishabille; grand, but irregular. Here she calls in her hand-maid, art; and shines in all the delicate ornaments which the nicest cultivation is able to convey. Those are her common apartments, where she lodges her ordinary guests; this is her cabinet of curiosities, where she entertains her intimate acquaintance.—My eye shall often expatiate over those scenes of universal fertility; my feet shall sometimes brush through the thicket, or traverse the lawn, or stroll along the forest-glade; but to this delightful retreat shall be my chief resort. Thither will I make excursions; but here will I dwell.

If, from my low procedure, I may form an allusion to the most exalted practices, I would observe, upon this occasion, that the celebrated Erasmus, and our judicious Locke, having trod the circle of the sciences, and ranged through the whole extent of human literature, at length betook themselves solely to the Bible. Leaving the sages of antiquity, they sat incessantly at the feet of Jesus. Wisely they withdrew from that immense multiplicity of learning, from those endless tracts of amusing erudition, where noxious weeds are mixed with wholesome herbs: where is generally a much larger growth of prickly shrubs, than of fruitful boughs. They spent their most mature hours in those hallowed gardens, which God's own wisdom planted, which God's own Spirit watereth, and in which God's own Son is continually walking; where he meeteth those that seek him, and revealeth to them the glories of his person, and the riches of his goodness.

Thus would I finish the remainder of my days! Having just tasted what they call the politer studies, I would now devote my whole application to the lively oracles.

From other pursuits, I might glean, perhaps, a few scattered ears of low, of lean, of unsatisfactory instruction. From this, I trust to reap a harvest of the sublimest truths, the noblest improvements, and the purest joys.* Waft me then, O! waft my mind to Zion's consecrated bowers. Let my thoughts perpetually rove through the awfully-pleasing walks of inspiration. Here grow those heaven-born plants, the trees of life and knowledge, whose ambrosial fruits we now may "take, and eat, and live for ever." Here flow those precious streams of grace, and righteousness, whose living waters "whosoever drinks, shall thirst no more." And what can the fables of Grecian song, or the finest pages of Roman eloquence,—what can they exhibit, in any degree comparable to these matchless prerogatives of revelation!—Therefore, though I should not dislike to pay a visit now and then to my heathen masters, I would live with the prophets and apostles. With those I would carry on some occasional correspondence: but these should be my bosom-friends, my inseparable companions, "my delight, and my counsellors."

What sweets are these, which so agreeably salute my nostrils! They are the breath of the flowers, the incense of the garden.—How liberally does the jessamine dispense her odoriferous riches! How deliciously has the woodbine embalmed this morning walk! The air is all perfume.—And is not this another most engaging argument to forsake the bed of sloth? Who would lie dissolved in senseless slumbers, while so many breathing sweets invite him to a feast of fragrancy! Especially considering that the advancing day will exhale the volatile dainties. A fugitive treat they are, prepared only for the wakeful and industrious; whereas, when the sluggard lifts his heavy eyes, the flowers will droop, their fine scents be dissipated, and instead of this refreshing humidity, the air will become a kind of liquid fire.

With this very motive, heightened by a representation of the most charming pieces of morning scenery, the parent of mankind awakes his lovely consort. There is such a delicacy in the choice, and so much life in the description of these rural images, that I cannot excuse myself, without repeating the whole passage.—Whisper it some friendly genius, in the ear of every one, who is now sunk in sleep, and lost to all those refined gratifications!

Awake—The morning shines, and the fresh field
Calls you—Ye lose the prime, to mark how spring
The tender plants, how blows the citron grove;
What drops the myrrh, and what the balmy reed;
How nature paints her colours; how the bee
Sits on the bloom, extracting liquid sweets †

* Quicquid docetur, veritas; quicquid precipitur bonitas; quicquid promittitur felicitas.

† Milt. Par. Lost. Book V. line 21.

How delightful is this fragrance! It is distributed in the nicest proportion; neither so strong as to oppress the organs; nor so faint as to elude them.—We are soon cloyed at a sumptuous banquet; but this pleasure never loses its poignancy, never palls the appetite.—Here luxury itself is innocent! or rather in this case, indulgence is incapable of excess.—This balmy entertainment, not only regales the sense, but cheers the very soul? and instead of clogging elates its powers. It puts me in mind of that ever memorable sacrifice, which was once made in behalf of offending mortals. I mean the sacrifice of the blessed Jesus, when he offered up himself unto God “for a sweet smelling savour.” Such the Holy Spirit styles that wonderful oblation; as if no image in the whole sensible creation was so proper to give us an idea of the ineffable satisfaction, which the Father of mercies conceived from that unparalleled atonement, as the pleasing sensations which such rich perfumes are capable of raising. “Thousands of rams, and ten thousand of rivers of oil,” from an apostate world; the most submissive acknowledgments, added to the most costly offerings, from men of defiled hands, and unclean lips; what could they have effected? A prophet represents the “high and lofty one that inhabiteth eternity,” turning himself away from such filthy rags; turning himself away with disdainful abhorrence as from the noisome steam of a dunghill. (Amos v. 21, 22.)—But in Christ’s immaculate holiness, in Christ’s consummate obedience, in Christ’s most precious blood-shedding, with what an unimaginable complacency does justice rest satisfied, and vengeance acquiesce!—All thy works, O thou surety for ruined sinners! all thy sufferings, O thou slaughtered Lamb of God! as well as all thy garments, O thou Bridegroom of thy church! smell of myrrh, aloes, and cassia! (Psal. xlv.9.) They are infinitely more grateful to the eternal Godhead, than the choicest exhalations of the garden, than all the odours of the spicy east can be to the human nostrils.

As the altar of old sanctified the gift; so this is the great propitiation, which recommends the obnoxious persons, and unprofitable services of the believing world. In this may my soul be interested! By this it may be reconciled to the Father!—There is such a leprous depravity cleaving to my nature, as pollutes whatever I perform. My most profound adorations, and sincere acts of religion, must not presume to challenge a reward, but humbly implore forgiveness.†

* Ointment and perfume rejoice the heart. Prov. xxvii. 9.

Renouncing therefore, myself in every instance of duty; disclaiming all shadow of confidence in any deeds of my own,* may I now and evermore be accepted through the Beloved!

What colours, what charming colours are here? These so nobly bold; and those so delicately languid. What a glow is enkindled in some! what a gloss shines upon others! In one, methinks I see the ruby, with her bleeding radiance; in another, the sapphire, with her sky-tintured blue; in all, such an exquisite richness of dyes, as no other set of paintings in the universe can boast.†—With what a masterly skill is every one of the varying tints disposed! Here they seem to be thrown on with an easy dash of security and freedom; there they are adjusted by the nicest touches of art and accuracy. Those which form the ground, are always so judiciously chosen, as to heighten the lustre of the superadded figures; while the verdure of the impalement, or the shadings of the foliage, impart new liveliness to the whole. Indeed, whether they are blended or arranged, softened or contrasted, they are manifestly under the conduct of a taste that never mistakes, a felicity that never falls short of the very perfection of elegance.—Fine, inimitably fine, is the texture of the web, on which these shining treasures are displayed. What are the labours of the Persian looms, or the boasted commodities of Brussels, compared with these curious manufactures of nature? Compared with these, the most admired chintzes would lose their reputation; even superfine cambrics appear coarse as canvass in their presence.

What a cheering argument does our Saviour derive from hence, to strengthen our affiance in God! He directs us to learn a lesson of heaven depending faith, from every heart, and vindicates my sentiments, while he so justly and beautifully utters his own.

Look down, great God, with pity’s softest eye,

On a poor breathing particle in dust,

His crimes forgive; forgive his virtues too,

Those smaller faults, half converts to the right.

Night-Thoughts, No. ix.

* See pages 44 and 45, in the second edition of a most candid and evangelical little treatise, called Christianity the Great Ornament of Human Life.—“If Christians happily avoid the dangerous extreme, and too often fatal rock of a dead fruitless faith on the one hand, he (i. e. Satan) will endeavour, by all kinds of plausible insinuations, to split them on the opposite, viz. spiritual pride, and ostentation, and dependence on their works, as if these were the meritorious or procuring causes of all true peace, hope, consolation, and divine acceptance;—Now, this self-dependence may be ranked among the most dangerous of the infernal politics, because the fatal potion lies deep and too often undiscerned.”

bird that wings the air, and from every flower that blossoms in the field. If Providence, with unremitting care, supports those inferior creatures, and arrays these in sensible beings with so much splendour; surely he will in no wise withhold from his elect children, "bread to eat, and raiment to put on."—Ye faithful followers of the Lamb, dismiss every low anxiety, relating to the needful sustenance of life. He that feeds the ravens from an inexhaustible magazine, he that paints the plants with such surpassing elegance; in short, he that provides so liberally, both for the animal and vegetable parts of his creation, will not, cannot, neglect his own people. Fear not little flock, ye peculiar objects of Almighty love; it is your Father's good pleasure to give you a kingdom. (Luke xii. 32.) And if he freely gives you an everlasting kingdom hereafter, is it possible to suppose that he will deny you any necessary conveniences here?

One cannot forbear reflecting in this place, on the too prevailing humour of being fond and ostentatious of dress.* What an abject and mistaken ambition is this. How unworthy the dignity of immortal, and the wisdom of rational beings! Especially since these little productions of the earth have in-

* Mr. Addison has a fine remark on a female warrior celebrated by Virgil. He observes, that with all her other great qualities, this little foible mingled itself. Because, as the poet relates, an intemperate fondness for a rich and splendid suit of armour brought her into ruin. In this circumstance our critic discovers a moral concealed; in this he admires as a neat, though oblique satire, on that trifling passion.—Spec. vol. 1, No. 15.

I would refer it to the judicious reader, whether there is not a beauty of the same kind, but touched with a more masterly hand, in the song of Deborah.—Speaking of Sisera's mother, the sacred eucharistic ode represents her as anticipating, in her fond fancy the victory of her son; and indulging the following soliloquy.—Have they not sped? have they not divided the prey? to Sisera a prey of divers colours; a prey of divers colours of needles-work; of divers colours of needle-work on both sides; meet for the necks of them that take the spoil?—She takes no notice of the signal service which her hero would do to his country, by quelling so dangerous an insurrection. She never reflects on the present acclamations, the future advancement, and the eternal renown, which are the tribute usually paid to a conqueror's merit. She can conceive, it seems, nothing greater than to be clad in an embroidered vesture; and to trail along the ground a robe of the richest dyes. This is, in her imagination, the most lordly spoil he can win; the most stately trophy he can erect.—It is also observable, how she dwells upon the trivial circumstance; reiterating it again and again. It has so charmed her ignoble heart, so entirely engrossed her little views, that she can think of nothing else, speak of nothing else, and can hardly ever desist from the darling topic.—Is not this a keen, though delicately couched censure, on that poor, contemptible, grovelling taste, which is enamoured with silken finery, and makes the attributes of a butterfly the idol of its affections?

How conspicuous is the elevated and magnificent spirit of that venerable mother in Israel, when viewed in comparison with the low, the despicable turn of this Canaanitish lady!—Such strong and beautiful contrasts, are, I think, some of the most striking excellencies of poetic painting; and in no book are they more frequently used, or expressed with greater life, than in the sacred volumes of inspiration.

disputably the pre-eminence in such outward embellishments—Go, clothe thyself with purple and fine linen; trick thyself up in all the gay attire which the shuttle or the needle can furnish; yet know, to the mortification of thy vanity, that the native elegance of a common daisy* eclipses all this elaborate finery.—Nay, wert thou decked like some illustrious princess, on her coronation day, in all the splendour of royal apparel; couldst thou equal even Solomon, in the height of his magnificence and glory; yet would the meanest among the flowery populace outshine thee; every discerning eye would give the preference to these beauties of the ground†—Scorn then to borrow thy recommendations from a neat disposition of threads and a curious arrangement of colours. Assume a becoming greatness of temper; let thy endowments be of the immortal kind; study to be all-glorious within; be clothed with humility; wear the ornament of a meek and quiet spirit.‡ To say all in a word, put on the Lord Jesus Christ; (Rom. xiii. 14.) let his blood be sprinkled upon thy conscience, and it shall be whiter than the virgin-snow; let his righteousness, like a spotless robe, adorn thy inner man, and thou shalt be amiable even in the most distinguishing eye of God. Let his blessed Spirit dwell in thy heart, and under his sanctifying operations thou shalt be made partaker of a divine nature.

These are real excellencies; truly noble accomplishments these. In this manner be arrayed, be beautified; and thou wilt not find a rival in the feathers of a peacock, or the foliage of a tulip. These will exalt thee far above the low pretensions of lace and embroidery. These will prepare thee to stand in the beatific presence, and to take thy seat among the angels of light.

What an enchanting situation is this! One can scarce be melancholy within the atmosphere of flowers. Such lively hues, and delicious odours, not only address themselves agreeably to the senses; but touch, with a surprising delicacy, the sweetest movements of the mind;

§ "I would have my reader endeavour to moralize 'his natural pleasure of the soul', and to improve this

How often have I felt them dissipate the gloom of thought, and transfuse a sudden gaiety through the dejected spirit! I cannot wonder, that kings descend from their thrones, to walk amidst blooming ivory and gold; or retire from the most sumptuous feast, to be recreated with the more refined sweets of the garden. I cannot wonder that queens forego, for a while, the compliments of a nation, to receive the tribute of the parterre; or withdraw from all the glitter of a court, to be attended with the more splendid equipage of a bed of flowers.—But, if this be so pleasing, what transporting pleasure must arise from the fruition of uncreated excellency! O! what unknown delight to enter into thy immediate presence, most blessed Lord God! to see thee, thou King of Heaven and Lord of glory, no longer “through a glass darkly, but face to face!” to have all thy goodness, all thy greatness, shine before us; and be made glad for ever with the brightest discovery of thy perfections, with the ineffable joy of thy countenance.

This we cannot bear, in our present imperfect state. The effulgence of unveiled divinity would dazzle a mortal sight. Our feeble faculties would be overwhelmed with such a fulness of superabundant bliss; and must lie oppressed under such “an exceeding great, eternal weight of glory.” But, “when this corruptible hath put on incorruption,” the powers of the soul will be greatly invigorated; and these earthly tabernacles will be “transformed into the likeness of Christ’s glorious body.” Then, though (Isa. xxiv. 23.) “the moon shall be confounded, and the sun ashamed,” when the Lord of hosts is revealed from heaven; yet shall his faithful people be enabled to see him as he is (1 John iii. 2.)

Here then, my wishes, here be fixed: be this your determined and invariable aim; here, my affections, here give a loose to your whole ardour; cry out in the language of inspiration, This one thing have I desired of the Lord, which with incessant earnestness, I will require, that I may dwell in the celestial house of the Lord all the days of my future life, to behold the beauty of the Lord, (Psal. xxvii. 4.) and to contemplate with wonder and adoration,—with unspeakable and everlasting rapture,—all the attributes of the incomprehensible Godhead.

Solomon, a most penetrating judge of human nature, knowing how highly mankind is charmed with the fine qualities of flowers, has figured out the blessed Jesus, that “fairest among ten thousand,” by these lovely representatives. He styles Him “the rose of Sharon and the lily of the valleys; † like the first, full of delights and communicable graces; like the last, exalted in majesty, and complete in beauty. In that sacred pastoral, he ranges the creation; borrows its most finished forms, and dips his pencil in its choicest dyes, to present us with a sketch of the amiableness of his person! his amiableness, who is the light of the world; the glory of his church; the only hope, the sovereign consolation of sinners; and exalted, infinitely exalted, not only above the noblest comparison, but even above all blessing and praise.” May I also make the same heavenly use of all sublimary enjoyments! Whatever is pleasurable or charming below, let it raise my desire to those sublime delights which are above; which will yield, not partial, but perfect felicity; not transient, but never-ending satisfaction and joy.—Yes, my soul, let these beauties in miniature always remind thee of that glorious person in whom “dwells all the fulness of the Godhead bodily.” Let these little emanations teach thee to thirst after the eternal fountain. O! may the creatures be the constant clue to the Creator! For this is a certain truth, and deserves thy frequent recollection, thy most attentive consideration, that the whole compass of finite perfection is only a faint ray, ‡ shot from that immense source, is only a small drop, derived from that inexhaustible ocean of all good.

vernal delight, as Milton calls it, into a Christian virtue. When we find ourselves inspired with this pleasing instinct, this secret satisfaction and complacency, arising from the beauties of the creation, let us consider to whom we stand indebted for all these entertainments of sense, and who it is that thus opens his hand, and fills the world with good.—Such an habitual disposition of mind consecrates every field and wood; turns an ordinary walk into a morning or evening sacrifice; and will approve those transient gleams, which naturally brighten up and refresh the soul on such occasions, into an inviolable and perpetual state of bliss and happiness.”

Spectator, vol. v. No. 364.

* Isaiah represents the felicity of the righteous, in the everlasting world, by this elegant and amiable image: Thine eyes shall see the King in his beauty. Milton touches the same subject with wonderful elevation and majesty of thought. They

† By the lily of the valleys, I apprehend, is meant, not the flower which commonly passes under that denomination, and is comparatively mean; but the grand, majestic garden lily; growing in a rich irriguous soil, where it flourishes in the most ample manner and arrives at the highest perfection. The circumstance of the valleys, added by the sacred writer, is significant, not of the species, but of the place.— This is by far the grandest interpretation, and most exactly suitable to the spiritual sense; which intimates that the blessed Jesus delights to dwell, by the communications of the Spirit, in humble hearts.— Lilium vallibus gaudens.

What a surprising variety is observable among the flowery tribes! How has the bountiful hand of Providence diversified these nicest pieces of his workmanship! and added the charms of an endless novelty to all their other perfections?—Because a constant uniformity would soon render the entertainment tiresome or insipid; therefore, every species exhibits something new. The fashion spreads not from family to family; but every one has a mode of its own, which is truly original. The most cursory glance perceives an apparent difference, as well as a peculiar delicacy, in the airs and habits, the attitude and lineaments of every distinct class.

Some rear their heads with a majestic mien; and overlook, like sovereigns or nobles, the whole parterre. Others seem more moderate in their aims, and advance only to the middle stations; a genius turned for heraldry might term them the gentry of the border. While others, free from all aspiring views, creep unambitiously on the ground, and look like the commonalty of the kind.—Some are intersected with elegant stripes, or studded with radiant spots. Some affect to be genteelly powdered, or neatly fringed; while others are plain in their aspect, unaffected in their dress, and content to please with a naked simplicity. Some assume a monarch's purple; some look most becoming in the virgin's white; but black, doleful black, has no admittance into the wardrobe of spring. The weeds of mourning would be a manifest indecorum, when nature holds an universal festival. She would now inspire none but delightful ideas, and therefore always makes her appearance in some amiable suit.* Here stands a warrior clad with crimson; there sits a magistrate, robed in scarlet; and yonder struts a pretty fellow, that seems to have dipped his plums in the rainbow, and glitters in all the gay colours of that resplendent arch. Some rise into a curious cup, or fall into a set of beautiful bells; some spread themselves in a swelling tuft, or crowd into a delicious cluster.—In some, the predominant stain softens by the gentlest diminutions, till it has even stole away from itself. The eye is amused at the agreeable delusion: and we wonder to find ourselves insensibly decoyed into quite a different lustre. In others, you would think, the fine tinges were emulous of pre-eminence: disdaining to mingle, they confront one another with the resolution of rivals, determined to dispute the prize of beauty; while each is improved, by the opposition, into the highest vivacity of complexion.

How manifold are thy works, O Lord!

(Psal. civ. 24.) Multiplied, even to prodigy. Yet in wisdom, consummate wisdom, hast thou made them all.—How I admire the vastness of the contrivance, and the exactness of the execution! Man, feeble man, with difficulty accomplishes a single work; hardly, and after many efforts, does he arrive at a tolerable imitation of some one production of nature. But the Almighty Artist spoke millions of substances into instantaneous being, the whole collection wonderfully various, and each individual perfectly complete.—Repeated experiments generally, I might say always, discover errors or defects in our happiest inventions: nay, what wins our approbation at the present hour or in this particular place, is very probably, in some remote period, or some distant clime, treated with contempt. Whereas these fine structures have pleased every taste, in every country, for almost six thousand years. Nor has any fault* been detected in the original plan, nor any room left for the least improvement upon the first model. All our performances, the more minutely they are scanned, the more imperfect they appear. With regard to these delicate objects, the more we search into their properties, the more we are ravished with their graces; they are sure to disclose fresh strokes of the most masterly skill, in proportion to the attention with which they are examined.

Nor is the simplicity of the operation less astonishing than the accuracy of the workmanship, or the infinitude of the effects. Should you ask, “Where, and what are the materials that beautify the blooming world? What rich tints; what splendid dyes; what stores of shining crayons, stand by the heavenly limner, when he paints the robe of nature?” It is answered, his powerful pencil needs no such costly apparatus. A single principle, under his conducting hand, branches out into an immensity of the most varied and most finished forms. The moisture of the earth, and of the circumambient air, passed through proper strainers, and disposed in a range of pellucid tubes; this performs all the wonders, and produces all the beauties of vegetation. This creeps along the fibres of the low spread moss, and climbs to the very tops of the lofty waving cedars. This, attracted by the root, and circulating through invisible canals, this bursts into gems, expands itself into leaves, and clothes the forest with all its verdant honours.—This one† plain and simple cause, gives birth to all the charms

* Eccl. iii. 14. I know that whatsoever God doth, it shall be for ever; nothing can be put to it, nor any thing taken from it.

† “When every several effect has a particular separate cause, this gives no pleasure to the spectator;”

which deck the youth and maturity of the year. This blushes in the early hepatica, and flames in the late advancing poppy. This reddens into blood in the veins of the mulberry; and attenuates itself into leafen gold, to create a covering for the quince. This breathes in all the fragrant gales of our garden, and weeps odorous gum in the groves of Arabia.—So wonderful is our Creator in counsel, and so excellent in working. (Isa. xxviii. 29.)

In a grove of tulips, or a knot of pinks, one perceives a difference in almost every individual. Scarcely any two are turned and tintured exactly alike; each allows himself a little peculiarity in his dress, though all belong to one family; so that they are various, and yet the same.—A pretty emblem this of the smaller differences between protestant Christians. There are modes in religion, which admit of variation, without prejudice to sound faith, or real holiness: just as the drapery, on these pictures of the spring, may be formed after a variety of patterns without blemishing their beauty, or altering their nature. Be it so then, that in some points of inconsiderable consequence, several of our brethren dissent; yet let us all live amicably and sociably together, for we harmonize in principles, though we vary in punctilios. Let us join in conversation, and intermingle interests; discover no estrangement of behaviour, and cherish no alienation of affection. If any strife subsist, let it be to follow our divine Master most closely, in humility of heart, and unblameableness of life; let it be to serve one another, most readily, in all the kind offices of a cordial friendship. Thus shall we be united, though distinguished; united in the same grand fundamentals, though distinguished by some small circumstances; united in one important bond of brotherly love, though distinguished by some slighter peculiarities of sentiment.

Between Christians, whose judgments disagree only about a form of prayer, or manner of worship, I apprehend there is no more essential difference than between flowers which bloom from the same kind of seed, but happen to be somewhat diversified in the mixture of their colours.—Whereas, if one denies the divinity of our Lord Jesus Christ, and degrades the incarnate God to the meanness of a mere creature; if another cries up the worthiness of human works, and depreciates the alone meritorious righteousness of the glorious Mediator; if a third addresses the incommunica-ble honours to a finite being, and bows to the image, or prays to the saint;—these are errors extremely derogatory to the Redeemer's dignity, and not a little prejudicial to the comfort of his people; against these to remonstrate, against these to urge every argument, and use every dissuasive, bespeaks not the censorious bigot, but the friend of truth, and the lover of mankind.—Whereas to stand neuter and silent, while such principles are propagated, would be an instance of criminal remissness, rather than of Christian moderation.—For the persons, we will not fail to maintain a tender compassion; we will not cease to put up earnest intercessions: we will also acknowledge and love whatever is excellent and amiable in their character. Yet we dare not subscribe their creed; we must not secrete our strong reasons; we cannot remit our assiduous but kind endeavours, if by any means we may reconcile them to a more scriptural belief, and a purer worship.*

Another remarkable circumstance, recommending the flowery creation is their regular succession. They make not their appearance all at once, but in an orderly rotation. While a proper number of these obliging retainers are in waiting, the others abscond, but hold themselves in a posture of service, ready to take their turn, and fill each his respective station, the instant it becomes vacant.—The snow-drop, foremost of the lovely train, breaks her way through the frozen soil, in order to present her early compliments to her Lord; dressed in the robe of innocency she steps forth, fearless of danger; long before the trees have ventured to unfold their leaves, even while the icicles are pendant on our houses.—Next, peeps out the crocus, but cautiously, and with an air of timidity. She hears the howling blasts, and skulks close to her low situation. Afraid she seems to make large excursions from her root, while so many ruffian winds are abroad and scouring along the ether.—Nor is the violent blast, in this shining embassy of the year; which, with all the embellishments that would grace a royal garden, condescends to line our hedges, and grow at the feet of briars. Freely and without any solicitation, she distributes the bounty of her emissive sweets; while herself, with an exemplary humility,

* In some former editions, I expressed myself, on this point unwarily and harshly. But my meaning, and real sentiments, were no other than those represented above.—The reader, from such unguarded intimations, might too naturally be led to conclude, that the author avows, and would stir up, a spirit of persecution. But this is a method of dealing with opponents in religious doctrines, which he disclaims as absurd, and abhors as iniquitous. He is for no force, but that of rational conviction, for no constraint but that of affectionate persuasion. Thus, if you please, compel them to come in. Luke xiv. 23.

as not discovering contrivance. But that work is beheld with admiration and delight, as the result of deep counsel, which is complicated in its parts, and yet simple in its operations, where a great variety of effects are seen to arise from one principle operating uniformly. — Abernethy on the Attributes.

retires from sight, seeking rather to administer pleasure than to win admiration.* Emblem, expressive emblem, of those modest virtues which delight to bloom in obscurity, which extend a cheering influence to multitudes, who are scarce acquainted with the source of their comforts! Motive, engaging motive, to that ever-active beneficence, which stays not for the importunity of the distressed, but anticipates their suit, and prevents them with the blessings of its goodness!—The poor polyanthus, that lately adorned the border with her sparkling beauties, and transplanted into our windows, gave us a fresh entertainment, is now no more. I saw her complexion fade; I perceived her breath decay, till at length she expired, and dropt into her grave. Scarce have we sustained this loss, but in comes the auricula, and more than retrieves it; arrayed she comes in a splendid variety of amiable forms! with an eye of crystal, and garments of the most glossy satin; exhaling perfume, and powdered with silver. A very distinguished procession this! the favourite care of the florist! Scarce one among them but is dignified with a character of renown, or has the honour to represent some celebrated toast. But these also, notwithstanding their illustrious titles, have exhausted their whole stock of fragrance, and are mingled with the meanest dust.—Who could forbear grieving at their departure, did not the tulips begin to raise themselves on their fine wands, or stately stalks? They flush the parterre with one of the gayest dresses that blooming nature wears. Did ever beau or belle make so gaudy an appearance, in a birth-night suit. Here one may behold the innocent wantonness of beauty! here she indulges a thousand freaks, and sports herself in the most charming diversity of colours; yet I should wrong her, were I to call her a coquet, because she plays her lovely changes, not to enkindle dissolute affections, but to display her Creator's glory. Soon arises the anemone, encircled at the bottom with a spreading robe, and rounded at the top into a beautiful dome. In its loosely-flowing mantle, you may observe a noble negligence; in its gently bending tufts, the nicest symmetry. I would term it the fine gentleman of the garden; because it seems to have learned the singular address of uniting simplicity with refinement, of reconciling art with ease. The same month has the merit of producing the ranunculus: All bold and graceful, it expands the riches of its foliage; and acquires by degrees the loveliest enamel in the world. As persons of intrinsic worth disdain the superficial arts of recommendation practised by fops; so this lordly flower scorns to borrow any of its excellence from powders and essences. It needs no such attractives to render it the darling of the curious, being sufficiently engaging, from the elegance of its figure, the radiant variety of its tinges, and a certain superior dignity of aspect. Methinks nature improves in her operations: her latest strokes are most masterly. To crown the collection, she introduces the carnation, which captivates every eye with a noble spread of graces, and charms another sense with a profusion of exquisite odours. This single flower has centered in itself the perfections of all the preceding; the moment it appears, it so commands our attention, that we scarce regret the absence of the rest. The gilly-flower, like a real friend, attends you through all the vicissitudes and alterations of the season. While others make a transient visit only, this is rather an inhabitant than a guest in our gardens; adds fidelity to complaisance.

It is in vain to attempt a catalogue of these amiable gifts: there is an endless multiplicity in their characters, yet an invariable order in their approaches. Every month, almost every week, has its peculiar ornaments; not servilely copying the works of its predecessor, but forming, still forming, and still executing some new design. So lavish is the fancy, yet so exact is the process of nature.

Here let me stand a while, to contemplate this distribution of flowers, through the several periods of the year.—Were they all to blossom together, there would be at once a promiscuous throng, and at once a total privation; we should scarce have an opportunity of adverting to the dainty qualities of half, and must soon lose the agreeable company of them all. But now, since every species has a separate post to occupy, and a distinct interval for appearing, we can take a leisurely and minute survey of each succeeding set. We can view and review their forms; enter into a more intimate acquaintance with their charming accomplishments, and receive all those pleasing services which they are commissioned to yield.—This remarkable piece of economy is productive of another very valuable effect. It not only places in the most advantageous light every particular community, but is also a sure provisional resource against the frailty of the whole nation; or, to speak more truly, it renders the flowery tribes a sort of immortal corps,* whose successory attendance never fails. For,

* In allusion to the celebrated practice of the Persian kings, "who maintained for their life-guard a body of troops called Immortal; because it perpetually subsisted; for as soon as any of the men died, another was immediately put into his place."

though some are continually dropping, yet by this expedient, others are as continually rising, to beautify our borders, and prolong the entertainment.

What goodness is this, to provide such a series of gratifications for mankind! both to diversify, and perpetuate the fine collation; to take care, that our paths should be in a manner incessantly strewn with flowers.— And what wisdom to bid every one of these insensible beings know the precise juncture of their coming forth! insomuch that no actor on a stage can be more exact in performing his part; can make a more regular entry, or a more punctual exit.

Who emboldens the daffodil to venture abroad in February, and to trust her flowery gold with inclement and treacherous skies? Who informs the various tribes of fruit-bearing blossoms, that vernal suns and a more genial warmth, are fittest for their delicate texture? Who teaches the clove to stay, till hotter beams are prepared, to infuse a spicy richness into her odours, and tincture her complexion with the deepest crimson?—Who disposes these beautiful troops into such orderly bodies, retarding some and accelerating others? Who has instructed them to file off, with such perfect regularity, as soon as the duty of their respective station is over? And when one detachment retires, who gives the signal for another immediately to advance? Who but that merrying Providence, which from the highest thrones of angels, to the very lowest degrees of existence, orders all things in “number, weight, and measure!”

These, O my soul, are the regulations of that most adorable, that most beneficent Being, who bowed the heavens, came down to dwell on earth, and united the frailty of thy mortal nature, to all the glories of his Godhead. All the honour of this admirable establishment belongs to thy Ransom, thy Surety, thy Saviour. To Him it belongs, who sustained the vengeance which thou hadst deserved, and wast doomed to suffer: who fulfilled the obedience, which thou wast obliged, but unable to perform, and who humbled himself (stupendous, ineffable, loving-kindness!) humbled himself to death, even the death of the cross.—He formed this vast machine, and adjusted its nice dependencies. The pillars, that support it, the embellishments that adorn it, and the laws that govern it, are the result of his unsearchable counsels. Oh! the heights of his majesty, and the depths of his abasement!

Which shall we admire most, his essential greatness, or his free grace? He created the exalted seraph, that sings in glory; and every the minutest insect, that flutters in air, or crawls in dust. He marks out a path for all those globes of light, which travel the circuit of the skies; and disdains not to rear the violet from its lowly bed, or to plait the daisy which dresses our plains. So grand are his operations, yet so condescending his regards!—If summer, like a sparkling bride, is brilliant and glorious in her apparel (what is this but a feeble reflection of his uncreated effulgence? If autumn, like a munificent host, opens her stores, and gives us all things richly to enjoy; what is this, but a little taste of his inexhaustible liberality? If thunders roar, you hear the sound of his trumpet; if lightnings glare, you see the launching of his glittering spear; if “the perpetual hills be scattered and the everlasting mountains bowed,” you behold a display—No says the prophet, you have rather the hiding of his power.* So immense is his power, so uncontrollable, and inconceivable, that all these mighty works are but a sketch, in which more is concealed than discovered.

Thus, I think, we should always view the visible system with an evangelical telescope, (if I may be allowed the expression) and with an evangelical microscope; regarding Christ Jesus as the great projector and architect, who planned, and executed the amazing scheme. Whatever is magnificent or valuable, tremendous or amiable, should ever be ascribed to the Redeemer. This is the Christian's natural philosophy. With regard to this method of considering the things that are seen, we have an inspired apostle for our preceptor and precedent. Speaking of Christ, he says, “Thou Lord, in the beginning hast laid the foundation of

* Hab. iii. 4. Nothing can be more magnificently conceived, than the imagery of this whole chapter; and upon the foot of our interpretation, nothing was ever more delicately and nobly turned, than the sentiment of this clause. Other senses of the passage, I acknowledge, may be assigned with equal propriety: But none, I think, can be imagined so majestic and sublime. As the original will fairly admit of it; as it carries no disagreement with the context; and expresses a most important, as well as undoubted truth; I hope I may be permitted to use it at least by way of accommodation.—Especially, as it suggests one of the finest mottoes imaginable, wherewith to inscribe all the visible productions of the Creator's hand.—When struck with astonishment we consider their grandeur, beauty, and consummate perfections; let us, in justice to their Author, apply the exalted reflection of this sacred ode: “In all these is the hiding rather than an adequate display of his matchless power. Though they challenge our praise, and surpass our comprehension; yet are they by no means the utmost exertions, but rather some slighter essays of omnipotent skill.”—Milton, relating the overthrow of the fallen angels, introduces a grand circumstance, not much unlike the preceding. Messiah, unaided and alone, had utterly routed an innumerable host of apostate spirits. This was great and marvellous. But to create a juster idea of the illustrious conqueror, our poet beautifully adds, Y'et half his strength he put not forth!

If we forget to make the same remark, when we contemplate God in his works, we must necessarily form very scanty conceptions of that Supreme Being before whom all nations are as a “drop of a bucket, and are accounted as the small dust of the balance.”

the earth; and the heavens are the work of thy hands."—Did we carefully attend to this leading principle, in all our examinations of nature, it would doubtless be a most powerful means of enkindling our love and strengthening our faith.* For when I look round upon millions of noble substances, and carry with me this transporting reflection, "The Maker of them all expired on a cross for me;" how can I remain any longer indifferent? Must not the coldest heart begin to glow with gratitude?—When I survey an immensity of the finest productions imaginable; and remember that the Author of them all is "my righteousness, and my redemption;" how can I choose but repose the most cheerful confidence in such a Mediator?

Let me add one more remark upon the admirable adjustment of every particular, relating to these fine colonies planted in the parterre.—With such accuracy and correctness is their structure finished, that any the least conceivable alteration would very much impair their perfection. Should you see, for instance, the nice disposition of the tulip's attire fly abroad, disorderly and irregular, like the flaunting woodbine; should the jessamine rear her diminutive head, on those grand columns which support the hollyhock; should the erect and manly aspect of the piony hang down with a pensive air like the flexible bells of the hyacinth; should that noble plainness which distinguishes the lily, be exchanged for the glittering fringes which edge the pink, or the gaudy stains which bedrop the iris; should those tapering pillars which arise in the middle of its vase, and tipt with golden pendants, give such a lustre to the surrounding pannels of alabaster,—should those sink and disappear, like the chives which cover the heart of the anemone:—In many of these cases, would not the transposition be fantastical and awkward, in all to the apparent prejudice of every individual.

Again, with regard to the time of their appearing, this circumstance is settled by a remarkable foresight and precaution. What would become of the sailor, if, in very stormy weather, he should raise a lofty mast, and crowd it with all his canvas? Such would be the ill effect, if the most stately species of flowers should presume to come abroad in the blustering months. Ah! how would they rue the imprudent boldness! Therefore, those only that shoot the shortest stems, and display the smallest spread of leaves, or, if you please, carry the least sail, are launched amidst the blowing seasons. How injudiciously would the perfumer act, if he should unseal his finest essences, and expose them to the northern winds, or wintery rains! Our blooming artists of the aromatic profession, at least the most delicate among them, seem perfectly aware of the consequences of such a procedure. Accordingly, they postpone the opening of their odoriferous treasures till a serener air, and more unclouded skies,* grant a protection to their amiable traffic, till they are under no more apprehensions of having their spicy cells rifled by rude blasts, or drowned in incessant showers.

What a striking argument is here for resignation, unfeigned resignation, to all the disposals of Providence! Too often are our dissatisfied thoughts apt to find fault with divine dispensations. We tacitly arraign our Maker's conduct, or question his kindness with regard to ourselves; we fancy our lot not so commodiously situated, or our condition not so happily cir-

* The apostles, I observe, delight to use this method of displaying the honours of the Redeemer, and establishing the faith of his people.—The beloved disciple, teaching that most precious doctrine, "of a Lamb slain to take away the sins of the world," in order to evince the sufficiency of Christ's sacrifice for this blessed purpose, affirms, that all things were made by him, and without him was not any thing, no, not so much as one single being made, John i. 3.—St. Paul, preaching the same glad tidings to the Colossians, and expressly maintaining that we have Redemption through his blood; seems to foresee an objection of this kind: "To expiate transgressions against an infinite Majesty, is a most prodigious act; it must cost vastly more than any common surety can pay, to redeem a sinful world. What reason have we to believe that Jesus is equal to this mighty undertaking?" All possible reason, replies the apostle, from the dignity of his person, for he is the image of the invisible God, and from the greatness of his works, for by him all things were made. Consider the operations of his hands, and you cannot doubt the atoning efficacy of his death, Col. i. 15, 16.—The author of the epistle to the Hebrews falls exactly into the same train of arguing; declaring that Christ Jesus has purged our sins by the sacrifice of himself: he proves his ample ability for this tremendous office from his essential excellence, because he is the brightness of his Father's glory) and from his admirable works, because he made the worlds, and upholdeth all things by the word of his power, Heb. i. 2, 3.—Which truth, as it is so important in itself, of such signal comfort to Christians, and so particularly insisted on by the inspired writers, I hope I shall need no apology for an attempt to illustrate and enforce it, in a kind of evangelical decant upon Creation, annexed to these Reflections.

* Casimir, in a very poetical manner, addresses himself to the dormant rose, and most prettily invites her to venture abroad, by the mention of these two circumstances.

Siderum sacros imitata vultus,
 Quid latos dudum, Rosa? Delicatum
 Effere terrib caput, O tepentis Filia cœli.
 Jam tibi nubes fugiunt aqueos,
 Quas fugant albis Zephyri, quadrigis;
 Jam tibi mulcet Boream jocantis. Aura Favoni.
 Child of the summer! charming rose!
 No longer in confinement lie;
 Arise to light, thy form disclose,
 Rival the spangles of the sky.
 The rains are gone, the storms are o'er;
 Winter retires to make thee way;
 Come then, thou sweetly blushing flow'r!
 Come, lovely stranger, come away.
 The sun is dress'd in beaming smiles,
 To give thy beauties to the day;
 Young zephyrs wait with gentlest gales,
 To fan thy bosom as they play.

circumstances as if we had been placed in some other station of life.—But let us behold this exquisitely nice regulation of the minutest plants, and be ashamed of our remaining folly. Could any fibre in their composition be altered, or one line in their features be transposed, without clouding some of their beauties? Could any fold in their vestments be varied, or any link in their orderly succession, be broken without injuring some delicate property? And does not that all-seeing eye, which preserves so exact a harmony among these pretty toys, maintain as watchful a care over his rational creatures? Does he choose the properest season for the cowslip to arise, and drink the dews? And can he neglect the concerns, or misjudge the conveniences of his sons and daughters? He, who has so completely disposed whatever pertains to the vegetable economy, that the least diminution or addition would certainly hurt the finished scheme, does, without all peradventure, preside, with equal attention, over the interests of his own people.

Be still then, thou uneasy mortal,* know that God is unerringly wise; and be assured, that amidst the great multiplicity of beings, he does not overlook thee. Thy Saviour has given me authority to assert, that thou art of far superior value in the estimation of omnipotence than all the herbage of the field. If his sacred will ordains sickness for thy portion, never dare to imagine, that uninterrupted health would be more advantageous. If he pleases to withhold, or take away children, never presume to conclude, that thy happiness is blasted, because thy hopes of an increasing family are disappointed. He that marshals all the starry host, and so accurately arranges every the meanest species of herbs; He orders all the peculiarities, all the changes of thy state, with a vigilance that nothing can elude, with a goodness that endureth for ever. Bow thy head, therefore, in humble acquiescence: rest satisfied that whatever is, by the appointment of Heaven,† is right, is best.

Good when he gives, supremely good,

Nor less, when he denies;

- Whatever is, is right.—If Mr. Pope understands the maxim according to the limitation expressed above, he speaks a most uncleanable and glorious

Among all the productions of the third creating day, this of flowers seems to be peculiarly designed for man. Man has the monopoly of this favour; it is conferred upon him by a sort of exclusive charter. See the imperial crown, splendid and beautifully grand! See the tube rose, delicate and languishingly fair! See all the pomp and glory of the parterre, where paint and perfume do wonders. Yet the inferior animals are neither smit with their beauties, nor regaled with their odours: The horse never stands still to gaze upon their charms; nor does the ox turn aside to browse upon their sweets. Senses they have to discern these curious objects in the gross, but no taste to distinguish or relish their fine accomplishments.—Just so, carnal and unenlightened men may understand the literal meaning of Scripture, may comprehend the evidences of its divine inspiration, yet have no relish of the heavenly truths it teaches, no ardent longing for the spiritual blessings it offers, and see "no form or comeliness" in the Saviour it describes, so as to render him the supreme desire of their souls.

The chief end of these beautiful appearances, philosophers say, is to enfold and cherish the embryo seed; or to swathe the tender body during its infant state. But, whatever is the chief end of nature, it is certain she never departs from the design of administering delight to mankind.* This is inseparably connected with her other views.—Were it only to secure a reproductive principle, what need of such elegant complications? Why so much art employed, and so many decorations added? Why should vestments be prepared richer than brocades, more delicate than lawns, and of a finer glow truth. But if that great poet includes whatever comes to pass through the wild and extravagant passions of men, surely no thinking person, at least no Christian, can accede to his opinion. What God orders is wise, beyond all possibility of correction, and good, above all that we can ask or think. His decrees are the result of infinite discernment, and his dispensations the issues of unbounded benevolence. But man, fallen man, is hurried away by his lusts, into a thousand irregularities which are deplorably evil in themselves, and attended with consequences manifestly pernicious to society.—Let the sentiment, therefore, be restrained to the disposals of Heaven, and I must readily subscribe it. But if it be extended to the conduct of men, and the effects of their folly, I think myself obliged to enter my protest against it. For whatever kindles the divine indignation—is cause of final ruin to the author—is strictly forbidden by God's holy word, is contrary to the whole design of his revealed will, and the very reverse of his essential attributes. This cannot possibly be right. This is most undoubtedly wrong. Omnipotence, indeed, can overrule it, and deduce good from it; but the very notion of overruling, supposes it to be absolutely wrong in itself.

* "We find that the most important parts in the vegetable world, are those which are the most beautiful. These are the seeds by which the several races of plants are propagated and continued, and which are always lodged in flowers or blossoms. Nature seems to hide her principal design, and to be industrious in making the earth gay and delightful, while she is carrying on her great work, and intent upon her own preservation."—Spectator, vol. v. No. 307.

than the most admired velvets? If the great mother had no other aim than barely to accommodate her little offspring, warm flannel, or homely fustian, would have served her turn; served it full as well as the most sumptuous tissue, or all the furniture of the mercer's shop.

Evident then it is, that flowers were endued with such enchanting graces for the pleasure of man. In pursuance of this original intention, they have always paid their court to the human race; they still seem particularly solicitous of recommending themselves to our regard. The finest of each species crowd about our habitations, and are rarely to be seen at a distance from our abodes. They thrive under our cultivating hand and observing eye; but degenerate and pine away, if unregarded by their lord.—To win his attention, and deck his retreats, they hide their deformities under ground, and display nothing but the most graceful forms and engaging colours, to his sight. To merit a farther degree of his esteem, the generality of them dispense a delightful perfume. What is still more obliging, they* reserve their richest exhalations to embalm his morning and evening walks.† Because he usually chooses those cool hours to recreate himself among their blooming ranks; therefore, at these hours, they are most lavish of their fragrance, and breathe out their choicest spirits.

O man, greatly beloved by the Creator! the darling of Providence! thou art distinguished by his goodness; distinguish thyself also by thy gratitude. Be it thy one undivided aim to glorify him, who has been at so much expense to gratify thee!—While all these inferior creatures in silent eloquence, declare the glory of God, do thou lend them thy tongue. Be thou the high-priest of the mute creation; let their praises become vocal in thy songs.—Adore the supreme Benefactor, for the blessings he showers down upon every order of beings; adore him for numberless mercies, which are appropriated to thyself; but above all, adore him, for that noble gift of a rational and immortal soul.—This constitutes us masters of the globe, and gives us the real enjoyment of its riches. This discovers ten thousand beauties, which otherwise had been lost; and renders them both a source of delights, and a nursery of devotion.—By virtue of this exalted principle, we are qualified to admire our Maker's works, and capable of bearing his illustrious image; bearing his illustrious image, not only when these ornaments of the ground have resigned their honours, but when the great origin of day is extinguished in the skies, and all the flaming orbs on high are put out in obscure darkness.—Then to survive, to survive the ruins of one world, and to enjoy God—to resemble God—to be “filled with all the fulness of God,” in another:—what a happiness, what an inestimable happiness is this! Yet this is thy privilege, (harter it not for trifles of an hour!) this is thy glorious prerogative, O man!

O! the goodness, the exuberant goodness, of our God! I cannot forbear celebrating it once more, before I pass to another consideration.—How much should we think ourselves obliged to a generous friend, who should build a stately edifice, purely for our abode*! but how greatly would the

* I cannot persuade myself that the comparison is stretched beyond proper bounds, when carried to this pitch. It is my steadfast opinion, that the world, at least this lower world, with its various appurtenances, was intended purely for man: that it is appropriated to him: and that he (in subordination to God's glory) is the end of its creation. Other animals, it is true, partake of the Creator's benefits, but then they partake, under the notion of man's domestics, or on the foot of retainers to; as creatures which bear some relation to his service, and some way or other contribute to his good, so that still he is the centre of the whole; or, as our incomparable Milton, equally master of poetry and divinity, expresses himself, All things live for man.—Par. Lost. book xi. ver. 161.

Mr. Pope, in his Ethic Epistles, is pleased to explode this tenet, as the height of pride and a gross absurdity. For my part, I see no reason for such a charge. With all submission to so superior a genius, it seems very remote from pride, to be duly sensible of favours vouchsafed, to contemplate them in all the extent of their munificence, and acknowledge them accordingly. I should rather imagine, that to contract their size, when they are immensely large; to stint their number, when they are altogether innumerable, that such a procedure savours more of insensibility, than our hypothesis of presumption, and has more in it of ingratitude than that of arrogance.

And how can it be deemed an absurdity, to maintain that God gave us a world for our possession, when it is our duty to believe that he gave us his only Son for our propitiation? Sure, it can be neither difficult nor extravagant to suppose, that he designed the habitable globe, with its whole furniture, for our present use, since he withheld not his only child Jesus, but freely delivered him up for our final salvation.

Upon the whole, I cannot but conclude, that the attempt of our famous poet, is neither kind with regard to his fellow creatures, nor grateful with regard to his Creator; neither is his scheme, in fact, true. The attempt not kind, with regard to man, because it robs him of one of the most delightful and ravishing contemplations imaginable. To consider the great Author of existence as having me in his eye when he formed universal nature, as contriving all things with an immediate view to the exigencies of my particular state; and making them all in such a manner as might be most conducive to my particular advantage; this must occasion the strongest satisfaction, whenever I cast a glance on the objects that surround me. Not grateful with regard to God, because it has the most direct tendency to diminish our sense of his kindness, and, by that means, to throw a damp upon our gratitude. It teaches us to look upon ourselves as almost lost among a crowd of other beings, or regarded only with an occasional and incidental beneficence, which must certainly weaken the disposition, and indeed slacken the ties, to the most adoring thankful-obligation be increased, if the hand that built should also furnish it! and not only furnish it with all that is commodious and comfortable, but ornament it also with whatever is splendid and delightful! This has our most indulgent Creator done in a manner infinitely surpassing all we could wish or imagine.

The earth is assigned us for a dwelling—The skies are stretched over us, like a magnificent canopy dyed in the purest azure; and beautified, now with pictures of floating silver, now with colourings of reflected crimson.—The grass is spread under us as a spacious carpet, wove with silken threads of green, and damasked with flowers of every hue.—The sun, like a golden lamp, is hung out in the etherial vault; and pours effulgence all the day, to enlighten our paths.—When night approaches, the moon takes up the friendly office; and the stars are kindled in twinkling myriads, to cheer the darkness with their milder lustre, not to disturb our repose by too intense a glare.—The clouds, besides the rich paintings they hang around the heavens, act the part of a shifting screen; and defend us, by their seasonable interposition, from the scorching beams of summer. May we not also regard them as the great watering pot of the globe, which, wafted on the wings of the wind, dispense their moisture* evenly through the universal garden; and fructify with their showers, whatever our hand plants?—The fields are our exhaustless granary.—The ocean is our vast reservoir.—The animals spend their strength to dispatch our business; resign their clothing to replenish our wardrobe; and surrender their very lives to provide for our tables.—In short, every element is a store-house of conveniences, every season brings us to choicest productions; all nature is our caterer.—And which is a most endearing recommendation of these favours, they are as lovely as they are useful. You observe nothing mean or inelegant. All is clad in beauty's fairest robe,* and regulated by proportion's nicest rule. The whole scene exhibits a fund of pleasures to the imagination, at the same time that it more than supplies all our wants.†

Therefore thou art inexcusable, O man, whosoever thou art, that rebellest against thy Maker. He surrounds thee with unnumbered benefits, and follows thee with an effusion of the richest, noblest gifts. He courts thy affections, he solicits thy gratitude, by liberalities which are never intermitted, by a bounty which knows no limits.—Most blessed Lord, let this thy goodness, thy unwearied goodness, lead us to repentance. Win us to thyself, thou fountain of felicity, by these sweet inducements. Draw us to our duty, thou God of our salvation, by these “cords of love.”

What a living picture is here of the beneficial effects of industry! By industry and cultivation, this neat spot is an image of Eden. Here is all that can entertain the eye, or regale the smell.‡ Whereas without cultivation, this sweet garden had been a desolate wilderness; vile thistles had made it loathsome, and tangling briars inaccessible. Without cultivation, it might have been a nest for serpents, and the horrid haunt of venomous creatures. But the spade and pruning knife, in the hand of industry, have improved it into a sort of terrestrial paradise.

ness. To which I apprehend we may justly add, neither is the scheme, in fact, true. For, not to mention what might be urged from the sure word of revelation, this one argument appears sufficiently conclusive. The world began with man, the world must cease with man; consequently, the grand use, the principal end of the world is, to subserve the interests of man. It is, on all sides, agreed, that the edifice was erected when man was to be furnished with an habitation, and that it will be demolished, when man has no further need of its accommodations. When he enters into the “house not made with hands, eternal in the heavens, the earth, and all the works that are therein, shall be burnt up.” From which it seems a very obvious and fair deduction, that man is the final cause of this inferior creation.

So that I think my readers and myself, privileged (not to say, on the principles of gratitude, obliged) to use those lovely lines of our author, with a propriety and truth, equal to their elegance and beauty:

For me kind nature wakes her genial pow'r,
Suckles each herb, and spreads out every flow'r!
Annual, for me, the grape, the rose, renew
The juice nectarous, and the balmy dew;
For me, the mine a thousand treasures brings;
For me, health gushes from a thousand springs.

Eth. Ep. i. ver. 120.

* This circumstance, amidst abundance of other delicate and edifying remarks upon the wonders of nature, is finely touched in the philosophical transactions recorded in the book of Job, chap. xxxviii. 15.—Who hath divided the water-course for the overflowing of waters? The Hebrew is so pregnant and rich with sense, that no translation can do it justice. The following paraphrase, perhaps, may represent the principal ideas comprehended in the expressive original: Who hath branched out, and with admirable judgment, disposed a variety of aqueducts for that immense collection of waters which float in the sky? Who distributes those pendulous floods through all the bowders of the earth? distributes them not in dreadful cataracts, or promiscuous gluts of rain, but in kindly drops of refreshing showers, with as much regularity and economy, as if they were conveyed by pipes from a conduit?—To whom shall we ascribe that niceness of contrivance, which now emits, now restrains them; sometimes drives their humid train to one place, and sometimes to another; dispenses them to this soil in larger, to that in smaller communications: and, in a word, so manages the mighty fluid, that every spot is supplied in exact proportion to its wants, none destroyed by an undistinguished deluge.

† Perhaps it was from such an observation that the Greeks, those critical and refined judges of things, expressed the mundane system, by a word which signifies beauty.

‡ “These several living creatures, which are made for our service, or sustenance, at the same time either fill the woods with music, furnish us with game, or raise pleasing ideas in us by the delightfulness of their appearance. Fountains, lakes, and rivers, are as refreshing to the imagination as to the soil through which they pass.”—Spectator, vol. v. No. 337.

How naturally does this lead our contemplation, to the advantages which flow from a virtuous education, and the miseries which ensue from the neglect of it!—The mind, without early instruction, will, in all probability, become like the “vineyard of the sluggard.” If left to the propensities of its own depraved will, what can we expect, but the most luxuriant growth of unruly appetites, which, in time may break forth in all manner of scandalous irregularities? What!—but that anger, like a prickly thorn, arm the temper with an untractable moroseness; peevishness, like a stinging nettle, render the conversation irksome and forbidding; avarice, like some choaking weed, teach the fingers to gripe, and the hands to oppress; revenge, like some poisonous plant, replete with baneful juices, rankle in the breasts, and meditate mischief to its neighbour; while unbridled lusts, like swarms of noisome insects, taint each rising thought, and render “every imagination of the heart only evil continually.”—Such are the usual products of savage nature! such the furniture of the uncultivated soil!

Whereas, let the mind be put under the “nurture and admonition of the Lord;” let holy discipline clear the soil; let sacred instruction sow it with the best seed; let skill and vigilance dress the rising shoots, direct the young ideas how to spread, the wayward passions how to move—then, what a different state of the inner-man will quickly take place; charity will breathe her sweets, and hope expand her blossoms; the personal virtues display their graces, and the social ones their fruits:† the sentiments become generous; the carriage endearing, the life honourable and useful.‡

O! that governors of families and masters of schools would watch, with a conscientious solicitude, over the morals of their tender charge! What pity is it that the advancing generations should lose these invaluable endowments through any supineness in their instructors!—See! with what assiduity the curious florist attends his little nursery; he visits them early and late, furnishes them with the properest mould, supplies them with seasonable moisture, guards them from the ravages of insects, screens them from the injuries of the weather, marks their springing buds, observes them attentively through their whole progress, and never intermits his anxiety, till he beholds them blown into full perfection.—And shall a range of painted leaves, which flourish to-day, and to-morrow fall to the ground,—shall these be tended with more zealous application than the exalted faculties of an immortal soul!

Yet trust not in cultivation alone. It is the blessing of the almighty Husbandman which imparts success to such labours of love. If God “seal up the bottles of heaven,” and command the clouds to withhold their fatness, the best manured plot becomes a barren desert. And if He restrain the dew of his heavenly benediction, all human endeavours miscarry; the rational plantation languishes; our most pregnant hopes from youths of the most promising genius prove abortive. Their root will be as rottenness, and their blossoms will go up as dust. (Isa. v. 24.) Therefore, let parents plant, let tutors water, but let both look up to the Father of spirits for the desired increase.

On every side, I espy several budding flowers. As yet they are like bales of superfine cloth from the packer's warehouse. Each is wrapt within a strong inclosure, and its contents are tied together by the firmest bandages. So that all their beauties lie concealed, and all their sweets are locked up.—Just such is the niggardly wretch, whose aims are all turned inward, and meanly terminated upon himself, who makes his own private interest or personal pleasure, the sole centre of his designs, and the scanty circumference of his actions.

Ere long, the searching beams will open these silken folds, and draw them into graceful expansion. Then what a lovely blush will glow in their cheeks; and what a balmy odour exhale from their bosoms! So, when divine grace shines upon the mind, even the clurl becomes bountiful; the heart of stone is taken away, and a heart of flesh, a heart susceptible of the softest, most compassionate emotions, is introduced in its stead. O! how sweetly do the social affections dilate themselves, under so benign an influence! Just like those disclosing gems, under the powerful eye of day. The tender regards are no longer confined to a single object, but extend themselves into a generous concern for mankind, and shed liberal refreshments on all within their reach.*

* Neglectis urenda filix inascitur agris.—Horace.

† This transformation of the heart, and renewal of the life, are represented in scripture, by similitudes very nearly allied to the image used above—God, by his sanctifying Spirit, will make the soul as a watered garden. Under the operation of this divine principle, the desert shall rejoice, and blossom as the rose. Who ever it exerts the refining and ennobling energy. “instead of the thorn, shall come up the fir-tree; and, instead of the brier, the myrtle-tree,” Jer. xxxi. 12. Isa. xxxv. 1, and lv. 13.

The principles we imbibe, and the habits we contract, in our early years, are not matters of small moment, but of the utmost consequence imaginable. They not only give a transient or superficial tincture to our first appearance in life, but most commonly stamp the form of our whole future conduct, and even of our eternal state.

* The prophet, describing the charitable temper, very beautifully says, “If thou draw out thy soul to the hungry!”—This, I think may not improperly be illustrated by the circumstances observed above. The Arise then, thou Sun of Righteousness ; arise with healing under thy wings ; and transfuse thy gentle, but penetrating ray through all our intellectual powers. Enlarge every narrow disposition, and fill us with a diffusive benevolence. Make room in our breasts for the whole human race, and teach us to love all our fellow-creatures for their amiable Creator's sake. May we be pleased with their excellencies, and rejoice in their happiness, but feel their miseries as our own, and with a brother's sympathy, hasten to relieve them, Disposed at proper distances, I observe a range of strong and stately stalks. They stand like towers along the walls of a fortified city, or rise like lofty spires amidst the group of houses. They part at the top into several pensile spiky pods, from each of which we shall see a fine figure displacing itself ; rounded into a form which constitutes a perfect circle ; spread wide open, into the most frank and communicative air ; and tinged with the colour, which is so peculiarly captivating to the miser's eye.

But the property I chiefly admire, is its passionate fondness for the sun. When the evening shades take place, the poor flower droops, and folds up its leaves. It mourns all the long night, and pines amidst the gloom, like some forlorn lover, banished from the object of his affections. No sooner does providence open "the eye-lids of the morning," but it meets and welcomes the returning light ;* courts and caresses it all the day ; nor ever loses sight of the resplendent charmer, so long as he continues above the horizon. In the morning, you may perceive it presenting a golden bosom to the east ; at noon, it points upward to the middle sky ; in the evening, follows the same attractive influence to the west.

Surely nature is a book, and every page rich with secret hints. To an attentive mind, the garden turns preacher, and its blooming tenants are so many lively sermons. What an engaging pattern, and what an excellent lesson have we here ! So, let the redeemed of the Lord look unto Jesus, (Heb. xii. 2.) and be conformed to their beloved. Let us all be heliotropes (if I may use the expression) to the Sun of Righteousness. Let our passions rise and fall, take this course or that, as his word determines, as his holy example guides. Let us be so accommodated, both to his commanding and providential will, as the wax is turned to the imprinted seal ; or, as the aspect of this enamoured flower, to the splendid star which creates our day.

In every enjoyment, O thou watchful Christian, look unto Jesus ; receive it as proceeding from his love, and purchased by his agonies.* In every tribulation look unto Jesus ; mark his gracious hand, managing the scourge, or mingling the bitter cup ; attempering it to a proper degree of severity ; adjusting the time of its continuance ; and ready to make these seeming disasters productive of real good. In every infirmity and failing, look unto Jesus, thy merciful high priest, pleading his atoning blood, and making intercession for transgressors. In every prayer look unto Jesus, thy prevailing advocate, recommending thy devotions, and "bearing the iniquity of thy holy things." (Exod. xxviii. 38.) In every temptation, look unto Jesus, the author of thy strength, and captain of thy salvation, who alone is able to lift up the hands which hang down, to invigorate the enfeebled knees, and make thee more than conqueror over all thy enemies ; but especially when the hour of thy departure approaches ; when "thy flesh and thy heart fail ;" when all the springs of life are irreparably breaking, then look unto Jesus with a believing eye.† Like expiring Stephen, behold him standing at the right hand of God, on purpose to succour his people in this their last extremity. Yes, my Christian friend, when thy journey through life is finished, and thou art arrived on the very verge of immortality ; when thou art just launched out into the invisible world, and all before thee is vast eternity ; then, O then, be sure to look steadfastly unto Jesus ! "See by faith the Lord's Christ." View him as the only way (John xiv. 6.) to the everlasting mansions, as the only door (John x. 9.) to the abodes of bliss.

Yonder tree, which faces the south, has something too remarkable to pass without observation. Like the fruitful though feeble vine, she brings forth a large family of branches, but, unable to support them herself, commits them to the tuition of a sunny wall. As yet the tender twigs have scarce gemmed their future blossoms. However, I may anticipate the well known productions, and picture to myself the passion-flower, which will, in due time, with a long and copious succession, adorn the boughs.

opening of those buds into a large and extensive spread, is a pretty portrait of the amplitude of a generous heart, which cannot shut up its compassion, or remain unconcerned at any human calamity. The freshness and copiousness with which the expanded flowers are continually pouring out their choicest essences, may represent the various acts of an unwaried liberality, together with those endearing words, and that cordial affection, which embalm, as it were, a gift, double its value ; and constitute, what the sacred poem styles, drawing out the soul, Deprompscis animam tuam, Isa. lviii. 10.

† "Look unto me, and be ye saved, all the ends of the earth," Isa. xiv. 22.

I have read, in a Latin author, of flowers inscribed with the names of kings;* but here is one emblazoned with the marks of the bleeding Prince of Life. I read in the inspired writings, of apostolic men, who bore about in their bodies the dying of the Lord Jesus; (2 Cor. iv. 10.) but here is a blooming religioso, that carries apparent memorials of the same tremendous and fatal catastrophe. Who would have expected to find such a tragedy of woe exhibited in a collection of the most delicate delights? or to see Calvary's horrid scene pourtrayed on the softest ornaments of the garden? Is nature then actuated by the noble ambition of paying commemorative honours to her agonizing Sovereign? Is she kindly officious to remind forgetful mortals of that miracle of mercy, which it is their duty to contemplate, and their happiness to believe? Or, is a sportive imagination my interpreter; and all the supposed resemblance, no more than the precarious gloss of fancy? Be it so; yet even fancy has her merit, when she sets forth, in such pleasing imagery, the crucified Jesus. Nor shall I refuse a willing regard to imagination herself, when she employs her creative powers to revive the sense of such unparalleled love, and prompt my gratitude to so divine a friend.

That spiral tendril, arising from the bottom of the stalk, is it a representation of the scourge which lashed the Redeemer's unspotted flesh, and inflicted those stripes by which our souls are healed! Or, is it twisted for the cord which bound his hands in painful and ignominious confinement; those beneficent hands, which were incessantly stretched out to unloose the heavy burdens, and to impart blessings of every choice kind?—Behold the nails which were drenched in his sacred veins, and rivetted his feet to the accursed tree; those beautiful feet,† which always went about doing good; and travelled far and near, to spread the glad tidings of everlasting salvation. See the hammer, ponderous and massy, which drove the rugged iron through shivering nerves, and forced a passage for those dreadful wedges, between the dislocated bones. View the thorns, which encircled our royal Master's brow, and shoot their keen afflictive points into his blessed head. O the smart! the racking smart! when, instead of the triumphal laurel, or the odoriferous garland, that pungent and ragged wreath was planted on the meek Messiah's forehead! when violent and barbarous blows of the strong Eastern cane,* struck the prickly crown, and fixed every thorn deep in his throbbing temples.† There stand the disciples, ranged in the green empalement; and forming a circle round the instruments of their great Commander's death. They appear like so many faithful adherents, who breathe a gallant resolution, either of defending their Lord to the last extremity, or of dropping honourably by his side. But did they give such proofs of zeal and fidelity in their conduct, as their steady posture, and determined aspect, seem to promise? Alas! what is all human firmness, when destitute of succours from above, but an expiring vapour? What is every saint, if unsupported by powerful grace, but an abandoned traitor! Observe the glory delineated in double rays, grand with imperial purple, and rich with ætherial blue. But, ah! how incapable are threads, though spun by summer's finest hand, though dyed in snows, or dipped in heaven, to display the immaculate excellency of his human, or the ineffable majesty of his divine nature! Compared with these sublime perfections, the most vivid assemblage of colours fades into an unmeaning flatness; the most charming effects of light and shade are not only mere daubings, but an absolute blank.

Among all the beauties which shine in sunny robes, and sip the silver dews, this, I think, has the noblest import, if not the finest presence. Were they all to pass in review, and expect the award of superiority from my decision, I should not hesitate a moment. Be the prize assigned to this amiable candidate, which has so eminently distinguished, and so highly dignified herself, by bearing such a remarkable resemblance to the "righteous Branch, the Plant of renown."‡ While others appoint it a place in the parterre, I would transplant the passion flower, or rather transfer its sacred significancy to my heart. There let it bloom, both in summer and in winter;

* They took the reed, says the sacred historian, and smote him on the head; "and so, as it were, nailed down the thorns into his forehead and temples, and occasioned thereby exquisite pain, as well as a great effusion of blood."—Family Expositor, vol. ii. sect. 188.—"It is most probable," adds the same judicious critic, "this was a walking-staff, which they put into his hand as a sceptre; for a blow with a slight reed would scarce have been felt, or have deserved a mention in a detail of such dreadful sufferings."

† The smart attending this unparalleled piece of contempt and barbarity, must be inexpressibly severe; not only on account of the many painful punctures made in the flesh, but principally, because of the periosteum, an exquisitely sensible tegument of the bones, lying in those parts very near the external skin, must receive a multitude of terrible wounds, the anguish of which could not fail of being inflamed to an excess of rage, by the continuance of so many thorny lancets, in that extremely tender membrane; which, in such a case, — Trembling alive all o'er,

Must smart and agonize at every pore.

‡ So the blessed Jesus is described, Jer. xxiii. 5. Ezek. xxxiv. 29.

bloom in the most impressive characters, and with an undecaying lustre. That I also may wear,—wear on my very soul, the traces of Immanuel, pierced for my sins, and bruised for my transgressions. That I also may be crucified with Christ, (Gal. ii. 20.) at least in penitential remorse, and affectionate sympathy. That I may know the fellowship of his sufferings, (Phil. iii. 10.) and feel all my evil affections wounded by his agonies, mortified by his death.

There is another subject of the verdant kingdom, which, on account of its very uncommon qualities, demands my particular notice. One so extremely diffident in her disposition, and delicate in her constitution, that she dares not venture herself abroad in the open air, but is nursed up in the warmth of a hot-bed, and lives cloistered in the cells of a green-house. But the most curious peculiarity is, that of all her kindred species, she alone partakes of perceptive life; at least, advances nearest to this more exalted state of being, and may be looked upon as the link which connects the animal and the vegetable world. A stranger observing her motions, would almost be induced to suspect that she is endued with some inferior degrees of consciousness and caution: For, if you offer to handle this sensitive plant, she immediately takes the alarm, hastily contracts her fibres, and, like a person under apprehensions of violence, withdraws from your finger in a kind of precipitate disorder. Perhaps the beauty of her aspect might be sullied, or the niceness of her texture discomposed, by the human touch. Therefore, like a coy virgin, she recedes from all unbecoming familiarities, and will admit no such improper, if not pernicious freedoms.

Whatever be the cause of this unusual effect, it suggests an instructive admonition to the Christian. Such should be our apprehensive timorous care with regard to sin, and all, even the most distant approaches of vice. So should we avoid the very appearance of evil, and stand aloof from every occasion of falling. If sinners entice, if forbidden pleasures tempt, or if opportunity beckon, with the gain of injustice in her hand, O! turn from the gilded snare; touch not the beautiful bane; but fly, fly with haste, fly without any delay, from the bewitching ruin. Does anger draw near with her lighted torch, to kindle the flame of resentment in our breasts? Does flattery ply our ears with her enchanting and intoxicating whispers? would discontent lay her leaden hand upon our temper, and mould into our minds her sour leaven, in order to make us a burden to ourselves, and unamiable to others? Instantly let us divert our attention from the dangerous objects; and not so much endeavour to antidote as to shun the moral contagion. Let us revolve in our meditations that wonderful meekness of our distressed Master, which, amidst the most abusive and provoking insults, maintained an uniform tenor of unshaken serenity. Let us contemplate that prodigious humiliation, which brought him, from an infinite height above all worlds, to make his bed in the dust of death. Let us soothe our jarring, our uneasy passions, with the remembrance of that cheerfulness and resignation, which rendered him in the deepest poverty, unfeignedly thankful, and under the heaviest tribulations, most submissively patient.

Harbour not, on any consideration, the betrayer of your virtue. Always maintain a holy sensibility of soul. Be deaf, inflexibly deaf, to every beguiling solicitation. It obtrude into the unguarded heart, give it no entertainment, no, not for a moment. To parley with the enemy, is to open a door for destruction. Our safety consists in flight; and, in this case, suspicion is the truest prudence; fear, the greatest bravery. Play not on the brink of the precipice; flutter not around the edges of the flame. Dally not with the stings of death. But reject, with a becoming mixture of solicitude and abhorrence, the very first insinuations of iniquity as cautiously as the smarting sore shrinks even from the softest hand, as constantly as this jealous plant recoils the approaching touch.*

Not long ago, these curious productions of the spring were coarse and misshapen roots. Had we opened the earth, and beheld them in their seed, how uncouth and contemptible had their appearance been! But now they are the boast of nature, the delights of the sons of men, finished patterns for enamelling and embroidery, outshining even the happiest strokes of the pencil. They are taught to bloom, but

* The prophet Isaiah, in an elegant and lively description of the upright man, says, "He shaketh his hands from holding of bribes;" and, I may add, from practising any kind of iniquity. The image, exceedingly beautiful and equally expressive, both illustrates and enforces the doctrine of this whole section.—Shaketh his hands, just as a person would do, who happens to have burning coals fall into his lap, or some venomous creature fastening upon his flesh. In such a case, none would stand a moment to consider, or to debate with himself the expediency of the thing, he would instantly fling off the pernicious incumbrance, instantly endeavour to disengage himself from the clinging mischief. Isa. xxxiii. 15.

I have perceived the danger of not extinguishing immediately the very first sparks of temptation, in a variety of views. I excuse a proper behaviour in this conjuncture, is of such vast importance to the purity, the safety, and the comfort of our minds. Because I had the royal moralist in my eye, who, deterring his pupils from the path of the wicked, cries with an air of deep concern, and in the language of vehement importunity, cries, Avoid it; pass not by it; turn from it, and pass away. How strongly is the counsel urged, by being so frequently repeated, in such a remarkable diversity of concise and abrupt, consequently of forcible and pressing admonitions. Prov. iv. 15.

with a very inferior lustre,* in the richest tapestries and most magnificent silks. Art never attempts to equal their incomparable elegancies; but places all her merit in copying after these delicate originals. Even those who glitter in silver, or whose clothing is wrought of gold, are desirous to borrow additional ornaments from a sprig of jessamine, or a little assemblage of pinks.

What a fine idea may we form from hence, of the resurrection of the just, and the state of their re-animated bodies! As the roots even of our choicest flowers, when deposited in the ground, are rude and ungraceful; but when they spring up into blooming life, are most elegant and splendid; so the flesh of a saint, when committed to the dust, alas! what is it? A heap of corruption; a mass of putrefying clay. But when it obeys the great arch-angel's call, and starts into a new existence, what an astonishing change ensues! what a most ennobling improvement takes place! That which was sown in weakness is raised in all the vivacity of power. That which was sown in deformity, is raised in the bloom of celestial beauty. Exalted, refined, and glorified, it will shine "as the brightness of the firmament," when it darts the inimitable blue, through the fleeces,—the snowy fleeces, of some cleaving cloud.

Fear not, then, thou faithful Christian; fear not, at the appointed time, to descend into the tomb. Thy soul thou mayest trust with thy omnipotent Redeemer, who is Lord of the unseen world; "who has the keys of hell and of death." Most safely thou mayest trust thy better part, in those beneficent hands, which were pierced with nails, and fastened to the ignominious tree, for thy salvation. With regard to thy earthly tabernacle be not dismayed: it is taken down only to be rebuilt upon a diviner plan, and in a more heavenly form. If it retires into the shadow of death, and lies immured in the gloom of the grave, it is only to return from a short confinement to endless liberty. If it falls into dissolution, it is in order to rise more illustrious from its ruins; and wear an infinitely brighter face of perfection and of glory.†

Having now made my panegyric, let me next take up a lamentation for these lovely productions of the vegetable world. For I foresee their approaching doom: Yet a little while, and all these pleasing scenes vanish; yet a little while, and all the sweets of the breathing, all the beauties of the blooming spring are no more. Every one of these amiable forms must be shrivelled to deformity, and trodden to the earth.—Significant resemblance this of all-created beauty. All flesh is grass; like the green herbage liable and prone to fade. Nay, all the goodness thereof, its fine accomplishments, and what the world universally admires, is as the flower of the field, (Isa. xl. 6.) which looses its gloss, decays, and perishes more speedily than the grass itself. Behold, then, ye brightest among the daughters of Eve; behold yourselves in this glass. See the charms of your Persian eclipsed, by the lustre of these little flowers, and the frailty of your state represented by their transient glories.* A fever may scorch those polished veins; a consumption may emaciate the dimpling cheeks; and a load of unexpected sorrows depress those lively spirits. Or, should these disasters, in pity, spare the tender frame; yet age, inexorable age, and wrinkles will assuredly come at last; will wither all the fine features, and blast every sprightly grace.

Then, ye fair, when those sparkling eyes are darkened, and sink in their orbs, when they are rolling in agonies, and swimming in death,—how will you sustain the affliction? how will you repair the loss? Apply your thoughts to religion; attend to the one thing needful. Believe in, and imitate the blessed Jesus; then shall your souls mount up to the realms of happiness, when the well-proportioned clay is mingled with its mean original. The light of God's countenance will irradiate, with matchless and consummate perfection, all their exalted faculties. Cleansed entirely from every dreg of corruption, like some unsullied

* The reader will excuse me, if I imitate rather than translate the following lines from Theocritus; if I vary one image, add another, and give a new turn to the whole.

When snows descend, and robe the fields
In winter's bright array;
Touch'd by the sun the lustre fades,
And weeps itself away.

When spring appears; when violets blow,
And shed a rich perfume,
How soon the fragrance breathes its last,
How short-liv'd is the bloom!

Fresh in the morn the summer rose
Hangs with'ring ere 'tis noon,
We scarce enjoy the balmy gift,
But mourn the pleasure gone.

With gliding fire, an ev'ning star
Streaks the autumnal skies,
Shook from the sphere, it darts away,
And in an instant dies.

Such are the charms that flush the cheeks,
And sparkle in the eye;
So, from that lovely finish'd form
The transient graces fly.

To this the seasons, as they roll,
Their attestations bring;
They warn the fair; their ev'ry round,
Confirms the truth I sing.

mirror, they will reflect the complete image of their Creator's holiness. O! that you would thus dress your minds, and prepare for the immortal state! Then from shining among your fellow-creatures on earth, you shall be translated, to shine around the throne of God. Then from the sweetness of our life, and the delight of our eyes here below, you shall pass, by an easy transition, into angels of light; and become "an everlasting excellency, the joy of all generations." Yes; ye flowery nations ye must all decay. Yonder lily that looks like the queen of the gay creation; see, how gracefully it erects its majestic head! What an air of dignity and grandeur ennobles its aspect! For elevated mien, as well as for incomparable lustre, justly may it be preferred to the magnificent monarch of the east. (Mat. vi. 29.) But all stately, and charming as it is, it will hardly survive a few more days; that unspotted whiteness must quickly be tarnished, and the snowy form defiled in the dust.

As the lily pleases with the noble simplicity of its appearance, the tulip is admired for the gaiety and multiplicity of its colours. What a profusion of dyes adorn its painted cup! Its tinges are so glowing, its contrasts so strong, and the arrangement of them both so elegant and artful!—It was lately the pride of the border, and the reigning beauty of the delightful season. As exquisitely fine as the rainbow, and almost as extremely transient; it spread for a little moment its glittering plumage, but has now laid all its variegated and superior honours down. Those radiant stripes are blended, alas! rudely blended, with common mould.

To a graceful shape and blooming complexion, the rose adds the most agreeable perfume. Our nostrils make it repeated visits, and are never weary of drinking in its sweets. A fragrance so peculiarly rich and reviving transpires from its opening tufts, that every one covets its acquaintance. How have I seen even the accomplished Clarissa, for whom so many votaries languish, fondly caressing this little flower. That lovely bosom, which is the seat of innocence and virtue; whose least excellency it is to rival the delicacy of the purest snows, among a thousand charms of its own, thinks it possible to adopt another from the damask rose-bud.—Yet even this universal favourite must fail. Its native balm cannot preserve it from putrefaction. Soon, soon must it resign all those endearing qualities, and hang neglected on its stem, or drop despised to the ground.

One could wish, methinks, these most amiable of the inanimate race, a longer existence, but in vain, they fade almost as soon as they flourish; within less than a month their glories are extinct. Let the sun take a few more journeys through the sky; then visit this enchanting walk, and you will find nothing but a wretched wilderness of ragged or naked stalks.—But (my soul exults in the thought) the garment of celestial glory which shall ere long array the re-animated body, will never wax old, the illustrious robes of a Saviour's consummate righteousness, which are appointed to deck the justified spirit, are incorruptible and immortal. No moth can corrode their texture, no number of ages sully their brightness. The light of day may be quenched, and all the stars sink in obscurity; but the honours of "just men made perfect" are subject to no diminution, inextinguishing and unfading is the lustre of their crown.

Yes, ye flowery nations, ye must all decay.—Winter, like some enraged and irresistible conqueror, that carries fire and sword wherever he advances, that demolishes towns, depopulates countries, spreads slaughter and desolation on every side; so, just so, will Winter with his savage and unrelenting blasts invade this beautiful prospect. The storms are gathering, and the tempest mustering their rage to fall upon the vegetable kingdoms. They will ravage through the dominions of nature, and plunder her riches and lay waste her charms.—Then ye trees, must ye stand stript of your verdant apparel; and ye fields be spoiled of your waving treasures. Then the earth, disrobed of all her gay attire, must sit in sables, like a disconsolate widow. The sun too, who now rides in triumph round the world, and scatters gaiety from his radiant eye, will then look faintly from the windows of the South; and, casting a short glance on our dejected world, will leave us to the uncomfortable gloom of tedious nights.—Then these pretty choristers of the air will chant no more to the gentle gales; the lark, the linnet, and all the feathered songsters abandon their notes, and indulge their woes. The harmony of the woods is at an end; and silence, (unless it be interrupted by howling winds) sullen silence sits brooding upon the boughs which are now made vocal by a thousand warbling throats.

But (sweet recollection! ravishing expectation!) the songs of saints in light never admit a pause for sadness. All heaven will resound with the melody of their gratitude; and all eternity echo to their triumphal acclamations. The hallelujahs of that world, and the harmonious joy of its inhabitants, will be as lasting as the divine perfections they celebrate.—Come then, holy love, and tune my heart, descend, celestial fire, and touch my tongue, that I may stand ready to strike up and bear my part, in that great hosanna, that everlasting hymn.

Yes, yes, ye flowery nations, ye must all decay. And, indeed, could you add the strength of an oak, or the stability of a pyramid,* to all the delicacy of your texture; yet short, exceeding short, even then, would your duration be. For I see that all things come to an end. The pillars of nature are tottering; the foundations of the round world are falling away; the "heavens themselves wax old like a garment." But, amidst these views of general ruin, here is our refuge; this is our consolation; we know that our Redeemer liveth. Thy years, blessed Jesus, shall not fail. From everlasting to everlasting, thou art still the same; the same most excellent and adorable person; the same omnipotent and faithful friend, the same all-sufficient and inestimable portion. O! may we but partake of thy merits, be sanctified by thy grace, and received into thy glory! Then, perish if ye will, all inferior delights. Let all that is splendid in the skies expire, and all that is amiable in nature be expunged. Let the whole extent of creation be turned again into one indistinguishable void, one universal blank. Yet, if God be ours, we shall have enough; if God be ours, we shall have all and abound; † all that our circumstances can want, or our wishes crave, to make us inconceivably blessed and happy: blessed and happy not only through this little interval of time, but through the unmeasurable revolutions of eternity.

The sun is now come forth in his strength, and beats fiercely upon my throbbing pulse. Let me retire to yonder inviting arbour. There the woodbine retains the lucid drop; there the jessamines, which line the verdant alcove, are still imperled, and deliciously wet with dews. Welcome, ye refreshing shades! I feel, I feel your cheering influence. My languid spirits revive; the slackened sinews are new strung; and life bounds brisker through all her crimson channels.

Reclined on this mossy couch, and surrounded by this fragrant coolness, let me renew my aspirations to the ever-present

* I know not any performance, in which the transitory nature of these most durable monuments of human grandeur, is hinted with such a modest air of instruction, or their hideous ruin described in such a pomp of pleasing horror, as in a small but solemn picturesque and majestic poem, entitled, The Ruins of Rome, written by the Rev. Mr. Dyer, whom the reader (if he has the pleasure of perusing that beautiful piece) will easily perceive to have taken his draughts from the originals themselves, as nothing but the sight of those magnificent remains could have inspired his lines with such vivacity. As a specimen of the work, and a confirmation of the remark suggested above, I take leave to transcribe the following passage:—

— The pilgrim oft,
At dead of night, 'mid his orison hears
Aghast the voice of time-disparting tow'rs,
Tumbling all precipitate down dash'd,
Rattling around, loud thundering to the moon.

† His and the good man fastens on the skies,
And bids earth roll, nor feels the idle whirl.

Deity. Here let me remember, and imitate, the pious Augustine, and his mother Monica; who, being engaged in discourse on the beauties of the visible creation, rose by these ladders to the glories of the invisible state, till they were inspired with the most affecting sense of their supereminent excellency, and actuated with the most ardent breathings after their full enjoyment. In-somuch that they were almost wrapt up into the bliss they contemplated; and scarce "knew whether they were in the body or out of the body."

When tempests toss the ocean, when plaintive signals of distress are heard from the bellowing deep, and melancholy tokens of shipwreck come floating on the foaming surge; then how delightful to stand safe on shore, and hug one's self in conscious security!* When a glut of waters burst from some mighty torrent, rushes headlong over all the neighbouring plains, sweeps away the helpless cattle, and drives the affrighted shepherd from his hut; then, from the top of a distant eminence, to descry the danger we need not fear: how pleasing! Such, methinks, is my present situation. For now, the sun blazes from on high; the air glows with his fire, the fields are rent with chinks; the roads are scorched to dust; the woods seem to contract a sickly aspect, and a russet hue; the traveller, broiled as he rides, hastens to his inn, and intermits his journey; the labourer, bathed in sweat, drops the scythe, and desists from his work; the cattle fly to some shady covert, or else pant and toss under the burning noon. Even the stubborn rock, smit with the piercing beams, is ready to cleave. All things languish beneath the dazzling deluge. While I shall enjoy a cool hour, and calm reflection amidst the gloom of this bowery recess which scarce admits one speck of sunshine.

Thus may both the flock and their shepherd, dwell beneath the defence of the Most High, and abide under the shadow of the Almighty. (Psal. xci. 1.) Then, though the pestilence† walketh in darkness, and the sickness destroyeth at noon-day; though thousands fall beside us, and ten thousands at our right hand, we need fear no evil; either the destroying angel shall pass over our houses, or else he shall dispense the corrections of a friend, not the scourges of an enemy, which, instead of hurting us,

* As Lucretius gave the hint for these observations, so he assigns the reason of the pleasure specified. It arises, not from the consideration of another's misery; this would argue the rankest malevolence; but from the agreeable contemplation of our own personal safety, which while we view the circumstances that are pernicious to others, but harmless to ourselves, is not a little heightened by the contrast. — Suava mari magno, &c.

† This was written when a very infectious and mortal distemper raged in the neighbourhood.

shall work for our good.—Then, though profaneness and infidelity, far more malignant evils, breathe deadly contagion, and taints the morals of multitudes around us; yet if the great Father of spirits hide us in the hollow of his hand, we shall hold fast our integrity and be faithful unto death.

Let then, dearest Lord, O let thy servant, and the people committed to his care, be received into thy protection. Let us take sanctuary under that tree of life, erected in thy ignominious cross; let us fly for safety to that City of Refuge, opened in thy bleeding wounds. These shall be a sacred hiding-place, not to be pierced by the flames of divine wrath, or the fiery darts of temptation. Thy dying merits and perfect obedience, shall be to our souls as rivers of water in a dry place, or as the shadow of a great rock in a weary land. (Isa. xxxii. 2.)

But most of all, in that last tremendous day, when the heavens are rent asunder and wrapt up like a scroll; when thy almighty arm shall arrest the sun in his career, and dash to pieces the structure of the universe; when the dead, both small and great, shall be gathered before the throne of thy glory; and the fates of all mankind hang on the very point of a final irreversible decision—then, blessed Jesus, let us be owned by thee, and we shall not be ashamed: defended by thee, and we shall not be afraid. O may we, at that awful and unutterable important juncture, be covered with the wings of thy redeeming love; and we shall behold all the horrible convulsions of expiring nature with composure, with comfort! We shall even welcome the dissolution of all things, as the times of refreshing from the presence of the Lord. (Acts iii. 19.)

There are, I perceive, who still attend the flowers; and in defiance of the sun, ply their work on every expanded blossom. The bees I mean, that nation of chemists! to whom nature has communicated the rare and valuable secret, of enriching themselves without impoverishing others; who extract the most delicious syrup from every fragrant herb, without wounding its substance, or diminishing its odours.—I take the more notice of these ingenious operators, because I would willingly make them my pattern.* While the gay butterfly flutters her painted wings, and sips a little fantastic delight only for the present moment; while the gloomy spider, worse than idly busied, is preparing his insidious nets for destruction, or sucking venom even from the most wholesome plants; this frugal community are wisely employed in providing for futurity, and collecting a copious stock of the most balmy treasures.—And oh! might these meditations sink into my soul! would the God who suggested each heavenly thought, vouchsafe to convert it into an established principle to determine all my inclinations and regulate my whole conduct! I should then gather advantages from the same blooming objects, more precious than your golden stores, ye industrious artists, I also should go home laden with the richest sweets and the noblest spoil, though I crop not a leaf nor call a single flower my own.

Here I behold assembled in one view, almost all the various beauties, which have been severally entertaining my imagination. The vistas struck through an ancient wood, or formed by rows of venerable elms, conducting the spectator's observation to some remarkable object, or leading the traveller's footsteps to this delightful seat.—The walls enriched with fruit trees, and faced with a covering of their leafy extensions, I should rather have said, hung with different pieces of nature's noblest tapestry:—The walks neatly shorn, and lined with verdure, or finely smoothed and coated with gravel:—The alleys arched with shades to embower our noon-tide repose, or thrown open for the free accession of air, to invite us to our evening recreation:—The decent edgings of box, which inclose like a plain selvaige each beautiful compartment, and its splendid figures:—The shapely evergreens and flowery shrubs which strike the eye, and appear with peculiar dignity in this distant situation:—The basin with its crystal fount, floating in the centre, and diffusing an agreeable freshness through the whole:—The waters falling from a remote cascade, and gently murmuring as they flow along the pebbles:—These added to the rest, and all so disposed that each recommends and endears each, renders the whole a most sweet ravishing scene, of order and variety, of elegance and magnificence.

From so many lovely prospects clustering upon the sight, it is impossible not to be reminded of heaven, that world of bliss, those regions of light, where the Lamb that was slain, manifests his beatific presence, and his saints live for evermore. But, O! what pencil can sketch out a draught of that goodly land! what colours or what style can express the splendours of Immanuel's kingdom? Would some celestial hand draw aside the veil but for a moment, and permit us to throw a single glance on those divine abodes, how would all sublunary possessions become tarnished in our eyes, and grow flat upon our taste? A glimpse, a transient glimpse of those unutterable beatitudes, would captivate our souls, and ingross all their faculties. Eden itself, after such a vision, would appear a cheerless desert, and all earthly charms, intolerable deformity.

Very excellent things are spoken of thee, thou city of God. (Psalm lxxxvii. 2.) Volumes have been written, and those by inspired men, to display the wonders of thy perfections. All that is rich and splendid in the visible creation, has been called in to aid our conceptions and elevate our ideas. But indeed no tongue can utter, no pen can describe, no fancy can imagine, what God of his unbounded munificence, has prepared for them that love him.—Seeing then, that all terrestrial things must come to a speedy end, and there remaineth a rest, such a blissful and everlasting rest for the people of God, let me never be too fondly attached to my present satisfactions. Weaned from whatever is temporal, may I maintain a superior indifference for such transitory enjoyments, but long, long earnestly for the mansions that are above; the paradise “which the Lord hath planted and not man.” Thither may I transmit the chief of my conversation, and from thence expect the whole of my happiness. Be that the sacred powerful magnet, which ever influences my heart, ever attracts my affections. There are such transcendent glories, as eye has not seen; there are such transporting pleasures, as ear has not heard; there is such a fulness of joys, as the thought of man cannot conceive.

Into that consummate felicity, those eternal fruitions, permit me, Madam, to wish you in due time, an abundant entrance; and to assure you that this wish is breathed with the same sincerity and ardour, for my honoured correspondent, as it is MADAM, for Your most obedient, &c.

A

CREATION.

If the reader please to look back on page 42, he will find me engaged by a promissory note, to subjoin a Descant upon Creation.

To know the love of Christ, to have such a deep apprehension of his unspeakable kindness as may produce in our hearts an adoring gratitude and an unfeigned faith; this, according to St. Paul's estimate, is the highest and happiest attainment in the sacred science of Christianity. (Eph. iii. 19.) What follows is an attempt to assist the attentive mind, in learning a line or two of that best and greatest lesson. It introduces the most conspicuous parts of the visible system, as so many prompters to our dull affections; each suggesting a hint adapted to the important occasion, and suited to its respective character.

Can there be a more powerful incentive to devout gratitude, than to consider the magnificent and delicate scenes of the universe, with a particular reference to Christ as the Creator?—Every object viewed in this light, will surely administer incessant recruits to the languishing lamp of divine love. Every production in nature will strike a spark into the soul, and the whole creation concur to raise the smoking flax into a flame.

Can any thing impart a stronger joy to the believer, or more effectually confirm his faith in the crucified Jesus, than to behold the heavens declaring his glory, and the firmament showing his handy-work? Surely, it must be matter of inexpressible consolation to the poor sinner to observe the honours of his Redeemer, written with sunbeams over all the face of the world.

We delight to read an account of our incarnate Jehovah, as he is revealed in the book of Moses and the prophets, as he is displayed in the writings of the evangelists and apostles. Let us also endeavour to see a sketch of his perfections as they stand delineated in that stately volume, where every leaf is a spacious plain,—every line, a flowing brook,—every period, a lofty mountain.

Should any of my readers be unexercised in such speculations, I beg leave (in pursuance of my promise) to present them with a specimen; or to offer a clue, which may possibly lead their minds into this most improving and delightful train of thinking.

Should any be inclined to suspect the solidity of the following observations, or to condemn them, as the voice of rant, and the lawless flight of fancy; I must entreat such persons to recollect that the grand doctrine, the hinge on which they all turn, is warranted and established by the unanimous testimony of the inspired penmen, who frequently celebrate Immanuel, or Christ Jesus as the great almighty cause of all, assuring us, that all things were created by him and for him, and that in him all things consist.*

On such a subject, what is wonderful, is far from being extravagant. To be wonderful is the inseparable characteristic of God and his works; especially of that most distinguished and glorious event of the divine works, Redemption; so glorious, that "all the miracles in Egypt, and the marvellous acts in the field of Zoan," all that the Jewish annals have recorded, or the human ear has heard; all dwindle into trivial events, are scarce worthy to be remembered in comparison of this infinitely grand and infinitely gracious transaction. (Isa. xliii. 18.) Kindled therefore into pleasing astonishment by such a survey, let me give full scope to my meditations, let me pour out my whole soul on the boundless subject; not much regarding the limits, which cold criticism, or colder unbelief might prescribe.

O ye angels that surround the throne; ye princes of heaven, "that excel in strength," and are clothed with transcendent brightness; he, who placed you in those stations of exalted honour, and dignified your nature with such illustrious endowments; he, whom you all obey, and all adore; he took not on him the angelic form, but was made flesh, and found in fashion as a man; like us wretched mortals, he partook of weariness, of pain, and of all our infirmities, sin only excepted; that we might one day be raised to your sublime abodes, be adopted into your blissful society; and join with your transported choir in giving glory to Him that sitteth upon the throne, and to the Lamb for ever and ever. (Rev. v. 13.)

O ye heavens! whose azure arches rise immensely high, and stretch immeasurably wide; stupendous amphitheatre! amidst whose vast expansive circuit, orbs of the most dreadful grandeur are perpetually running their amazing races; unfathomable depths of ether! where worlds unnumbered float, and to our limited sight, worlds unnumbered are lost;—he who adjusted your dimensions with his span, and formed the magnificent structure with his word; he was once wrapt up in swaddling clothes, and laid in a manger;—that the benefits accruing to his people through his most meritorious humiliation, might have no other measure of their value than immensity, might run parallel in their duration with eternity.

Ye stars! that beam with inextinguishable brilliancy through the midnight-sky; oceans of flames and centres of worlds, through seemingly little points of light!—he who shone with essential effulgence, innumerable ages before your twinkling tapers were kindled; and will shine with everlasting majesty and beauty, when your places in the firmament shall be known no more; He was involved for many years in the deepest obscurity, lay concealed in the contemptible city Nazareth, lay disguised under the mean habit of a carpenter's son;—that he might plant the heavens, (Isa. li. 16.) as it were, with new constellations, and array these clods of earth, these houses of clay, with a radiancy far superior to yours, a radiancy which will adorn the very heaven of heavens, when you shall vanish away like smoke,* or expire as momentary sparks from the smitten steel.

Comets! that sometimes shoot into the illimitable tracts of ether, farther than the discernment of our eye is able to follow, sometimes return from the long, long excursion, and sweep our affrighted hemisphere with your enormous fiery train; that sometimes make near approaches to the sun, and burn almost in his immediate beams; sometimes retire to the remotest distance, and freeze for ages in the excessive rigours of winter;—he, who at his sovereign pleasure withdraws the blazing wonder, or leads forth the portentous stranger, to shake terror over guilty kingdoms;—he was overwhelmed with the most shocking amazement, and plunged into the deepest anxiety; was chilled with apprehensions of fear, and scorched by the flames of avenging wrath;—that I, and other depraved rebellious creatures, might not be eternally agitated with the extremes of jarring passions, opposite, yet on either side tormenting, far more tormenting to the soul than the severest degrees of your heat and cold to the human sense.

* Alluding to a passage in Isaiah, which is I think grand and elevated beyond all comparison,—“Lift up your eyes to the heavens, and look upon the earth beneath: for the heavens shall vanish away like smoke, and the earth shall wax old like a garment; and they that dwell therein shall die like the feeble insect; but my righteousness shall be for ever, and my salvation shall not be abolished.” Isa. li. 6.—With the great Virringa, I translate the words not in like manner, but like the feeble insect, which renders the period more complete, the sense more emphatical, and is more agreeable to the genius of the sacred original.

* Col. v. 16, 17. Before my reader enter upon the following Descant he is desired to peruse the note, P. 11.

Ye planets! that, winged with unimaginable speed, traverse the regions of the sky, sometimes climbing millions and millions of miles above, sometimes descending as far below the great axle of your motions; ye, that are so minutely faithful to the vicissitudes of day and night, so exactly punctual in bringing on the changes of your respective seasons;—he, who launched you at first from his mighty arm; who continually impels you with such wonderful rapidity, and guides you with such perfect regularity; who fixes “the habitation of his holiness and his glory,” infinite heights above your scanty rounds; he once became a helpless infant, sojourned in our inferior world, fled from the persecutor’s sword, and wandered as a vagabond in a foreign land; that he might lead our feet into the way of peace: that he might bring us aliens near to God; bring us exiles home to heaven.

Thou sun! inexhaustible source of light, and heat, and comfort; without whose presence an universal gloom would ensue, and horror insupportable; who, without the assistance of any other fire, sheddest day through a thousand realms; and not confining thy munificence to realms only, extendest thy enlightening influences to surrounding worlds; prime cheerer of the animal, and great enlivener of the vegetable tribes; so beautiful in thyself, so beneficial in thy effects, that erring heathens addressed thee with adorations, and mistook thee for thy Maker;—he, who filled thy orb with a profusion of lustre, lustre in its direct emanations, insufferably bright, but rebated by reflection, delightfully mild; he before whom thy meridian splendours are but a shade; whose love transfused into the heart, is infinitely more exhilarating, than even thy sweet and clear shining after the rain;—he divested himself of his all-transcending distinctions, and drew a veil over the effulgence of his divinity; that by speaking to us face to face, as a man speaketh unto his friend, he might dispel our intellectual darkness; “his visage was marred,” (Isa. liii. 14.) and he became the scorn of men, the outcast of the people, that by this manifestation of his unutterably tender regard for our welfare, he might diffuse many a gleam of joy through our dejected minds; that in another state of things, he might clothe even our fallen nature with the honours of that magnificent luminary; and give all the righteous to shine forth as the sun, in the Kingdom of their Father.

Thou moon! that walkest among the host of stars, and in thy lucid appearance, art superior to them all: fair ruler of the night! sometimes half restoring the day with thy waxing brightness; sometimes waning into dimness, and scarcely scattering the nocturnal gloom; and sometimes covered with sackcloth, and alarming the gazing nations;—he, who dresses thy opaque globe in beaming, but borrowed silver; he whose dignity is unchangeable, undervived, and all his own, he vouchsafed to wear a body of clay; he was content to appear as in a bloody eclipse, shorn of his resplendent beams, and surrounded with a night of horror, which knew not one reviving ray.—Thus has he empowered his church, and all believers, to tread the moon under their feet; (Rev. xii. 1.) hence inspired with the hope of brighter glory, and of more enduring bliss, are they enabled to triumph over all the vain anxieties and vainer amusements, of this sublunary, precarious, mutable world.

Ye thunders! that, awfully grumbling in the distant clouds, seem to meditate indignation, and form the first essays of a far more frightful peal; or, suddenly bursting over our heads, rend the vault above, and shake the ground below, with the hideous horrid crash; ye that send your tremendous volleys from pole to pole, startling the savage herds, (Psalm xxix. 8.) and astonishing the human race;—he, who permits terror to sound her trumpet, in your deep, prolonged, enlarging, aggravated roar; he uttered a feeble infantile cry in the stable, and strong expiring groans on the accursed tree,—that he might, in the gentlest accent, whisper peace to our souls, and at length tune our voices to the melody of heaven.

O ye lightnings! that brood and lie couchant in the sulphurous vapours, that glance with forked fury from the angry gloom, swifter and fiercer than the lion rushes from his den, or open into vast expansive sheets of flame, sublimely waved over the prostrate world, and fearfully lingering in the frightened skies; ye that formerly laid in ashes the licentious abodes of lust and violence, that will ere long set on fire the elements, and co-operate in the conflagration of the globe; he who kindles your flash, and directs you when to sally, and where to strike; he who commissions your whirling bolts, whom to kill and whom to spare; he resigned his sacred person to the most barbarous indignities; submitted his beneficent hands to the ponderous hammer, and the piercing nail; yea, withheld not his heart, his very heart, from the stab of the executioner’s spear; and instead of flashing confusion on his outrageous tormentors; instead of striking them dead to the earth, or plunging them into the depths of hell with his frown; he cried—in his last moments, and with his agonizing lips, he cried—"Father forgive them, for they know not what they do!" O! what a pattern of patience for his saints! What an object of admiration for angels! What a constellation of every mild, amiable, and benign virtue, shining in this hour of darkness, with ineffable splendour and beauty! Hence, hence it is, that we are not trembling under the lightnings of mount Sinai; that we are not blasted by the flames of divine vengeance, or doomed to dwell with everlasting burnings.

Ye frowning wintry elouds! oceans pendant in the air, and burdening the winds; he in whose hand you are an overflowing source; or, by whose appointment, an arsenal† of warlike stores; he who opens your sluices, and a flood gushes forth to destroy the fruits of the earth, and drown the husbandman's hopes; who mould you into frozen balls, and you are shot, linked with death,‡ on the troops of his enemies;

* One can hardly forbear animadverting upon the disingenuous temper, and perverse taste of Celsus, who attempts to turn this most distinguishing and ornamental part of our Lord's life, into ridicule and reproach.—Having spoken of Christ as despitely used, and arrayed in a purple robe, crowned with thorns, and holding, by way of mock majesty, a reed instead of a sceptre (for he enters into all these circumstances, which is a testimony to the truth even from the mouth of an enemy;) he adds, "Why in the name of wonder, does he not, on this occasion at least, act the God? Why does he not deliver himself from this shocking ignominy, or execute some signal vengeance on the authors of such injurious and abusive insults, both of himself and his Father?"—Why, Celsus, because he was meekness and gentleness itself; whereas your deities were slaves to their own turbulent and resentful passions; because they were little better than savages in human shape, who too often made a merit of slaughter, and took a horrid pride in spilling blood; while Christ was the Prince of Peace, and came not to destroy men's lives, but to save: because any madman on earth, or fury from hell, is capable of venting his rage; but who amidst such unsufferable provocations and barbarities; who, having in his own hand the power to rescue himself, the power to avenge himself, could submit to all with an unruffled serenity of patience, and not only not be exasperated, but overcome in so triumphant a manner, evil with good? None but Christ! None but Christ! This was compassion worthy of a God, clemency and charity truly divine!

Therefore the calumny raised by the same virulent objector, in another place, carries its own confutation, or rather falls with a weight of infamy on his dung-hill deities, while it bears a most honourable testimony to the majestic and invincible meekness of our Saviour. Says he to the Christian, ibid. p. 404. "You indeed take upon you to deride the images of our deities, but if Bacchus himself, or Hercules, had been present, you would not have dared to offer such an affront; or if you had been so presumptuous, would have severely smarted for your insolence; whereas, they who tormented the very person of your God, and even extended him with mortal agony on the cross, suffered no effects of his displeasure."

Quiequid hyberis telorum armanentaria cœli.—
Sat. 13.

‡ Job has informed us for what purpose the magazines of the firmament are stocked with hail.—That they may be ready against the day of battle and war, Job xxxviii. 23. Joshua has recorded what terrible slaughter has been made by these missile weapons of the Almighty, Josh. x. 11.—But the most dreadful description of this great ordnance of the heavens, is

He, instead of discharging the furiousness of his wrath upon his guilty head, poured out his prayers, poured out his sighs, poured out his very soul, for me and my fellow transgressors, that by virtue of his inestimable propitiation, the overflowings of divine good will might be extended to sinful men: that the skies might pour down righteousness, and peace on her downy wings, peace with her balmy blessings, descend to dwell on earth.

Ye vernal clouds! furls of finer air, folds of softer moisture, he who draws you in copious exclamations from the briny deep, orders you to leave every distasteful quality behind, and become floating fountains of sweetest waters; he who dissolves you into gentle rain, and dismisses you in fruitful showers, who kindly commissions you to drop down fatness as you fall, and to scatter flowers over the field: He, in the unutterable bitterness of his spirit, was without any comforting sense of his almighty Father's presence; he, when his bones were burnt up like a fire-brand, had not one drop of that sacred consolation, which on many of his afflicted servants, has been distilled as the evening dews, and has "given songs in the night" of distress:—that, from this unallayed and inconsolable anguish of our all-gracious master, we, as from a well of salvation, might derive large draughts of spiritual refreshment.

Thou grand ethereal bow! whose beauties flush the firmament, and charm every spectator; he, who paints thee on the fluid skirts of the sky, who decks thee with all the pride of colours, and bends thee into that graceful and majestic figure, at whose command thy vivid streaks sweetly rise, or swiftly fade:—He, through all his life, was arrayed in the humble garb of poverty; and, at his exit, wore the gorgeous garment of contempt, inasmuch, that even his own familiar friends, ashamed or afraid to own him, "hid, as it were, their faces from him"• to teach us a becoming disdain for the unsubstantial and transitory glitter of all worldly vanities; to introduce us, in robes brighter than the tinges of thy resplendent arch, even in the robes of his own immaculate righteousness, to introduce us before that august and venerable throne, which the peaceful rainbow surrounds as a pledge of inviolable fidelity and infinite mercy.

Ye storms and tempests! which vex the continent, and toss the seas, which dash given us in Rev. xvi. 21. There fell upon men a great hail out of heaven, every stone about the weight of a talent.

• Isa. liii. 3. "Fuit tanquam aliquis, a quo quisque faciem occultaret." He was as some flagitious and abandoned wretch, from whom every one, disclaiming such a character, and disclaiming such an acquaintance, studiously hid his face.

navies on the rocks, and drive forests from their roots; he whose breath rouses you into such resistless fury, and whose nod controls you in your wildest career; he, who holds the rapid and raging hurricane in straitened reins, and walks, dreadfully serene, on the very wings of the wind: He went, all meek and gentle, like a lamb to the slaughter for us; and, as a sheep before her shearers is dumb, so he opened not his mouth.—Thus are we instructed to bear, with decent magnanimity, the various assaults of adversity, and to pass with a becoming tranquillity of temper, through all the rude blasts of injurious treatment. Thus are we delivered from the unutterable fiercer storms of incensed and inexorable justice; from the “fire, the brimstone, and the horrible tempest, which will be the final portion of the ungodly.”

Thou pestilence! that scatterest ten thousand poisons from thy baleful wings; tainting the air, and infecting the nations; under whose malignant influence, joy is blasted, and nature sickens; mighty regions are depopulated, and once crowded cities are left without inhabitants.—He, who arms thee with inevitable destruction, and bids thee march before his angry countenance,* to spread desolation among the tents of the wicked, and be the forerunner of far more fearful indignation: He, in his holy humanity, was arraigned as a criminal; and though innocence itself, yea, the very pattern of perfection, was condemned to die, like the most execrable miscreant; as a nuisance to society, and the very bane of the public happiness, he was hurried away to execution, and hammered to the gibbet;—that, by his blood, he might prepare a sovereign medicine to cure us of a more fatal distemper, than the pestilence which walketh in darkness, or the sickness which destroyeth at noon-day; that he might himself say to our last enemy, “O death, I will be thy plague; O grave, I will be thy destruction.” (Hos. xiii. 14.)

Heat! whose burning influence parches the Lybian wilds; tans into soot the Ethiopian's complexion, and makes every species of life pant, and droop, and languish; cold, whose icy breath glazes yearly the Russian seas, often glues the frozen sailor to the cordage, and stiffens the traveller into a statue of rigid flesh: He who sometimes blends you both, and produces the most agreeable temperature, sometimes suffers you to act separately, and rage with intolerable severity; that King of heaven, and controller of universal nature, when dwelling in a tabernacle of clay, was exposed to chilling damps, and smitten by sultry beams; the stars, in their midnight watches, heard him pray; and the sun in his meridian fervours saw him toil. Hence are our frozen hearts dissolved into a mingled flow of wonder, love, and joy; being conscious of a deliverance from those insufferable flames, which, kindled by divine indignation, burn to the lowest hell.

Thou ocean, vast world of waters! He, who sunk that capacious bed for thy reception, and poured the liquid element into unfathomable channels; before whom, all thy foaming billows, and floating mountains, are as the small drop of a bucket; who, by the least intimation of his will swells thy fluid kingdoms in wild confusion, to mingle with the clouds; or reduces them in calm composure to slumber on the shore; he, who once gave thee a warrant to overwhelm the whole earth, and bury all its degenerate inhabitants in a watery grave; but has now laid an everlasting embargo on thy boisterous waves, and bound thee, all fierce and madding as thou art, in chains stronger than adamant, yet formed of despicable sand: and all the waves of vengeance and wrath, of tribulation and anguish, passed over HIS crucified body, and HIS agonizing soul; that we might emerge from those depths of misery, from that abyss of guilt, into which we were plunged by Adam's fall, and more irretrievably sunk by our own transgressions; that at the last, we might be restored to that happy world, which is represented, in the vision of God, as having “no sea,” (Rev. xxi. 1.) to denote its perpetual stability, and undisturbed serenity.

Ye mountains! that overlook the clouds, and project a shade into distant provinces; everlasting pyramids of nature, not to be shaken by conflicting elements; not to be shattered by the bolts of thunder, nor impaired even by the ravages of time; he, who bid your ridges rise high, and your foundation stand so fast; he, in whose scale you are lighter than dust; in whose eyes you are less than nothing;—He sunk beneath a load of woes—woes unsupportable, but not his own; when he took our iniquities upon himself, and heaved the more than mountainous burden from a guilty world.

Ye verdant woods! that crown our hills, and are crowned yourselves with leafy honours; ye humble shrubs, adorned in spring with opening blossoms; and fanned in summer by gentle gales; ye that in distant climes, or in cultivated gardens, breathe out spiey odours, and embalm the air with delightful perfumes. He—your all-glorious and ever-blessed Creator's head, was encircled with the thorny wreath, his face was defiled with contumelious spitting, and his body bathed in a bloody sweat, that we might wear the crown—the crown of glory which fadeth not away, and live for ever—more surrounded with delights as much surpassing yours, as yours exceed the rugged desolations of winter.

Thou mantling vine! He, who hangs on thy slender shoots, the rich, transparent, weighty cluster; who, under thy unornamented foliage, and amidst the pores of thy otherwise worthless boughs, prepares the liquor,—the refined and exalted liquor, which cheers the nations, and fills the cup of joy; trees, whose branches are elevated and waving in air; or diffused, in easy confinement, along a sunny wall: He, who bends you with a lovely burden of delicious fruits, whose genial warmth beautifies their rind, and mellows their taste;—He, when voluntarily subject to our wants, instead of being refreshed with your generous juices, or regaled with your luscious pulp, had a loathsome potion of vinegar, mingled with gall, addressed to his lips:—that we might sit under the shadow of his merits with great tranquillity and the utmost complacency; that, ere long, being admitted into the paradise of God, we might eat of the tree of life, (Rev. ii. 7.) and drink new wine with him in his Father's kingdom.

Ye luxuriant meadows! He, who without the seedman's industry, replenishes your irriguous lap with never-failing crops of herbage, and enamels their cheerful green with flowers of every hue; ye fertile fields!—He, who blesses the labours of the husbandman, enriches your well-tilled plains with waving harvests, and calls forth the staff of life from your furrows; he, who causes both meadows and fields to laugh and sing, for the abundance of plenty;—He was no stranger to corroding hunger, and parching thirst; he alas! ate the bitter bread of woe, and had "plenteousness of tears to drink;"—that we might partake of richer dainties than those which are produced by the dew of heaven, and proceed from the fatness of the earth; that we might feed on "the hidden manna," and eat the bread which giveth life—eternal life—unto the world.

Ye mines! rich in golden ore, or bright with veins of silver; that distribute your shining treasures as far as winds can waft the vessel of commerce, which bestow your alms on monarchs, and have princes for your pensioners:—Ye beds of gems, toy-shops of nature! which form, in dark retirement, the glittering stone; diamonds, that sparkle with a brilliant water; rubies, that glow with a crimson flame; emeralds, dipped in the freshest verdure of spring; sapphires, decked with the fairest drapery of the sky; topaz, emblazoned with dazzling yellow; amethyst, empurpled with the blushes of the morning:—He, who tinctures the metallic dust, and consolidates the lucid drop; he, when sojourning on earth, had no riches but the riches of disinterested benevolence, had no ornament, but the ornament of unspotted purity. Poor he was in his circumstances, and mean in all his accommodations, that we might be rich in grace, and "obtain salvation with eternal glory;" that we might inhabit the new Jerusalem, that splendid city, whose streets are paved with gold, whose gates are formed of pearl, and the walls garnished with all manner of precious stones. (Rev. xxi. 19, 21.)

Ye gushing fountains! that trickle potable silver through the matted grass; ye fine transparent streams! that glide in crystal waves, along your fringed banks; ye deep and stately rivers! that wind and wander in your course, to spread your favours wider, that gladden kingdoms in your progress, and augment the sea with your tribute:—He who supplies all your currents from his own overflowing and inexhaustible liberality; he, when his nerves were racked with exquisite pain, and his blood inflamed by a raging fever, cried, I THIRST, and was denied (unparalleled hardship!) in this his great extremity, was denied the poor refreshment of a single drop of water;—that we, having all-sufficiency in all things, might abound to every good work; might be filled with the fulness of spiritual blessings here, and hereafter be satisfied with that fulness of joy which is at God's right hand for evermore.

Ye birds! cheerful tenants of the boughs, gaily dressed in glossy plumage, who wake the morn, and solace the groves, with your artless lays: imitable architects, who, without rule or line, build your pensile structure with all the nicety of proportion; you have each his commodious nest, roofed with shades, and lined with warmth, to protect and cherish the callow-brood:—but he, who tuned your throats to harmony, and taught you that curious skill; he was a man of sorrows and had not where to lay his head,—had not where to lay his head, till he felt the pangs of dissolution, and was laid in the silent grave;—that we, dwelling under the wings of Omnipotence, and resting in the bosom of infinite love, might spend an harmonious eternity in "singing the song of Moses and of the Lamb."

Bees! industrious workmen, that sweep with busy wing, the flowery garden, and search the blooming heath, and sip the mellifluous dews,—strangers to idleness!—that ply, with incessant assiduity, your pleasing task, and suffer no opening blossom to pass unexplored, no sunny gleam to slip away unimproved: most ingenious artificers; that cling to the fragrant buds, drain them of their treasured sweet, and extract, (if I may so speak,) even the odoriferous souls of herbs, and plants, and flowers:—you, when you have completed your work, have collected, refined, and securely lodged the ambrosial stores; when you might reasonably expect the peaceful fruition of your acquisitions, you, alas! are barbarously destroyed, and leave your hoarded delicacies to others, leave them to be enjoyed by your very murderers. I cannot but pity your hard destiny!—How then should my bowels melt with sympathy, and my eyes flow with tears,* when I remember, that thus, thus it fared with you and our incarnate Maker! After a life of the most exemplary and exalted piety, a life filled with offices of beneficence, and labours of love: He was, by wicked hands, crucified and slain: he left the honey of his toil, the balm of his blood, and the riches of his obedience, to be shared among others; to be shared even among those who too often crucify him afresh, and put him to open shame.

Shall I mention the animal,† which spins her soft, her shining, her exquisitely fine silken thread! whose matchless manufactures lend an ornament to grandeur, and make royalty itself more magnificent. Shall I take notice of the cell, in which, when the gaiety and business of life are over, the little recluse immures herself, and spends the remainder of her days in retirement? Shall I rather observe the sepulchre, which, when cloyed with pleasure, and weary of the world, she prepares for her own interment; or how, when a stated period is elapsed, she wakes from a death-like inactivity; breaks the inclosure of her tomb; throws off the dusky shroud; assumes a new form; puts on a more sumptuous array; and from an insect creeping on the ground, becomes a winged inhabitant of the air?—No, this is a poor reptile, and therefore unworthy to serve as an illustration, when any character of the Son of God comes under consideration. But let me correct myself. Was not Christ (to use the language of his own blessed Spirit) a worm, and no man? (Psalm xxii. 6.) In appearance such, and treated as such.—Did not he also bequeath the fine linen of his own most perfect righteousness, to compose the marriage-garment* for our disarrayed and defiled souls? Did he not, before his flesh saw corruption, emerge triumphant from the grave; and not only mount the lower firmament, but ascend the heaven of heavens; taking possession of those sublime abodes in our name, and as our forerunner.

Ye cattle! that rest in your inclosed pastures; ye beasts! that range the unlimited forests; ye fish! that rove through trackless paths of the sea; sheep! clad in garments, which when left by you, are wore by kings; kine! who feed on verdure, which, transmuted in your bodies, and strained from your udders, furnishes a repast for queens; lions! roaring after your prey; leviathan! taking your pastime in the great deep: with all that wing

* This, and several other hints, interspersed throughout this work, refer to the active and passive righteousness of Christ, imputed to believers for their justification. Which in the opinion of many great expositors, is the mystical and the most sublime meaning of the wedding-garment, so emphatically and forcibly recommended by the teacher sent from God, (Matth. xxii. 11.) A doctrine, which some of those who honour my Meditations with a perusal, probably may not receive with much, if any approbation. I hope the whole performance may not be cashiered for one difference of sentiment; and I beg that the sentiment itself may not hastily be rejected without a serious hearing. For I have the pleasure of being intimately acquainted with a gentleman of good learning and distinguished sense, who had once as strong prepossessions against this tenet, as can well be imagined. Yet now he not only admits it as a truth, but embraces it, as the joy of his heart, and cleaves to it as the rock of his hopes.

A clear and cogent Treatise, entitled, Submission to the righteousness of God, was the instrument of removing his prejudices, and reducing him to a better judgment,—in which he has been happily confirmed by the authority of the most illustrious names, and the works of the most eminent pens, that ever adorned our church and nation,—in this number, are Bishop Jewel, one of our great reformers; and the other venerable compilers of our homilies; Archbishop Usher, that oracle of universal learning; Bishop Hall, the devout and sprightly orator of his age; the copious and fervent Bishop Hopkins; the singularly good and unaffected Bishop Beveridge; that everlasting honour of the bench of judicature, Lord Chief Justice Hales; the nervous, florid, and persuasive Dean Stanhope; the practical and perspicuous Mr. Burkitt; and to summon no other evidence, that matchless genius Milton, who in various parts of his divine poem, inculcates this comfortable truth; and in one passage, represents it under the very same image, which is made use of above, Book X. l. 222.

I had almost forgot to mention that the Treatise, entitled Submission, &c. was written by Mr. Benjamin Jenks; whose book of devotions has deservedly passed through eleven editions, is truly admirable for the sublimity, spirituality, and propriety of the sentiments, as well as for the concise form, and pathetic turn of the expression.—Whose book of meditations though no less worthy of general acceptance, has, for a considerable time, been almost unknown and extinct. But it is now revived, and is lately republished in two octavo volumes, by Mr. James Rivington. For which service he has my thanks, and I flatter myself he will have the thanks of the public; as I am persuaded, could religion and genius speak, he would have their acknowledgments also. Since few Treatises are more happily calculated to represent religion in its native beauty, and to promote the interests of genuine virtue.—On which account, I trust, the candid will excuse me, and the judicious will not condemn me, even though the recommendation of those devotions and of these meditations may appear to be a digression from my subject.

* Canst thou, ungrateful man, his torments see,
Nor drop a tear for him who poured his blood for thee?
Pitt's Poems.

† No one, I hope, will be offended at my introducing, on such an occasion, creatures of so low a rank, since even the volumes of inspiration seem to lend me the sanction of their sacred authority. As they disdain not to compare the blessed Jesus to a door, a highway, &c. And perhaps, all comparisons which respect a being of infinite dignity, are not only mean, but equally mean and unworthy.

I am sensible, likewise, that in this paragraph, and some others, all the circumstances are not completely correspondent. But if, in some grand particulars the redaction answers to the description, this I trust will be sufficient for my purpose, and satisfactory to my readers.—Perhaps it would be no mistaken caution, to apply the same observation to many of the beautiful similitudes, parables, and allegories used by our Lord: such as the brazen serpent, the unjust steward, the thief in the night, &c. which, if scrupulously sifted, or rigorously strained, for an entire coincidence in every circumstance, must appear to great disadvantage, and lead into palpable inconveniences.

the firmament, or tread the soil, or swim the wave :—He, who spreads his ever-hospitable board ; who admits you all to be his continual guests ; and suffers you to want no manner of thing that is good ;—He was destitute, afflicted, tormented ; He endured all that was miserable and reproachful, in order to exalt a degenerate race, who had debased themselves to a level with the beasts that perish, unto seats of distinguished and immortal honour, in order to introduce the slaves of sin, and heirs of hell, into mansions of consummate and everlasting bliss.

Surely, the contemplation of such a subject, and the distant anticipation of such a hope, may almost turn earth into heaven, and make even inanimate nature vocal with praise. Let it then break forth from every creature. Let the meanest feel the inspiring impulse ; let the greatest acknowledge themselves unable, worthily to express the stupendous goodness.

Praise him, ye insects that crawl on the ground ! who though high above all height, humbled himself to dwell in dust. Birds of the air, waft on your wings and warble in your notes, his praise, who though Lord of the celestial abodes, while sojourning on earth, wanted a shelter, commodious as your nests.—Ye rougher world of brutes, join with the gentle songsters of the shade, and howl to him your hoarse applause ; who breaks the jaw-bones of the infernal lion ; who softens into mildness the savage disposition ; and bids the wolf lie down, in amicable agreement with the lamb. Bleat out, ye hills ; let broader lows be responsive from the vales : ye forests catch, and ye rocks retain the inarticulate hymn ; because Messiah the prince feeds his flock like a shepherd. He gathers the lambs with his arm ; he carries them in his bosom ; and gently leads those that are with young. (Isa. xl. 11.) Wave, ye stately cedars, in sign of worship, wave your branching heads to him, who meekly bowed his own, on the accursed tree.—Pleasing prospects, scenes of beauty, where nicest art conspires with lavish nature, to form a paradise below, lay forth all your charms, and in all your charms confess yourselves a mere blank compared with his amiableness, who is the “ fairest among ten thousand and altogether lovely.”—Drop down, ye showers, and testify as you fall ; testify of his grace, which descends more copiously than the rain, distils more sweetly than the dew.—Let sighing gales breathe, and murmuring rivulets flow ; breathe and flow in harmonious consonance to him, whose spirit is far more reviving than the cooling breeze, who is himself the fountain of living waters.

Ye lightnings ! blaze to his honour, ye thunders sound his praise, while reverberating clouds return the roar, and bellowing oceans propagate the tremendous anthem.—Mute of creatures, add your silent oratory, and display the triumphs of his meekness ; who though he maketh the clouds his chariot, and treadeth upon the waves of the sea ; though the thunder is his voice, and the lightning his sword of justice ; yet amidst the most abusive and cruel injuries, was submissive and lifted not his hand, was “ dumb and opened not his mouth.”—Great source of day, address thy radiant homage to a far sublimer sun ; write in all thy ample round, with every lucid beam, O write a testimony to him, who is the brightness of his Father's glory, who is the Sun of righteousness to a sinful world, and is risen never to go down ; is risen to be our everlasting light.—Shine clear, ye skies ; look gay, thou earth ; let the floods clap their hands, and let every creature wear a smile ; for he cometh, the Creator himself cometh to be manifested in the flesh ; and with him comes pardon, peace, and joy ; every virtue and all felicity comes in his train.—Angels and archangels, let your songs be of Jesus, and teach the very heavens to echo with his adored and majestic name. Ye beheld him, with greater transports of admiration, when you attended his agony in the garden, and saw him prostrate on the ground, than when you beheld universal nature rising at his call, and saw the wonders of his creating might. Tune to loftiest notes your golden harps, and waken raptures unknown before even in heavenly breasts, while all that has breath, swells the concert of harmony ; and all that has being unites in the tribute of praise.

Chiefly let man exalt his voice ; let man, with distinguished hosannas, hail the Redeemer. For man he was stretched on the racking cross ; for man, he was consigned to the gloomy sepulchre ; for man, he procured grace unmeasurable, and bliss inconceivable.—However different, therefore, in your age, or more different in your circumstances, be unanimous, O men ! in magnifying a Saviour, who is no respecter of persons, who gave himself a ransom for all.—Bend, ye kings, from your thrones of ivory and gold, in your robes of imperial purple, fall prostrate at his feet ; who forsook a nobler throne, and laid aside more illustrious ensigns of majesty, that you might reign with God for ever and ever.—(Children of poverty, meanest of mortals, (if any can be called poor who are thus enriched ; if any can be accounted mean who are thus ennobled,) rejoice, greatly rejoice in God your Saviour ; who chose to be indigent, was willing to be contemned ; that you might be entitled to the treasures, and be numbered with the princes of heaven. Sons of affliction, though harassed with pain, and injured to anguish, O ! change your groans into songs of gratitude: let no complaining voice, no jarring string be heard, in the universal symphony, but glorify the Lamb even in the fires; (Isa. xxiv. 15.) who himself bore greater torment than you feel; and has promised you a share in the joy which he inherits; who has made your sufferings short, and will make your rest eternal.—Men of hoary locks, bending beneath a weight of years, and tottering on the brink of the grave; let Christ be your support under all infirmities; lean upon Christ, as the rock of your salvation; let his name, his precious name, form the last accents which quiver on your pale expiring lips;—and let this be the first that lips on your tongues, ye tender infants, remember your Redeemer in your earliest moments; devote the choice of your hours to the learning of his will, and the chief of your strength to the glorifying of his name; who in the perfection of health, and the very prime of manhood, was content to become a motionless and ghastly corpse, that you might be girt with the vigour, and clothed with the bloom of eternal youth.

Ye spirits of just men made perfect! who are released from the burden of the flesh; and freed from all the vexatious solicitations of corruption in yourselves; delivered from all the injurious effects of iniquity in others; who sojourn no longer in the tents of strife, or the territories of disorder; but are received into that pure, harmonious, holy society, where every one acts up to his amiable and exalted character; where God himself is pleased graciously and immediately to preside.—You find, not without pleasing astonishment, your hopes improved into actual enjoyment, and your faith superseded by the beatific vision; you feel all your former shyness of behaviour, happily lost in the overflowings of unbounded love; and all your little differences of opinion entirely bore down by tides of invariable truth. Bless, therefore, with all your enlarged powers, bless his infinitely larger goodness; who, when he had overcome the sharpness of death, opened the gates of paradise, opened the kingdom of heaven to all generations, and to every denomination of the faithful.

Ye men of holy conversation and humble tempers, think of him who loved you, and washed you from your sins in his own blood; think of him on your silent couch; talk of him in every social interview; glory in his excellencies, make your boast of his obedience, and add, still continue to add, the incense of a dutiful life, to all the oblations of a grateful tongue.—Weakest of believers, who go mourning under a sense of guilt, and conflicting with the ceaseless assaults of temptation, put off your sackcloth and be girded with gladness. Because Jesus is as merciful to hear, as he is mighty to help. Because he is touched with the tenderest sympathizing concern, for all your distresses; and he lives, ever lives, to be your advocate with the Father.—Why then should uneasy doubts sadden your countenances? Why should desponding fears oppress your soul? Turn, turn, those disconsolate sighs into cheerful hymns, since you have his powerful intercession, and his inestimable merits, to be your anchor in all tribulations, to be your passport into eternal blessedness.

Most of all, ye ministers of the sanctuary, heralds commissioned from above; lift every one his voice like a trumpet, and loudly proclaim the Redeemer. Get ye up, ye ambassadors of peace, get ye up into the high mountains; and spread far and wide the honours of the Lamb “that was slain, but is alive for evermore.” Teach every sacred roof to resound with his fame, and every human heart to glow with his love. Declare as far as the force of words will go, declare the inexhaustible fulness of that great atonement, whose merits are commensurate with the glories of the Divinity.* Tell the sinful wretch, what pity yearns in Immanuel’s bowels; what blood he has spilt, what agonies he has endured, what wonders he has wrought, for the salvation of his enemies. Invite the indigent to become rich; entreat the guilty to accept of pardon, because with the crucified Jesus is plenteous redemption, and all sufficiency to save.—While you, placed in conspicuous stations, pour the joyful sound, may I, as I steal through the vale of humble life, catch the pleasing accents! For me the author of all blessings became a curse: for me, his bones were dislocated, and his flesh was torn; he hung with streaming veins, and agonizing soul on the cross for me. O! may I in my little sphere, and amidst the scanty circle of my acquaintance, at least whisper these glad transporting tidings? whisper them from my own heart, that they

* If in this place and others, I have spoken magnificently of the blood of Christ, and its insuperable efficacy to expiate guilt, I think it is no more than is expressed in a very celebrated hymn, written by one of the greatest wits, who had also been one of the greatest libertines, and afterwards commenced one of the most remarkable penitents in France; a hymn, which even Mr. Bayle confesses to be a very fine one, which another critic calls an admirable one, and which a genius superior to them both, recommends as a noble one. (See Spect. Vol. vii. No. 513.)

The author having acknowledged his crimes to be beyond measure heinous, and almost beyond forgiveness provoking—so provoking, as to render tears from such eyes offensive, and prayers from such lips abominable; composes himself to submit, without the least repining sentiment, to the most dreadful doom. Accordingly, he stands in resigned expectation of being instantly struck by the bolts of vengeance; but with a turn of thought equally surprising and sprightly, with a faith properly founded and happily firm, he adds,

Yet where! O where! can even thy thunders fall?
Christ’s blood o’erspreads and shields me from them all.

may surely reach, and sweetly penetrate theirs.

But when men and angels raise the grand hymn, when all worlds and all beings add their collective acclamations ; this full, fervent, and universal chorus will be so inferior to the riches of the Redeemer's grace, so disproportionate to the magnificence of his glory, that it will seem but to debase the unutterable subject it attempts to exalt, the loud hallelujah will die away, in the solemn mental eloquence of prostrate, rapturous, silent adoration.

O Goodness infinite ! goodness immense !
 And love that passeth knowledge !—words are vain
 Language is lost in wonders so divine
 " Come then expressive silence muse his praise."

“MY MEDITATIONS OF HIM SHALL BE SWEET.”—PSALM CIV. 34.

TO

PAUL ORCHARD, ESQ.

OF

STOKE-ABBAY, DEVONSHIRE.

DEAR SIR,

As your honoured father was pleased to make choice of me to answer in your name at the font, and to exercise a sort of guardianship over your spiritual interests, permit me, by putting these little treatises into your hand, to fulfil some part of that solemn obligation.

Gratitude for many signal favours, and a conscientious regard to my sacred engagement, have long ago inspired my breast with the warmest wishes, both for your true dignity, and real happiness. Nor can I think of a more endearing, or a more effectual way of advancing either the one or the other, than to set before you a sketch of your excellent father's character. Illustrious examples are the most winning incitements to virtue; and none can come attended with such particular recommendations to you, sir, as the pattern of that worthy person from whom you derive your very being.

A most cordial and reverential esteem for the divine word, was one of his remarkable qualities. Those oracles of Heaven were his principal delight, and his inseparable companions. Your gardens, your solitary walks, and the hedges of your fields, can witness (Joshua xxiv. 27.) with what an unwearied assiduity he exercised himself in the law of the Lord. From hence he fetched his maxims of wisdom, and formed his judgment of things; the sacred precepts were the model of his temper, and the guide of his life; while the precious promises were the joy of his heart, and his portion for ever.

Improving company was another of his most relishing pleasures. Few gentlemen were better furnished, either with richness of fancy, or copiousness of expression, to bear a shining part in conversation. With these talents he always endeavoured to give some useful, generally some religious, turn to the discourse. Nor did he ever reflect with greater complacency on his social hours, than when they tended to glorify the eternal majesty, and to waken in himself and others a more lively spirit of devotion.

To project for the good of others, was his frequent study; and to carry those benevolent contrivances into execution, his favourite employ. When visited by the young persons of the neighbourhood, far from taking an ungraceful pride to initiate them in debauchery, or confirm them in a riotous habit, it was his incessant aim, by finely-adapted persuasives, to encourage them in industry, and establish them in a course of sobriety, to guard them against the allurements of vice, and animate them with the principles of piety. A noble kind of hospitality this! which will probably transmit its beneficial influence to their earthly possessions, to their future families, and even to their everlasting state.

A conviction of human indigence, and a thorough persuasion of the divine all-sufficiency, induced him to be frequent in prayer. To prostrate himself in profound adoration, before that infinitely exalted Being, who dwells in light inaccessible, was his glory; to implore the continuance of the Almighty favour, and the increase of all Christian graces, was his gain. In those moments, no doubt, he remembered you, sir, with a particular earnestness; and lodged many an ardent petition in the court of Heaven for his infant son. Cease not to second them with your own devout supplications, that they may descend upon your head, "in the fulness of the blessings of the gospel of peace."

To give their genuine lustre to all his other endowments, he was careful to maintain an humble mind. Though his friends might admire his superior abilities, or his acquaintance applaud his exemplary behaviour, he saw how far he fell short of the mark of his high calling; saw, and lamented his defects; saw, and renounced himself; relying for final acceptance and endless felicity on a better righteousness than his own, even on the transcendently perfect righteousness, and inconceivably precious death of Jesus the Redeemer. This was the rock of his hope, and the very crown of his rejoicing.

These, sir, are some of the distinguishing characteristics of your deceased parent. As you had the misfortune to lose so valuable a relative, before you was capable of forming any acquaintance with his person, I flatter myself you will the more attentively observe his picture—this his moral picture; designed, not to be set in gold, or sparkle in enamel, but to breathe in your spirit, and to live in all your conduct; which, though it be entirely your own, calculated purely for yourself, may possibly (like the family pieces in your parlour, that glance an eye upon as many as enter the room) make some pleasing and useful impression on every beholder. May every one, charmed with the beautiful image, catch its resemblance; and each, in its respective sphere, "go and do likewise."

But you, sir, are peculiarly concerned to copy the amiable original. As the order of an indulgent Providence has made you heir of the affluent circumstances, let not a gay and thoughtless inadvertence cut you off from the richer inheritance of these noble qualifications. These will be your security amidst all the glittering dangers which are inseparable from blooming years and an elevated situation in life. These are your path, your sure and only path, to true greatness, and solid happiness. Tread in these steps, and you cannot fail to be the darling of your friends, and the favourite of heaven. Tread in these steps, and you will give inexpressible joy to one of the best of mothers; you will become an extensive blessing to your fellow-creatures; and which, after such most engaging motives, is scarce worthy to be mentioned, you will be the delight, the honour, and the boast of, dear sir, your very affectionate godfather, and most faithful humble servant,

P R E F A C E

WE have already exercised our speculations on the Tombs and Flowers; surveying nature, covered with the deepest horrors, and arrayed in the richest beauties. Allegory taught many of the objects to speak the language of virtue, while imagination lent her colouring to give the lessons an engaging air. And this with a view of imitating that divine instructor, who commissioned the lily in her silver suit, to remonstrate in the ear of unbelieving reason; who sent his disciples (men ordained to teach the universe) to learn maxims of the last importance, from the most insignificant birds that wander through the paths of the air; from the very meanest herbs, (Matth. vi. 26, 28, 29, 30,) that are scattered over the face of the ground.*

Emboldened by the kind acceptance of the preceding sketches, I beg leave to confide in the same benevolence of taste, for the protection and support of the two remaining essays; which exhibit a prospect of still life, and grand operation, which moralize on the most composed, and most magnificent appearances of things; in which Fancy is again suffered to introduce her imagery, but only as the handmaid of Truth, in order to dress her person, and display her charms, to engage the attention, and win the love even of the gay and of the fashionable; which is more likely to be affected, by forming agreeable pictures of nature, and deriving instructive observations, than by the laborious method

* Celebrated writers, as Demosthenes and Cicero, Thucydides and Livy, are observed to have a style peculiar to themselves. Now, whoever considers the discourses of Christ, will find him distinguishing himself by a style, which may properly be called his own. Majestic, yet familiar, happily uniting dignity with condescension, it consists in teaching his followers the sublimest truths, by spiritualizing on the most common occurrences; which besides its being level to the lowest apprehensions, and admirably adapted to steal into the most inattentive heart, is accompanied with this very singular advantage, that it turns even the sphere of business into a school of instruction; and renders the most ordinary objects a set of monitors, ever soliciting our regard because ever present to our senses.—So that I believe, it may be said of this amiable method, in which our Lord conveyed, as well as of that powerful energy which attended his doctrines, “That never man spake like this man.”—The harvest approaching, he reminds his disciples of a far more important harvest, John iv. 35. Matth. xiii. 39. when immortal beings shall be reaped from the grave, and gathered in from all the quarters of the earth, when every human creature shall sustain the character of valuable wheat, or despicable tares; and accordingly be lodged in mansions of everlasting security, or consigned over to the rage of unquenchable fire.—In his charge to fishermen when they are commencing preachers, Matth. iv. 19, he exhorts them, conformably to the nature of their late occupation, to use the same assiduity and address in winning souls, as they were wont to exercise in catching the finny prey.—For the farther illustration of this no less useful, than curious subject, I would refer my reader to a valuable note in Sir Isaac Newton's Observations on the Prophecies, p. 118. 4to. edition.

of long-deduced arguments, or close connected reasonings. The contemplation of the heavens and the earth, of their admirable properties and beneficial changes, has always afforded the most exalted gratification to the human mind. In compliance with this prevailing taste, I have drawn my serious admonitions from the stupendous theatre, and variegated scenery of the universe; that the reader may learn his duty from his very pleasures; may gather wisdom mingled with virtue, from the most refined entertainments, and noblest delights.

The evening drawing her sables over the world, and gently darkening into Night, is a season peculiarly proper for sedate consideration. All circumstances concur to hush our passions, and soothe our cares, to tempt our steps abroad, and prompt our thoughts to serious reflection.

—Then is the time
For those whom wisdom, and whom nature charm,
To steal themselves from the degenerate crowd,
And soar above this little scene of things;
To tread low thoughted vice beneath their feet;
To soothe the throbbing passions into peace,
And woo lone quiet in her silent walks.*

The favour I would solicit for the first of the following compositions is, that it may be permitted to attend in such retired and contemplated excursions, to attend, if not under the character of a friend, at least in the humble capacity of a servant or a page; as a servant to open the door of meditation, and remove every impediment to those better exercises of the mind, which blend advantage with amusement, and improve while they delight; as a page, to gather up the unstable fluctuating train of fancy, and collect her fickle powers into a consistent, regular and useful habit of thinking.

The other conversant among the starry regions, would lead the imagination through those beautiful tracts of unclouded azure, and point out to the judgment some of those astonishing particulars which so eminently signalize the celestial worlds. A prospect this to which curiosity attracts our eyes, and to which scripture itself often directs our study, a prospect beyond all others most excellently calculated to enlarge the soul, and ennoble its conceptions; to give the grandest apprehensions of the everlasting God, and create sentiments of becoming superiority, with relation to all transitory interests; in a word, to furnish faith with the surest foundation for a holy affiance and true magnanimity of spirit, to afford piety the strongest motives, both for a lively gratitude, and profound veneration.

While Galileo lifts his tube, and discovers the prodigious magnitude of those radiant orbs; while Newton measures their amazing distances, and unites the whole system in harmonious order by the subtile influences of attraction; I would only, like the herald before that illustrious Hebrew, (Gen. xli. 43.) proclaim at every turn, "Bow the knee, and adore the Almighty Maker, magnify his eternal name, and make his praise like all his works, to be glorious.

CONTEMPLATIONS

NIGHT.

THE business of the day dispatched, and the sultry heats abated, invited me to the recreation of a walk, a walk in one of the finest recesses of the country, and in one of the most pleasant evenings which the summer season produced.

The limes and elms, uniting their branches over my head, formed a verdant canopy, and cast a most refreshing shade. Under my feet lay a carpet of nature's velvet; grass intermingled with moss, and embroidered with flowers. Jessamines, in conjunction with woodbines, twined around the trees; displaying their artless beauties to the eye, and diffusing their delicious sweets through the air. On either side, the boughs, rounded into a set of regular arches, opened a view into the distant fields, and presented me with a prospect of the bending skies. The little birds, all joyous and grateful for the favours of the light, were paying their acknowledgments in a tribute of harmony, and soothing themselves to rest with songs, while a French horn from a neighbouring seat, sent its melodious accents, softened by the length of their passage, to complete the concert of the grove.

Roving in this agreeable manner, my thoughts were exercised on a subject still more agreeable than the season, or the scene, I mean our late signal victory over the united forces of intestine treason, and foreign invasion, a victory which pours joy through the present age, and will transmit its influence to generations yet unborn.—Are not all the blessings which can endear society, or render life itself desirable, centered in our present happy constitution, and auspicious government? Were they not all struck at by that impious and horrid blow, meditated at Rome, levelled by France, and seconded by factious spirits at home? Who then can be sufficiently thankful for the gracious interposition of Providence, which has not only averted the impending ruin, but turned it, with aggravated confusion, on the authors of our troubles.

Methinks, every thing valuable which I possess; every thing charming which I behold, conspire to enhance this ever-memorable event. To this it is owing that I can ramble unmolested along the vale of private life, and taste all the innocent satisfactions of a contemplative retirement.—Had rebellion* succeeded in her detestable designs; instead of walking with security and complacency in these flowery paths, I might have met the assassin with his dagger, or have been obliged to abandon my habitation, and “embrace the rock for a shelter.”—Farewell then, ye fragrant shades; seats of meditation and calm repose! I should have been driven from your loved retreats, to make way for some barbarous, some insulting victor. Farewell then, ye pleasing toils, and wholesome amusements of my rural hours! I should no more have reared the tender flower to the sun; no more have taught the espalier to expand her boughs; nor have fetched any longer from my kitchen-garden the purest supplies of health.

Had rebellion succeeded in her detestable designs, instead of being regaled with the music of the woods, I might have been alarmed with the sound of the trumpet, and all the thunder of war. Instead of being entertained with this beautiful landscape, I might have beheld our houses ransacked, and our villages plundered : I might have beheld our fenced cities encompassed with armies, and our fruitful fields "clothed with desolation : " or have been shocked with the more frightful images of garments rolled in blood," and of a ruffian's blade reeking from a brother's heart. Instead of peace, with her cheering olives, sheltering our abodes ; instead of justice, with her impartial scale, securing our goods ; persecution had brandished her sword, and slavery clanked her chains.

Nor are these miseries imaginary only, or the creatures of a groundless panic. There are in a neighbouring kingdom, who very lately experienced them in all their rigour.* And if the malignant spirit of Popery had forced itself into our church ; if an abjured pretender had cut his way to our throne, we could have no reason to expect a mitigation of their severity on our behalf. But supposing the tender mercies of a bigoted usurper to have been somewhat less cruel ; where, alas ! would have been the encouragement to cultivate our little portion ; or what pleasure could arise from an improved spot ; if both the one and the other lay every moment at the mercy of lawless power ? This imbittering circumstance would spoil their relish ; and by rendering them a precarious, would render them a joyless acquisition. In vain might the vine spread her purple clusters, in vain be lavish of her generous juices, if tyranny, like a ravenous harpy, should be always hovering over the bowl, and ready to snatch it from the lip of industry, or wrest it from the hand of liberty.

Liberty ! that dearest of names ; and property ! that best of charters ; give an additional, an inexpressible charm to every delightful object. See how the declining sun has beautified the western clouds ; has arrayed them in crimson, and skirted them with gold. Such a refinement of our domestic bliss is property, such an improvement of our public privileges is liberty.—When the lamp of day shall entirely withdraw his beams, there will still remain the same collection of floating vapours ; but O ! how changed, how gloomy ! The carnation-streaks are faded ; the golden edges are worn away ; and all the lovely tinges are lost in a leaden-coloured louring sadness.

Such would be the aspect of all these scenes of beauty, and all these abodes of pleasure, if exposed continually to the caprice of arbitrary sway, or held in a state of abject and cringing dependence.

The sun has almost finished his daily race, and hastens to the goal. He descends lower and lower, till his chariot-wheels seem to hover on the utmost verge of the sky. What is somewhat remarkable, the orb of light upon the point of setting, grows considerably broader. The shadows of objects, just before they become blended in undistinguishable darkness, are exceedingly lengthened*.—Like blessings little prized while possessed ; but highly esteemed, the very instant they are preparing for their flight ; bitterly regretted when once they are gone, and to be seen no more.

The radiant globe is now half immersed beneath the dusky earth, or as the ancient poet speaks, is shooting into the ocean, and sinks in the western sea.—And could I view the sea at this juncture, it would yield a most amusing and curious spectacle. The rays, striking horizontally on the liquid element, give it the appearance of floating glass ; or reflected in many a different direction, form a beautiful multiplicity of colours. A stranger, as he walks along the sandy beach, and lost in pensive attention, listens to the murmurings of the restless flood, is agreeably alarmed by the gay decorations of the surface. With entertainment and with wonder, he sees the curling waves, here glistening with white, there glowing with purple ; in one place wearing an azure tincture, in another glancing a cast of undulating green ; in the whole, exhibiting a piece of fluid scenery, that may vie with yonder pensile tapestries, though wrought in the loom, and tinged with the dyes of heaven,

While I am transported by fancy to the shores of the ocean, the great luminary is sunk beneath the horizon, and totally disappears. The whole face of the ground is overspread with shades ; or, with what one of the finest painters of nature calls a dun obscurity. Only a few very superior eminences are tipped with streaming silver. The tops of groves and lofty towers catch the last smiles of day ; † are still irradiated by the departing beams.—But O ! how transient is the distinction ! how momentary the gift : Like all the blessings which mortals enjoy below, it is gone almost as soon as granted. See how languishingly it trembles on the leafy spire, and glimmers with a dying faintness, on the mountain's brow. The little vivacity that remains, decays every moment. It can no longer hold its station. While I speak, it expires, and resigns the world to the gradual approaches of night.

—Now twilight gray
Has in her sober d'ivery all things clad.*

Every object a little while ago glared with light, but now all appears under a more qualified lustre. The animals harmonize with the insensible creation; and what was gay in those, as well as glittering in this, gives place to an universal gravity. In the meadows all was jocund and sportive; but now the gamesome lambs are grown weary of their frolics, and the tired shepherd has imposed silence on his pipe. In the branches, all was sprightliness and song, but now the lively green is wrapt in the descending glooms; and no tuneful airs are heard, only the plaintive stock-dove cooing mournfully through the grove. Should I now be vain and trifling, the heavens and the earth would rebuke my unseasonable levity. Therefore, be these moments devoted to thoughts sedate as the closing day, solemn as the face of things. And indeed, however my social hours are enlivened with innocent pleasantry, let every evening, in her sable habit, toll the bell to serious consideration. Nothing can be more proper for a person who walks on the borders of eternity, and is hastening continually to his final audit; nothing more proper, than daily to slip away from the circle of amusements, and frequently to relinquish the hurry of business, in order to consider and adjust "the things that belong to his peace."

Since the sun is departed, from whence can it proceed that I am not involved in pitchy darkness? Whence these remainders of diminished brightness, which, though scarcely forming a refulgence, soften and soothe the horrors of night? I see not the shining ruler, yet am cheered with a real though faint communication of his splendour. Does he remember us in his progress through other climes? does he send a detachment of his rays to escort us, during his personal absence? or to cover (if I may use the military term) our retreat from the scene of action? Has he bequeathed us a dividend of his beams, sufficient to render our circumstances easy, and our situation agreeable, till sleep pours its soft impression on the organs of sense; till sleep suspends all the operations of our hands, and entirely supersedes any further occasion for the light.

No; it is ill judged and unreasonable to ascribe this beneficent conduct to the sun. Not unto him, not unto him; but unto his Almighty Maker, we are obliged for this pleasant attendant, this valuable legacy. The gracious Author of our being has so disposed the collection of circumambient air, as to make it productive of this fine and wonderful effect. The sun-beams, falling on the higher parts of the aerial fluid, instead of passing on in straight lines, are bent inwards, and conducted to our sight. Their natural course is over-ruled, and they are bidden to wheel about, on purpose to favour us with a welcome and salutary visit. —By which means the blessing of light, and the season of business, are considerably prolonged; and what is a very endearing circumstance, prolonged most considerably when the vehement heats of summer incline the student to postpone his walk till the temperate evening prevails; when the important labours of the harvest call the husbandman abroad before the day is fully risen.

After all the ardours of the sultry day, how reviving is this coolness! This gives new verdure to the fading plants, new vivacity to the withering flowers, and a more exquisite fragrance to their mingled scents. By this, the air also receives a new force, and is qualified to exert itself with greater activity; qualified to brace our limbs, to heave our lungs, and to co-operate with a brisker impulse in perpetuating the circulation of our blood. This I might call the grand alembic of nature, which distils her most sovereign cordial, the refreshing dews. Incessant heat would rob us of their beneficial agency, and oblige them to evaporate in imperceptible exhalations. Turbulent winds, or even the gentler motions of Aurora's fan, would dissipate the rising vapours, and not suffer them to form a coalition. But favoured by the stillness, and condensed by the coolness of the night, they unite in pearly drops, and create that finely tempered humidity, which cheers the vegetable world, as sleep exhilarates the animal.

Not unlike to these are the advantages of solitude. The world is a troubled ocean; and who can erect stable purposes on its fluctuating waves? The world is a school of wrong; and who does not feel himself warping to its pernicious influence? On this sea of glass (Rev. xv. 2.) how insensibly we slide from our own steadfastness! Some sacred truth, which was struck in lively characters on our souls, is obscured, if not obliterated. Some worthy resolution, which heaven had wrought in our breasts, is shaken, if not overthrown. Some enticing vanity, which we had solemnly renounced, again practises its wiles, and again captivates our affections. How often has an unwary glance kindled a fever of irregular desire in our hearts? How often has a word of applause dropt luscious poison into our ears? or some disrespectful expression raised a gust of passion in our bosoms? Our innocence is of so tender a constitution, that it suffers in the promiscuous crowd. Our purity is of so delicate a complexion, that it scarce touches on the world without contracting a stain. We see, we hear, with peril.

But here safety dwells. Every meddling and intrusive avocation is secluded. Silence holds the door against the strife of tongues, and all the impertinencies of idle conversation. The busy swarm of vain images, and cajoling temptations, which beset us, with a buzzing importunity, amidst the gaieties of life, are chased by these thickening shades. Here I may without disturbance commune with my own heart, and learn that best of sciences, to know myself. Here the soul may rally her dissipated powers, and grace recover its native energy. This is the opportunity to rectify every evil impression, to expel the poison, and guard against the contagion of corrupting examples. This is the place where I may with advantage apply myself to subdue the rebel within, and be master, not of a sceptre, but of myself. Throng, then, ye ambitious, the levees of the powerful: I will be punctual in my assignations with solitude. To a mind intent upon its own improvement, solitude has charms incomparably more engaging than the entertainments presented in the theatre, or the honours conferred in the drawing-room.

I said solitude.—Am I then alone?—It is true, my acquaintance are at a distance. I have stolen away from company, and am remote from all human observation. But that is an alarming thought,

Millions of spiritual creatures walk the earth
Unseen, both when we wake and when we sleep.*

Perhaps there may be numbers of those invisible beings patrolling this same retreat, and joining with me in contemplating the Creator's works. Perhaps those ministering spirits who rejoice at the conversion of a sinner, and hold up the goings of the righteous, may follow us to the lonely recess; and even in our most solitary moments, be constant attendants. What a pleasing awe is awakened by such a reflection! How venerable it renders my retired walks! I am struck with reverence, as under the roof of some sacred edifice, or in the presence-chamber of some mighty monarch. O! may I never bring any pride of imagination, nor indulge the least dissolute affection, where such refined and exalted intelligences exercise their watch!

It is possible that I am encompassed with such a cloud of witnesses; but it is certain that God, the infinite eternal God, is now and ever with me. The great Jehovah, before whom all the angelic armies bow their heads and veil their faces, surrounds me, supports me, pervades me. "In him I live, move, and have my being." The whole world is his august temple, and in the most sequestered corner I appear before his adorable Majesty, no less than when I worship in his house, or kneel at his altar. In every place, therefore, let me pay him the homage of a heart cleansed from idols and devoted to his service. In every circumstance, let me feel no ambition, but to please him, nor covet any happiness, but to enjoy him.

How sublime is the description, and how striking the sentiment, in that noble passage of the Psalms: Whither shall I go from thy spirit, or whither shall I flee from thy presence? If I climb up into the heights of heaven thou art there enthroned in light. If I go down to the depths of the grave, thou art there also in thy pavilion of darkness. If I retire to the remotest eastern climes, where the morning first takes wings; if, swifter than the darting ray, I pass to the opposite regions of the west, and remain in the uttermost parts of the sea;* shall I in that distant situation be beyond thy reach, or by this sudden transition escape thy notice? So far from it, that could I, with one glance of thought, transport myself beyond all the bounds of creation, I should still be encircled with the immensity of thy essence, or rather still be enclosed in the hollow of thy hand. Awful, yet delightful truth! let it be interwoven with every thought, and become one with the very consciousness of my existence; that I may continually walk with God, and conduct myself in every step of my behaviour, "as seeing Him that is invisible."

They are the happy persons; felicity, true felicity, is all their own, who live under an habitual sense of God's omnipresence, and a sweet persuasion of his special love. If dangers threaten, their impregnable defence is at hand. Nothing can be so near to terrify, as their almighty Guardian to secure them. To these, the hours can never be tedious; and it is impossible for them to be alone. Do they step aside from the occupations of animal life? A more exalted set of employments engage their attention. They address themselves in all their various acts of devotion, to their heavenly Father; who now sees in secret, and will hereafter reward them openly. They spread all their wants before his indulgent eye, and disburden all their sorrows into his compassionate bosom. Do they withdraw from human society? They find themselves under the more immediate regards of their Maker. If they resign the satisfactions of social intercourse, it is to cultivate a correspondence with the descending Deity, and taste the pleasures of divine friendship. What is such a state but the very suburbs of heaven! What is such a conduct, but an antepast of eternal blessedness!

* Psalm cxxxix. 7—9. There is, I think an additional strength and beauty in the thought, if, with the learned Mr. Mudge, we suppose an antithesis between the two clauses of the last verse, as there evidently is between those of the preceding, and that they express, in a poetical style, the extremities of the east and the west.

Now, my soul, the day is ended. The hours are all fled. They are fled to the supreme Judge, and have given in their evidence; an evidence registered in heaven, and to be produced at the great audit. Happy they whose improvement has kept pace with the fleeting minutes, who have seized the important fugitives, and engaged them in the pursuit of wisdom, or devoted them to the service of virtue.

Fugitives indeed they are. Our moments slip away silently and insensibly. The thief steals not more unperceived from the pillaged house; so that the day seems to be closed almost as soon as it dawned.—And will the runagates never stop? No; wherever we are, however employed, time pursues his incessant course. Though we are listless and dilatory, the great measurer of our days presses on; still presses on in his unwearied career,* and whirls our weeks, and months, and years away. Is it not then surprisingly strange, to hear people complain of the tediousness of their time, and how heavy it hangs upon their hands? to see them contrive a variety of amusing artifices, to accelerate its flight, and get rid of its burden! Ah! thoughtless mortals! Why need you urge the headlong torrent? Your days are swifter than a post, which, carrying dispatches of the last importance, with unremitting speed scours the road. They pass away like the nimble ships, which have the wind in their wings, and skim along the watery plain. They hasten to their destined period with the rapidity of an eagle; which leaves the stormy blasts behind her, while she cleaves the air, and darts upon her prey †

Now the day is gone, how short it appears! When my fond eye beheld it in perspective, it seemed a very considerable space. Minutes crowded upon minutes, and hours ranged behind hours, exhibited an extensive draught, and flattered me with a long progression of pleasures. But, upon a retrospective view, how wonderfully is the scene altered! the landscape, large and spacious, which a warm fancy drew, brought to the test of cool experience, shrinks into a span. Just as the shores vanish, and mountains dwindle to a spot, when the sailor, surrounded by skies and ocean, throws his last look on his native land. How clearly do I now discover the cheat! May it never impose upon my unwary imagination again! I find there is nothing abiding on this side eternity. A long duration in a state of finite existence is mere illusion.

Perhaps the healthy and the gay may not readily credit the serious truth; especially from a young pen, and new to its employ. Let us then refer ourselves to the decision of the ancients. Ask some venerable old person, who is just marching off the mortal stage, how many have been the days of the years of thy life? (Gen. xlvii. 8. Heb. Bib.) It was a monarch's question, and therefore can want no recommendation to the fashionable world. Observe how he shakes his hoary locks, and from a deep-felt conviction replies, "Four-score years have finished their rounds, to furrow these cheeks, and clothe this head in snow." Such a term may seem long and large to inconsiderate youth; but, oh! how short, how scanty, to one that has made the experiment! Short as a gleam of transient sun-shine; scanty "as the shadow that departeth." Methinks, it was but yesterday that I exchanged my childish sports for manly exercises; and now I am resigning them both for the sleep of death. As soon as we are born, we begin to draw to our end; and how small is the interval between the cradle and the tomb! Oh, may we believe this testimony of mature age! May every evening bring it with clearer evidence to our minds. And may we form such an estimate of the little pittance while it is upon the advancing hand, as we shall certainly make when the sands are all run down.

Let me add one reflection on the work to be done, while this shuttle is flying through the loom;* a work of no small

Dr. Gray's most ingenious abridgment of Schultens. Quae tribus in elementis velocissima, hic admirabili cum emphasi congeruntur. In terris, nil perniciosius cursore, et quidem laeti quid ferente. * My days are swifter than a weaver's shuttle, Job vii. 6.

* Sed fugit interea, fugit irreparabile tempus.—Virg.
† Job ix. 25, 26. By these three very expressive images, the inspired poet represents the unintermitted and rapid flight of time. The passage is illustrated with great judgment and equal delicacy, in difficulty, yet of the utmost consequence. Hast thou not seen, hast thou not known the excellent of the earth, who were living images of their Maker? His divine likeness was transfused into their hearts, and beamed forth in all their conduct; and beamed forth in meekness of wisdom and purity of affection; in all the tender offices of love, and all the noble efforts of zeal. To be stamped with the same beautiful signature, and to be followers of them as they were of Christ; this, this is thy business: On the accomplishment of this, thy eternal all depends. And will an affair of such unspeakable weight admit of a moment's delay, or consist with the least remissness; especially since much of thy appointed time is already elapsed, and the remainder is all uncertainty, save only that it is in the very act to fly? Or, suppose thou hast made a covenant with the grave, and wast assured of reaching the age of Methuselah, how soon would even such a lease expire! Extend it if you please still further, and let it be co-existent with nature itself. How inconsiderable is the addition; for, yet a very little while, and the commissioned archangel lifts up his hand to heaven, and swears by the almighty name, that time shall be no longer.* Then, abused opportunities will never return, and new opportunities will never more be offered. Then should negligent mortals wish, wish ever so passionately for a few hours, a few moments only, to be thrown back from the opening eternity, thousands of worlds would not be able to procure the grant.

Shall I now be industrious to shorten what is no longer than a span, or to quicken the pace of what is ever on the wing? Shall I squander away what is unutterably important while it lasts, and when once departed, is altogether irrevocable? O! my soul forbear the folly, forbear the desperate extravagance. Wilt thou chide as a loiterer the arrow that boundeth from the string, or sweep away diamonds, as the refuse of thy house? Throw time away! astonishing, ruinous, irreparable profuseness! Throw empires away, and be blameless; but, O! be parsimonious of thy days; husband thy precious hours. They go connected, indissolubly connected, with heaven or hell.* Improved, they are a sure pledge of everlasting glory; wasted, they are a sad preface to never ending confusion and anguish.

What a profound silence has composed the world! So profound is the silence, that my very breath seems a noise; the ticking of my watch is distinctly heard; if I do but stir, it creates a disturbance. There is now none of that confused din from the tumultuous city; no voice of jovial rustics from the neighbouring meadow; no chirping melody from the shady thicket. Every lip is sealed; not the least whisper invades the air; nor the least motion rustles among the boughs. Echo herself sleeps unmolested. The expanded ear, though all attention, catches no sound but the liquid lapse of a distant murmuring stream.

All things are hush'd, as nature's self lay dead.

If, in the midst of this deep and universal composure, ten thousand bellowing thunders should burst over my head, and rend the skies with their united volleys, how should I bear so unexpected a shock? It would stun my senses, and confound my thoughts. I should shudder in every limb, perhaps sink to the earth with terror. Consider then, O mortals! consider the much more prodigious and amazing call which will ere long alarm your sleeping bones. When the tenants of the tomb have slumbered in the most undisturbed repose, for a multitude of

* This alludes to the beginning of Revelations, chap. 10; which abstracted from its spiritual meaning, and considered only as a stately piece of machinery, well deserves our attention; and I will venture to say has not its superior, perhaps not its equal in any of the most celebrated masters of Greece and Rome.—All that is gloomy or beautiful in the atmosphere, all that is striking or magnificent in every element, is taken to heighten the idea. Yet nothing is disproportionate, but an uniform air of ineffable majesty, greatness, exalts, and ennobles the whole. Be pleased to observe the aspect of this august personage; all the brightness of the sun shines in his countenance, and all the rage of the fire burns in his feet. See his apparel; the clouds compose his robe, and the drapery of the sky floats upon his shoulders; the rainbow forms his diadem, and that which “compasseth the heaven with a glorious circle,” is the ornament of his head. Behold his attitude; one foot stands on the ocean, the other rests on the land. The wide extended earth and the world of waters, serve as pedestals for those mighty columns. Consider the action; his hand is lifted up to the height of the stars. He speaks, and the regions of the firmament echo with the mighty accents, as the midnight desert resounds with the lion's roar. The artillery of the skies is discharged at the signal; a peal of sevenfold thunders spreads the alarm, and prepares the universe to receive his orders. To finish all, and give the highest grandeur, as well as the utmost solemnity to the representation, hear the decree that issues from his mouth. He swears by Him that liveth for ever and ever. In whatever manner so majestic a person had expressed himself, he could not fail of commanding universal attention. But when he confirms his speech by a most sacred and inviolable oath, we are not only wrapt up in silent suspense, but overwhelmed with the profoundest awe. He swears that time shall be no longer! Was ever voice so full of terror: so big with wonder! It proclaims not the fall of empires, but the final period of things. It strikes off the wheels of nature; bids ages and generations cease to roll; and, with one potent word consigns a whole world over to dissolution. This is one among a multitude of very sublime and masterly strokes to be found in that too much neglected book, the Bible.

* I remember to have seen upon a sun-dial in a physician's garden at Northampton, the following inscription, which, I think, is the most proper motto for the instrument that measures our time, and the most striking admonition which can possibly be presented to every eye that glances upon it; ah hoc momento pendet eternitas. The weighty sense of which I know not how to express in English more happily than in those words of Dr. Watts:

God! God! on what a slender thread
(Or, on what a moment of time)
Hang everlasting things!

ages; what an inconceivable consternation must the shout of the archangel, and the trump of God occasion! will it not wound the ear of the ungodly, and affright even to distraction, the impenitent sinner? The stupendous peal will sound through the vast expanse of heaven, will shake the foundations of nature, and pierce even the deepest recesses of the grave. And how, O! how will the prisoners of divine justice be able to endure that tremendous summons to a far more tremendous tribunal? Do thou, my soul, listen to the still voice of the gospel. Attend in this thy day, to the gracious invitations of thy Saviour. Then shall that great midnight cry lose its horror, and be music in thy ears. It shall be welcome to thy reviving clay, as the tidings of liberty to the dungeon captive, as the year of Jubilee to the harassed slave. This, this shall be its charming import, "Awake and sing, ye that dwell in the dust." (Isa. xxvi. 19.)

What a general cessation of affairs has this dusky hour introduced! A little while ago, all was hurry, hurry; life and activity exerted themselves in a thousand busy forms; the city swarmed with passing and repassing multitudes; all the country was sweat and dust; the air floated in perpetual agitation, by the flitting birds, and humming bees. Art sat prying with her piercing eyes, while industry plied her restless hands. But see how all this fervent and impetuous bustle is fled with the setting sun. The beasts are sunk to their grassy couch; and the winged people are retired to their downy nests. The hammer has resigned its sounding task, and the file ceases to repeat its flying touches. Shut is the well frequented shop, and its threshold no longer worn by the feet of numerous customers. The village swain lies drowned in slumbers; and even his trusty dog, who for a considerable time stood sentry at the door, is extended at his ease, and snores with his master. In every place, toil reclines her head, and application folds her arms. All interests seem to be forgot; all pursuits are suspended; all employment is sunk away—sunk away with those fluttering myriads which lately sported in the sun's departing rays. It is like the Sabbath of universal nature, or as though the pulse of life stood still.

Thus will it be with our infinitely momentous concerns, when once the shadows of the evening (that long evening which follows the footsteps of death) are stretched over us. The dead cannot seek unto God; the living, the living alone, are possessed of this inestimable opportunity.*

* Behold! now is the accepted time. Behold! now is the day of salvation. 2 Cor. vi. 2.
Haste, haste, he lies in wait, he's at the door,
Insidious death! Should his strong hand arrest,
No composition sets the prisoner free.

"There is no work or device, no repentance or amendment, in the grave," whither we are all hastening." When once that closing scene is advanced, we shall have no other part to act on this earthly theatre. Then the sluggard, who has slumbered away life in a criminal inactivity, must lie down in hopeless distress and everlasting sorrow. Then that awful doom will take place; "He that is holy, let him be holy still; and he that is filthy, let him be filthy for ever.

Is it so, my soul? Is this the only, only time allotted for obtaining the great reward, and making thy salvation sure? and art thou lulled in a vain security, or dreaming in a supine inadvertency? Start, O! start from thy trance. Gird up the loins of thy mind, and work while it is day. Improve the present seed-time, that eternity may yield a joyful harvest.—We especially, who are watchmen in Israel, and ministers of the glorious gospel; may we be awakened, by this consideration, to all assiduity in our holy office! Some or other of our people are ever and anon departing into the invisible state; all our friends are making incessant approaches to their long home; and we ourselves shall very shortly be transmitted to the confinement of the tomb. This is the favourable juncture wherein alone we can contribute to their endless welfare. This is the crisis, the all-important crisis of their final felicity. Instantly, therefore, let us pour in our wholesome instructions; instantly let us ply them with our earnest exhortations. A moment's delay may be an irreparable loss; may be irretrievable ruin. While we procrastinate a fatal stroke may intervene, and place us beyond the power of administering, or place them beyond all possibility of receiving, any spiritual good.†

* They who are gone down to the grave are represented, Isa. xxxviii. 11, by the phrase, rendered by Vitringa, those that inhabit the land of intermission or cessation—which prevents all appearance of tautology in the sentence; and is, I think, a valuable improvement of the translation, as it conveys an idea not only distinct from the preceding, but of a very poetical and very afflicting nature; such as was perfectly natural for the royal singer and royal sufferer to dwell upon in his desponding moments. Thus interpreted, the sense will run; "I shall see man no more; I shall be cut off from the cheerful ways of men, and all the sweets of human society; and, what is a further aggravation of the threatened stroke, I shall, by its taking place, be numbered with those that inherit the land of cessation and inactivity; where there will be no more possibility of contributing to the happiness of my kingdom; no more opportunity of advancing my Creator's glory, or of making my own final salvation sure." A sentiment like this is grand, important, and full of benevolence; removes all suspicion of unbecoming pusillanimity, and does the highest honour to the monarch's character.

† The case represented by the prophet (1 Kings xx. 46.) seems perfectly applicable on this occasion. As thy servant was busy here and thither, he was gone. So, while we are either remiss in our function, or laying ourselves out upon inferior cares, the people of our charge may be gone—gone beyond the influence of our counsels; beyond the reach of our prayers; gone into the unchangeable and eternal state.

How frequently is the face of nature changed; and by changing made more agreeable! The long continued glitter of the day renders the soothing shades of the evening doubly welcome. Nor does the morn ever purple the east with so engaging a lustre, as after the gloom of a dark and dismal night. At present a calm of tranquillity is spread through the universe. The weary winds have forgot to blow. The gentle gales have fanned themselves asleep. Not so much as a single leaf nods. Even the quivering aspen rests. And not one breath curls over the stream. Sometimes, on the contrary, the tempest summons all the forces of the air, and pours itself with resistless fury from the angry north. The whole atmosphere is tossed into tumultuous confusion, and the watery world is heaved to the clouds. The astonished mariner, and his straining vessel, now scale the rolling mountain, and hang dreadfully visible on the broken surge; now shoot with headlong impetuosity into the yawning gulf, and neither bulk nor mast is seen. The storm sweeps over the continent; raves along the city streets; struggles through the forest boughs; and terrifies the savage nations with a howl more wildly horrid than their own. The knotty oaks bend before the blast; their iron trunks groan, and their stubborn limbs are dashed to the ground. The lofty dome rocks; and even the solid tower totters on its basis.

Such variations are kindly contrived, and with an evident condescension to the fickleness of our taste. Because a perpetual repetition of the same objects would create satiety and disgust; therefore the indulgent Father of our race has diversified the universal scene, and bid every appearance bring with it the charm of novelty. This circumstance is beneficial, as well as entertaining. Providence, ever gracious to mortals, ever intent upon promoting our felicity, has taken care to mingle, in the constitution of things, what is pleasing to our imagination with what is serviceable to our interests. The piercing winds, and rugged aspect of winter, render the balmy gales and flowery scenes of spring peculiarly delightful. At the same time, the keen frosts mellow the soil, and prepare it for the hand of industry. The rushing rains impregnate the glebe, and fit it to become the magazine of plenty. The earth is a great laboratory; and December's cold collects the gross materials, which are sublimated by the refining warmth of May. The air is a pure elastic fluid; and were it always to remain in this motionless serenity, it would lose much of its active spring: were it never agitated by those wholesome concussions, it would contract a noisome, perhaps a pestilential taint. In which cases, our respiration, instead of purifying, would corrupt the vital juices; instead of supplying us with refreshment, would be a source of diseases; or every gasp we drew might be unavoidable death.* How then should we admire, how should we adore, that happy union of benignity and wisdom, which, from a variety of dispensations, produces an uniformity of good! produces a perpetual succession of delights, and an uninterrupted series of advantages.

The darkness is now at its height; and I cannot but admire the obliging manner of its taking place. It comes, not with a blunt and abrupt incivility, but makes gentle and respectful advances. A precipitate transition from the splendours of day to all the horrors of midnight would be inconvenient and frightful. It would bewilder the traveller in his journey; it would strike the creation with amazement; and perhaps be pernicious to the organs of sight. Therefore the gloom rushes not upon us instantaneously, but increases by slow degrees; and sending twilight before as its harbinger, decently advertises us of its approach. By this means we are neither alarmed nor incommoded by the change; but are able to take all suitable and timely measures for its reception. Thus graciously has Providence regulated, not only the grand vicissitudes of the seasons, but also the common interchanges of light and darkness, with an apparent reference to our comfort.

Now, the fierce inhabitants of the forest forsake their dens. A thousand grim forms, a thousand growling monsters pace the desert. Death is in their jaws, while, stung with hunger and thirst for blood, they roam their nightly rounds. Unfortunate the traveller who is overtaken by the night in those dismal wilds! how must he stand aghast at the mingled yell of ravenous throats, and lions roaring after their prey! Defend him, propitious heaven! or else he must see his endearing spouse, and hail his native home no more!—Now the prowling wolf, like a murderous ruffian, dogs the shepherd's footsteps, and besets his bleating charge. The fox, like a crafty felon, steals to the thatched cottage, and carries off the feathered booty.

* Considering the immense quantity of coals, and other combustible materials which are daily consumed, and evaporate into the air; considering the numberless streams, and clouds of smoke, which almost continually overwhelm populous cities; the noisome exhalations which arise from thronged infirmaries and loathsome jails, from stagnating lakes and putrid fens; the variety of offensive and unwholesome effluvia, which proceed from other causes: it is a very remarkable instance of a Providence at once tenderly kind and infinitely powerful, that mankind is not suffocated with stench, that the air is not choked with filth. The air is the common sewer into which ten thousand times ten thousand nuisances are incessantly discharged: yet it is preserved so thoroughly clear, as to afford the most transparent medium for vision; so delicately undulatory, as to transmit, with all imaginable distinctness, every diversity of sound; so perfectly pure, as to be the constant refiner of the fluids in every animal that breathes.

Happy for the world, were these the only destroyers that walk in darkness. But, alas! there are savages in human shape, who, muffled in shades, infest the abodes of civilized life. The sons of violence make choice of this season* to perpetrate the most outrageous acts of wrong and robbery. The adulterer waiteth for the twilight; and, baser than the villain on the highway, betrays the honour of his bosom friend. Now faction forms her close cabals, and whispers her traitorous insinuations. Now rebellion plans her accursed plots, and prepares the train to blow a nation into ruin. Now crimes, which hide their odious heads in the day, haunt the seats of society, and stalk through the gloom with audacious front. Now the vermin of the stews crawl from their lurking-holes to wallow in sin, and spread contagion through the night. Each soothing himself with the fond notion, that all is safe, that no eye sees.

Are they then concealed? Preposterous madmen! to draw the curtain between their infamous practices and a little set of mortals, but lay them open to all these chaste and wakeful eyes of heaven † as though the moon and stars were made to light men to their revels, and not to God. Are they then concealed? No, truly. Was every one of these vigilant luminaries closed, an eye keener than the lightning's flash, an eye brighter than ten thousand suns, beholds their every motion. Their thickest shades are beaming day ‡ to the jealous Inspector and supreme Judge of human actions. Deluded creatures! have ye not heard, have ye not read, "That clouds and darkness are his majestic residence?" (Psa. xxvii. 2. In that very gloom to which you fly for covert, he erects his throne. What you reckon your screen is the bar of his tribunal. Oh, remember this! stand in awe and sin not. Remember that the great and terrible God is about your path § when you take your midnight range; is about your bed, when you indulge the loose desire; and spies out all your ways, be they ever so secretly conducted, or artfully disguised.

Some minutes ago, a passenger crossed along the road. His horse's foot struck the ground, and fetched fire from a flint. My eye, though at a distance, caught the view; and saw with great clearness the transient sparkles, of which, had I been ever so near, I should not have discerned the least glimpse under the blaze of day.* So, when sickness has drawn a veil over the gaiety of out hearts; when misfortunes have eclipsed the splendour of our outward circumstances; how many important convictions present themselves with the brightest evidence! Under the sunshine of prosperity they lay undiscovered; but, when some intervening cloud has darkened the scene, they emerge from their obscurity, and even glitter upon our minds. Then the world, that delusive cheat, confesses her emptiness; but Jesus, the bright and morning star, beams forth with inimitable lustre. Then vice loses all her fallacious allurements; that painted strumpet is horrible as the hags of hell; but virtue, despised virtue, gains loveliness from a lowering providence, and treads the shades with more than mortal charms. May this reconcile me, and all the sons of sorrow to our appointed share of suffering? If tribulation tend to dissipate the inward darkness, and pour heavenly day upon our minds; welcome distress, welcome disappointment, welcome whatever our froward flesh, or peevish passions, would miscall calamities. These light afflictions which are but for a moment, shall sit easy upon our spirits; since they befriend our knowledge, promote our faith, and so work out for us a far more exceeding and eternal weight of glory. †

Darkens the streets, then wander forth the sons
Of Belial, flown with insolence and wine.—Milt.

‡ This is finely, and very forcibly expressed by the Psalmist: "If I say, peradventure the darkness shall cover me, then shall my night be turned to day:" or as it may be rendered somewhat more emphatically, Even the night shall be broad day-light all around me. Psalm cxxxix. 11.

§ The original words are much stronger than the translation; signifying, Thou sittest my path; and art familiarly or intimately acquainted with all my ways. The former, I apprehend, denoting the exact cognizance which the Almighty taketh, the latter implying the constant inspection which he exerciseth, over all the circumstances of our conduct, Psalm cxxxix. 2.

* I beg leave to inform the young gentleman, whose name dignifies my Dedication, that this was a remark of his honoured father, when we rode together, and conversed in a dusky evening. I mention this circumstance, partly to secure the paragraph from contempt; partly to give him and the world an idea of that eminently serious taste which distinguished my deceased friend. The less obvious the reflection, the more clearly it discovers a turn of mind remarkably spiritual, which would suffer nothing to escape, without yielding some religious improvement. The meaner the incident, the more admirable was that fertility of imagination, which could deduce the sublimest truths from the most trivial occurrences.

† 2 Cor. iv. 17. The great Stephens, that oracle of Grecian learning, translates our apostle's phrase—καὶ ὀσμὴν ἄρωματων, Quo nihil magis dici aut fingi potest. But how does the sense rise! how is the idea enlarged, under two such forcible expressions! The whole verse is a master-piece of the beautiful antithesis, the lively description, and the nervous diction. It is one of those exquisite passages in the inspired writings, which, like some rich aromatic plants, cannot be transferred from their own generous and native soil, without being impaired in their viscosity, and losing much of their delicacy. Perhaps, the following version may be somewhat less injurious to the

How has this darkness snatched every splendid and graceful object from my sight; It has dashed the sponge over the pictures of spring, and destroyed all the delicate distinctions of things. Where are now the fine tinges, which so lately charmed me from the glowing parterre? The blush is struck out from the cheeks of the rose; and the snowy hue is dropt from the lily. I cast my eyes toward a magnificent seat: but the aspiring columns, and fair expanded front, are mingled in rude confusion. Without the sun, all the elegance of the blooming world, is a mere blank; all the symmetry of architecture is a shapeless heap.

Is not this an expressive emblem of the loveliness which the Sun of Righteousness transfuses into all that is amiable! Was it not for Jesus and his merits, I should sigh with anguish of spirit, even while I rove through ranks of the most beautiful flowers or breathe amidst a wilderness of sweets. Was it not for Jesus and his merits, I should roam like some disconsolate spectre, even through the smiles of creation, and the caresses of fortune. My conversation in this world, though dressed in the most engaging forms of external pleasure, would be like the passage of a condemned malefactor, through enamelled meadows and bowers of bliss, to be broke upon the wheel, or to expire on the rack. But a daily reflection on the Lamb's atoning blood; a comfortable trust that my soul is reconciled through this divine expiation; this is the ray, the golden ray, which irradiates the face of the universe. This is the oil of beauty, which makes all things wear a cheerful aspect; and the oil of gladness, which disposes the spectator to behold them with delight.* This, this is the sacred charm, which teacheth nature in all her prospects, in all her productions, so exquisitely to please.

"Man goeth forth to his work, and to his labour, till the evening;" but then his strength fails, his spirits flag, and he stands in need, not only of some respite from toil, but of some kindly and sovereign refresh-sacred original than the common translation:—Our very light affliction, which is but just for the present moment, worketh out a far more exceeding, and incomparably great, and eternal weight of glory.

* Thus said, that fine piece of flattery, addressed to the Heathen emperor, is strictly and literally true.

—Vultus ubi tuus
Affulsit populo, gratior et dies,
Et soles melius nitent.—Horat.

Which I would cast in a Christian mould, and thus translate:

When faith presents the Saviour's death,
And whispers "This is thine," Sweetly my rising hours advance,
And peacefully decline.

While such my views, the radiant sun
Sheds a more sprightly ray:
Each object smiles; all nature charms;
I sing my cares away.

ments. What an admirable provision for this purpose is sleep! Sleep introduces a most welcome vacation; both for the soul and body. The exercises of the brain, and the labours of the hands, are at once discontinued. So that the weary limbs repair their exhausted vigour; while the pensive thoughts drop their load of sorrows, and the busy ones rest from the fatigue of application. Most reviving cordial! equally beneficial to our animal and intellectual powers. It supplies the fleshly machine, and keeps all its nice movements in a proper posture for easy play. It animates the thinking faculties with fresh alacrity, and rekindles their ardour for the studies of the dawn. Without these enlivening recruits, how soon would the most robust constitution be wasted into a walking skeleton; and the most learned sage degenerate into a hoary idiot! Some time ago I beheld with surprise poor Florio. His air was wild; his countenance meagre, his thoughts roving, and speech disconcerted. Inquiring the cause of this strange alteration, I was informed, that for several nights he had not closed his eyes in sleep. For want of which noble restorative, that sprightly youth (who was once the life of the discourse, and the darling of the company) is become a spectacle of misery and horror. How many of my fellow-creatures are at this very instant confined to the bed of languishing, and complaining with that illustrious sufferer of old, wearisome nights are appointed to me! (Job vii. 3.) Instead of indulging soft repose, they are counting the tedious hours, telling every striking clock, or measuring the very moments by their throbbing pulse. How many, harassed with pain, most passionately long to make some little truce with their agonies in peaceful slumbers! How many, sick with disquietude, and restless even on their downy pillows, would purchase this transient oblivion of their woes almost at any rate! That which wealth cannot procure, which multitudes sigh for in vain, thy God has bestowed on thee times out of number. The welcome visitant, punctual at the needed hour, has entered thy chamber, and poured his poppies round thy couch; has gently closed thine eye-lids, and shed his slumberous dews over all thy senses.

Since sleep is so absolutely necessary, so inestimably valuable, observe what a fine apparatus almighty goodness has made to accommodate us with the balmy blessing! With how kind a precaution, he removes whatever might obstruct its access, or impede its influence! He draws around us the curtain of darkness; which inclines us to a drowsy indolence, and conceals every object that might too strongly agitate the sense. He conveys peace into our apartments, and imposes silence on the whole creation. Every animal is bid to tread softly, or rather to cease from its motion, when man is retiring to his repose. May we not discern, in this gracious disposition of things, the tender cares of a nursing-mother, who hushes every noise, and secludes every disturbance, when she has laid the child of her love to rest. So, by such soothing circumstances, and gently working opiates, he giveth to his beloved sleep. (Psalm cxxvii. 2.)

Another signal instance of a providence nent upon our welfare is, that we are preserved safe in the hours of slumber. How are we then lost to all apprehension of danger; even though the murderer be at our bed side, or his naked sword at our breast! Destitute of all concern for ourselves, we are unable to think of, much more to provide for, our own security. At these moments, therefore, we lie open to innumerable perils: perils from the resistless rage of flames; perils from the insidious artifices of thieves, or the outrageous violence of robbers; perils from the irregular workings* of our own thoughts, and especially from the incursions of our spiritual enemy.

What dreadful mischief might that restless, that implacable adversary of mankind work, was there not an invisible hand to control his rage, and protect poor mortals! What scenes of horror might he represent to our imaginations, and "scare us with dreams, or terrify us with visions!"† But

* I think it is referable only to a superintending and watchful providence, that we are not hurried into the most pernicious actions, when our imagination is heated, and our reason stupified by dreams. We have sometimes heard of unfortunate persons, who, walking in their sleep, have thrown themselves headlong from a window, and been dashed to death on the pebbles. And whence is it that such disastrous accidents are only related as pieces of news, not experienced by ourselves or our families? Were our minds more sober in their operations, or more circumspect in their regards? No verily, nothing could be more wild than their excursions, and none could be more inattentive to their own welfare. Therefore, if we have laid us down, and slept in peace, it was because the Lord vouchsafed us the sweet refreshment: if we rose again in safety, it was because the Lord sustained us with his unremitting protection.

Will the candid reader excuse me, if I add a short story, or rather matter of fact, suitable to the preceding remark? Two persons who had been hunting together in the day, slept together the following night. One of them was renewing the pursuit in his dream; and, having run the whole circle of the chase, came at last to the fall of the stag. Upon this, he cries out with a determined ardour, I'll kill him; I'll kill him; and immediately feels for the knife, which he carried in his pocket. His companion happening to be awake, and observing what passed, leaped from the bed: being secure from danger, and the moon shining into the room, he stood to view the event; when, to his inexpressible surprise, the infuriated sportsman gave several deadly stabs, in the very place, where, a moment before, the throat and the life of his friend lay. This I mention as a proof that nothing hinders us, even from being assassins of others, or murderers of ourselves, amidst the mad sallies of sleep—but the preventing care of our heavenly Father.

the Keeper of Israel, who never slumber, nor sleeps, interposes in our behalf, at once to cherish us under his wings, and to defend us with a shield. It is said of Solomon, "that threescore valiant men were about his bed, all expert in war; every one with his sword upon his thigh, because of fear in the night;" (Song iii. 7, 8.) but one greater than Solomon, one mightier than myriads of armed hosts, even the great Jehovah, in whom is everlasting strength, vouchsafes to encamp about our houses, watch over our sleeping minutes, and to stop all the avenues of ill. O! the unwearied and condescending goodness of our Creator! who lulls us to our rest by bringing on the silent shades; and plants his own ever-watchful eye as our sentinel, while we enjoy the needful repose.

Reason now resigns her sedate office, and fancy, extravagant fancy, leads the mind through a maze of vanity. The head is crowned with false images, and tantalized with the most ridiculous misapprehensions of things. Some are expatiating amidst fairy fields and gathering garlands of visionary bliss, while their bodies are stretched on a wisp of straw, and sheltered by the cobwebs of a barn. Others, quite insensible of their rooms of state, are mourning in a doleful dungeon, or struggling with the raging billows. Perhaps, with hasty steps, they climb the craggy cliff, and with real anxiety fly from the imaginary danger; or else, benumbed with sudden fear, and finding themselves unable to escape, they give up at once their hopes and their efforts; and, though reclined on a couch of ivory, are sinking, all helpless and distressed, in the furious whirlpool. So unaccountable are the vagaries of the brain, while sleep maintains its dominion over the limbs.

But is this the only season when absurd and incoherent irregularities play their magic on our minds? Are there not those who dream even in their waking moments?—Some pride themselves in a notion of superior excellency, because the royal favour has annexed a few splendid titles to their names, or because the dying silk-worm has bequeathed her finest threads to cover their nakedness. Others congratulate their own signal happiness, because loads of golden lumber are amassed together in their coffers; or promise themselves a most superlative felicity indeed, when some thousands more are added to the useless heap.—Nor are there wanting others, who gape after substantial satisfaction from airy from his conduct towards Christ on the high mountain; and that he is too ready, if not restrained by an over-ruling power, to employ his dexterity in afflicting mankind, is evident from his treatment of Job. See Luke iv. 5. Job vii. 13.

applause: and flatter themselves with I know not what immortality, in the momentary buzz of renown. Are any of these a whit more reasonable in their opinions, than the poor ragged wretch in his reveries, who while snoring under a hedge, exults in the possession of his stately palace and sumptuous furniture? If persons who are very vassals to their own domineering passions, and led captive by numberless temptations; if these persons pique themselves with a conceit of their liberty, and fancy themselves the generous and gallant spirits of the age; where is the difference between theirs and the madman's frenzy, who though chained to the floor, is throned in thought, and wielding an imaginary sceptre? In a word, as many as borrow their dignity from a plume of feathers, or the gaudy trappings of fortune; as many as send their souls to seek for bliss in the blandishments of sense, or in any thing short of the divine favour, and a well grounded hope of the incorruptible inheritance; what are they, but dreamers with their eyes open—delirious, though in health?

Would you see their picture drawn to the very life, and the success of their schemes calculated with the utmost exactness; cast your eye upon that fine representation exhibited by the prophet: "It shall be even as when a hungry man dreameth, and behold he eateth; but he awaketh, and his soul is empty; or, as when a thirsty man dreameth, and behold he drinketh; but he awaketh, and behold he is faint, and his soul hath appetite; (Isa. xxix. 8. Such is the race, and such the prize, of all those candidates for honour and joy, who run wide from the mark of the high calling of God in Christ Jesus. They live in vanity, and die in woe. Awaken us, merciful Lord, from these noon-tide trances! Awaken us, while conviction may turn to our advantage, and not serve only to increase our torment. O! let our "eyes be enlightened to discern the things that are excellent," and no longer be imposed upon by fantastic appearances, which, however pompous they may seem, will prove more empty than the visions of the night, more transient than the dream that is forgotten.

Having mentioned sleep and dreams, let me once again consider those remarkable incidents of our frame; so very remarkable, that I may venture to call them a kind of experimental mystery, and little less than a standing miracle. Behold the most vigorous constitution when stretched on the bed of ease, and totally resigned to the slumbers of the night: its activity is oppressed with fetters of indolence; its strength is consigned over to a temporary annihilation; the nerves are like a bow unstrung, and the whole animal system is like a motionless log. Behold a person of the most delicate sensations, and amiable dispositions: his eyes, though thrown wide open, admit not the visual ray, at least distinguish not objects: his ears, with the organs unimpaired, and articulate accents beating upon the drum, perceive not the sound, at least apprehend not the meaning. The senses, and their exquisitely fine feelings, are overwhelmed with an unaccountable stupefaction. You call him a social creature: but where are his social affections? He knows not the father that begat him, and takes no notice of the friend that is as his own soul. The wife of his bosom may expire by his side, and he lie more unconcerned than a barbarian. The children of his body may be tortured with the severest pangs, and he, even in the same chamber, remain untouched with the least commiseration. Behold the most ingenious scholar, whose judgment is piercing, and able to trace the most intricate difficulties of science; his taste refined, and quick to relish all the beauties of sentiment and composition: yet, at this juncture, the thinking faculties are untinged, and the intellectual economy quite disconcerted. Instead of close connected reasonings, nothing but a disjointed huddle of absurd ideas; instead of well-digested principles, nothing but a disorderly jumble of crude conceptions: the most palpable delusions impose upon his imagination. The whole night passes, and he frequently mistakes it for a single minute; is not sensible of the transition, hardly sensible of any duration.

Yet, no sooner does the morning draw back his curtains, and day-light fill the room, but he awakes, and finds himself possessed of all the valuable endowments, which, for several hours were suspended or lost. His sinews are braced, and fit for action; his senses are alert and keen. The romantic visionary brightens into the master of reason. The frozen or benumbed affections melt with tenderness, and glow with benevolence; and, what is beyond measure surprising, the intoxicated mind works itself sober, not by slow degrees, but in the twinkling of an eye recovers from its perturbation. Why does not the stupor which deadens all the nice operations of the animal powers hold fast its possession? When the thoughts are once disadjusted, why are they not always in confusion? How is it that they are rallied in a moment; and, from the wildest irregularity, reduced to the most orderly array? From an inactivity resembling death, how is the body so suddenly restored to vigour and agility? From extravagancies bordering upon madness, how is the understanding instantaneously re-established in sedateness and harmony? Surely, "this is the Lord's doing, and it should be marvellous in our eyes;" should awaken our gratitude, and inspire our praise.

This is the time in which ghosts are supposed to make their appearance. Now the timorous imagination teems with phantoms, and creates numberless terrors to itself. Now dreary forms, in sullen state, stalk along the gloom; or, swifter than lightning, glide across the shades. Now voices more than mortal* are heard from the echoing vaults, and groans issue from the hollow tombs. Now melancholy spectres visit the ruins of ancient monasteries, and frequent the solitary dwellings of the dead. They pass and repass, in unsubstantial images, along the forsaken galleries; or take their determined stand over some lamented grave. How often has the school-boy fetched a long circuit, and trudded many a needless step, in order to avoid the haunted church-yard! Or if necessity, sad necessity, has obliged him to cross the spot, where human skulls are lodged below, and the baleful yews shed supernumerary horrors above: a thousand hideous stories rush into his memory; fear adds wings to his feet; he scarce touches the ground; dares not once look behind him; and blesses his good fortune, if no frightful sound purred at his heels, if no ghastly shape bolted upon his sight.

It is strange to observe the excessive timidity which possesses many people's minds on this fanciful occasion, while they are void of all concern on others of the most tremendous import. Those who are startled, in any dark and lonely walk, at the very apprehension of a single spectre, are nevertheless unimpressed at the sure prospect of entering into a whole world of disembodied beings; nay, are without any emotions of awe, though they know themselves to be hastening into the presence of the great, infinite, and eternal Spirit. Should some pale messenger from the regions of the dead draw back our curtains at the hour of midnight, and, appointing some particular place, say, as the horrid apparition to Brutus, I'll meet thee there!†, I believe the boldest heart would feel something like a panic; would seriously think upon the adventure, and be in pain for the event. But when a voice from heaven cries, in the awakening language of the prophet, Prepare to meet thy God, O Israel; (Amos iv. 12.) how little is the warning regarded! how soon is it forgot! Preposterous stupidity! to be utterly unconcerned, where it is the truest wisdom to take the alarm; and to be all trepidation, where there is nothing really terrible. Do thou, my soul, remember thy Saviour's admonition; "I will forewarn you whom you shall fear: Fear not these imaginary horrors of the night; but fear that awful being, whose revelation of himself, though with expressions of peculiar mercy, made Moses, his favourite servant, tremble exceedingly; whose manifestation, when he appears with purposes of inexorable vengeance, will make mighty conquerors, who were familiar with dangers and estranged to dismay, call upon the mountains to fall on them, and the rocks to cover them! the menace of whose majestic eye, when he comes attended with thousand thousands of his immortal hosts, will make the very heavens cleave asunder, and the earth flee away. O! dread his displeasure; secure his favour; and then thou mayest commit all thy other anxieties to the wind; thou mayest laugh at every other fear."

This brings to my mind a memorable and amazing occurrence, recorded in the book of Job; (Job iv. 12, 14, &c.) which is, I think, no inconsiderable proof of the real existence of apparitions* on some very extraordinary emergencies, while it discountsenances those legions of idle tales, which superstition has raised and credulity received; since it teaches us, that if at any time those visitants from the unknown world render themselves perceivable by mortals, it is not upon any errand of frivolous consequence, but to convey intelligence of the utmost moment, or to work impressions of the highest advantage.

* Is a proof of the real existence of apparitions, if the sense in which I have always understood this passage be true.—Eliphaz, I apprehend, was neither in a trance nor in a dream, but perfectly awake.—Though he speaks of sleep, he speaks of it as fallen not upon himself, but upon other men. He does not mention dreams, though somnia would have suited the verse (if the book be in metre) altogether as well as visions. It could not surely be a wind, as some translate the word; because the circumstance of standing still is not so compatible with the nature of a wind; and a wind would have passed above him, all around him, as well as before him; not to add, how low a remark it is, and how unworthy of a place in so august a description, that he could not discern the form of a wind.—It seems, therefore, to have been a real spirit; either angelical, as were those which presented themselves to Abraham resting at the door of his tent, and to Lot sitting in the gate of Sodom; or else the spirit of some departed saint, as in the case of Samuel's apparition, or the famous appearance of Moses and Elijah on the mount of transfiguration; a spirit assuming some vehicle, in order to become visible to the human eye; which, accordingly, Eliphaz saw, exhibiting itself as an object of sight, but saw so obscurely and indistinctly, that he was not able to describe its aspect, or to discern whom it resembled.

* Vox quoque per lucos vulgo ex audita silentibus, et simulacra modis pallentia miris. Visa sub obscurum noctis.—Virg.

† The story of Brutus and his evil genius, is well known. Nor must it be deemed, that the precise words of the spectre to the hero were, I'll meet thee at Phillippi. But as this would not answer my purpose, I was obliged to make an alteration in the circumstance of place.

It was in the dead of night : all nature lay shrouded in darkness : Every creature was buried in sleep : The most profound silence reigned through the universe. In these solemn moments, Eliphaz alone, all wakeful and solitary, was musing upon sublime and heavenly subjects ; when, lo ! an awful being from the invisible realms burst into his apartment.* A spirit passed before his face. Astonishment seized the beholder ; his bones shivered within him ; his flesh trembled all over him ; and the hair of his head stood erect with horror. Sudden and unexpected was the appearance of the phantom ; not such its departure. It stood still, to present itself more fully to his view : It made a solemn pause, to prepare his mind for some momentous message. After which a voice was heard ; a voice, for the importance of its meaning, worthy to be had in everlasting remembrance ; for the solemnity of its delivery, enough to alarm a heart of stone. It spoke, and this was the purport of its words : " Shall man, frail man, be just before the mighty God ? Shall even the most accomplished of mortals be pure in the sight of his Maker ? † Behold, and consider it attentively : He put no such trust in his most exalted servants as should bespeak them incapable of defect ! and his very angels he charged with folly, as sinking, even in the highest perfection of their holiness, infinitely beneath his transcendent glories ; as falling, even in all the fidelity of their obedience, inexpressibly short of the homage due to his adorable majesty. If angelic natures must not presume to justify either themselves or their services before uncreated purity, how much more absurd is such a notion, how much more impious such an attempt, in them that dwell in houses of clay, whose original is from the dust, and whose state is all imperfection."

* I have given this solemn picture a modern dress, rather for the sake of variety and illustration, than from any apprehension of improving the admirable original. Such an attempt, I am sensible, would be more absurdly vain, than to lacquer gold, or to paint the diamond. The description in Eliphaz's own language is awful and affecting to the last degree—a night-piece, dressed in all the circumstances of the deepest horror. I question whether Shakespeare himself, though so peculiarly happy for his great command of terrifying images, has any thing superior or comparable to this. The judges of fine composition see the masterly strokes; and I believe the most ordinary reader feels them chilling his blood, and awakening emotions of dread in his mind.

† There seems to be a significant and beautiful gradation in the Hebrew, which I have endeavoured to preserve by a sort of paraphrastic version. The reader will observe a new turn given to the sentiment, preferable, I think, to that which our English translation exhibits. Not, " Shall man be more just than God ?" but, " Shall man be just before, or in the sight of God ?" The passage thus rendered, speaks a truth incomparably more weighty, and needful to be inculcated ; a truth exactly parallel to that humbling confession of the prophet, " we are all as an unclean thing;" and to that solemn declaration of the Psalmist : " In thy sight shall no man living be justified."

I would observe from hence, the very singular necessity of that poverty of spirit which entirely renounces its own attainments, and most thankfully submits to the righteousness of the incarnate God. To inculcate this lesson, the Son of the Blessed came down from heaven, and pressed no other principle with so repeated an importunity on his hearers.* To instil the same doctrine, the Holy Ghost touched the lips of the apostles with sacred eloquence, and made it an eminent part of their commission " to demolish every high imagination." That no expedient might be wanting to give it a deep and lasting efficacy on the human mind, a phantom arises from the valley of the shadow of death, or a teacher descends from the habitation of spirits. Whatever then we neglect, let us not neglect to cultivate this grace, which has been so variously taught, so powerfully enforced.

Hark ! a doleful voice. With sudden starts, and hideous screams, it disturbs the silence of the peaceful night. It is the screech-owl, sometimes in frantic, sometimes in disconsolate accents, uttering her woes. † She flies the vocal grove, and slurs the society of all the feathered choir. The blooming gardens, and flowery meads, have no charms for her. Obscure shades, ragged ruins, and walls overgrown with ivy, are her favourite haunts. Above, the mouldering precipice nods, and threatens a fall ; below, the toad crawls, or the poisonous adder hisses. The sprightly morning which awakens other animals into joy, administers no pleasure to this gloomy recluse. Even the smiling face of day is her aversion, and all its lovely scenes create nothing but uneasiness.

So, just so, would it fare with the ungodly, were it possible to suppose their admission into the chaste and bright abodes of endless felicity. They would find nothing but disappointment and shame, even at the fountain-head of happiness and honour. For how could the tongue habituated to profaneness, taste any delight in the harmonious adorations of heaven ? How could the lips cankered with slander, relish the raptures of everlasting praise ? Where would be the satisfaction of the vain beauty, or the supercilious grandee? Since, in the temple of the skies, no incense of flattery would be addressed to the former, nor any obsequious homage paid to the latter. The spotless and inconceivable purity of the blessed God, would flash confusion on the lascivious eye. The envious mind must be on a rack of self-tormenting passions, to observe millions of happy beings shining in all the perfections of glory, and solacing themselves in the fulness of joy. In short, the un sanctified soul, amidst holy and triumphant spirits, even in the refined regions of bliss and immortality, would be like this melancholy bird, dislodged from her darksome retirement, and imprisoned under the beams of day.*

* It is well worthy of our observation, says an excellent commentator, that no one sentence uttered by our Lord, is so frequently repeated as this : " Whosoever shall exalt himself, shall be abased ; and he that shall humble himself shall be exalted," which occurs at least ten times in the Evangelists ; but is never duly accomplished in us, till we disclaim all pretensions to merit and righteousness of our own, and seek them only in the atonement and obedience of Jesus Christ.

The voice of this creature screaming at our windows, or of the raven croaking over our houses, is, they say, a token of approaching death. There are persons who would regard such an incident with no small degree of solitude. Trivial as it is, it would damp their spirits, perhaps break their rest. One cannot but wonder, that people should suffer themselves to be affrighted at such fantastical, and yet be quite unaffected with real, presages of their dissolution. Real presages of this awful event address us from every quarter. What are these incumbent glooms which overwhelm the world, but a kind of pall provided for nature, and an image of that long night, which will quickly cover the inhabitants of the whole earth? What an affinity has the sleep,† which will very soon weigh down my drowsy eye-lids, with that state of entire cessation, in which all my senses must be laid aside! The silent chamber, and the bed of slumber, are a very significant representation of the land where all things are hushed, all things are forgotten. What meant that deep death-bell note, which the other evening saddened the air? Laden with heavy accents, it struck our ears, and seemed to knock at the door of our hearts. Surely, it brought a message to surviving mortals, and thus the tidings ran: "Mortals, the destroyer of your race is on his way. The last enemy has begun the pursuit, and is gaining ground upon you every moment. His paths are strewn with heaps of slain. Even now his javelin has laid one of your neighbours in the dust; and will soon, very soon, aim the inevitable blow at each of your lives."

We need not go down to the charnel-house, nor carry our research into the repositories of the dead, in order to find memorials of our impending doom. A multitude of these remembrancers are planted in all our paths, and point the heedless passengers to their long home. I can hardly enter a considerable town, but I meet the funeral procession; or the mourners going about the streets. The hatchment suspended on the wall, or the crape streaming in the air, are silent intimations, that both rich and poor have been emptying their houses, and replenishing their sepulchres. I can scarce join in any conversation, but mention is made of some that are given over by the physician, and hovering on the confines of eternity; of others, that have just dropt their clay amidst weeping friends, and are gone to appear before the Judge of all the earth. There's not a newspaper comes to my hand, but, amidst all its entertaining narrations, reads several serious lectures on mortality. What else are the repeated accounts of age worn out by slow-consuming sicknesses; of youth dashed to pieces by some sudden stroke of casualty; of patriots exchanging their seats in the senate, for a lodging in the tomb; of misers resigning their breath, and (O! relentless destiny!) leaving their very riches for others? Even the vehicles of our amusement are registers of the deceased; and the voice of fame seldom sounds but in concert with a knell.

These monitors crowd every place; not so much as the scenes of our diversion expected. What are the decorations of our public buildings, and the most elegant furniture of our parlours, but the imagery of death, and trophies of the tomb? That marble bust, and those gilded pictures, how solemnly they recognise the fate of others, and speakingly remind us of our own! I see, I hear, and O! I feel this great truth: It is interwoven with my constitution. The frequent decays of the structure foretell its final ruin. What are all the pains that have been darted through my limbs; what every disease that has assailed my health; but the advanced guards of the foe? What are the languors and weakness that attend the labours of each revolving day, but the more secret practices of the adversary, slowly undermining the earthly tabernacle?

Amidst so many notices, shall we go on thoughtless and unconcerned? Can none of these prognostics, which are as sure as oracles, awaken our attention, and engage

* I would beg of the reader to observe, with what emphasis and propriety, our Lord touches this important point, in his reply to Nicodemus. "Verily, verily, I say unto thee, Except a man be born again, he cannot enter into the kingdom of heaven." q. d. "I wave the authority of the supreme Judge, and speak with the condescension of a teacher in Israel. Though I might, without being liable to the least control, pass it into a sovereign decree, That unregenerate mortals, who are slaves to corrupt appetites, shall not enter the habitations of the just; I rather choose to represent it as a case utterly impossible; and charge the calamity, not upon divine severity, but upon human folly. Such persons, from the very nature of things, preclude themselves; they incapacitate their own minds; and contrarities must be reconciled, before they, in their unregenerate condition, can be partakers of those spiritual and sublime delights." John iii. 3.

our circumspection? Noah, it is written, being warned of God, prepared an ark. Imitate, my soul—imitate this excellent example. Admonished by such a cloud of witnesses, be continually putting thyself in a readiness for the last change. Let not that day, of which thou hast so many infallible signs, come upon thee unawares. Get the ivy untwined, and thy affections disentangled from this enchanting world, that thou mayest be able to quit it without reluctance. Get the dreadful hand-writing cancelled, and all thy sins blotted out, that thou mayest depart in peace, and have nothing to fear at the decisive tribunal. Get, O! get thyself interested in the Redeemer's merits; and transformed into his sacred image; then shalt thou be meet for the inheritance of saints in light, and mayest even desire to be dissolved, and to be with Christ.

Sometimes in my evening walk I have heard

—The wakeful bird,
Sing dorkling, and in shadiest covert hid,
Tune her nocturnal note.*

How different the airs of this charming songster, from those harsh and boding outcries! The little creature ran through all the variations of music; and showed herself mistress of every grace, which constitutes or embellishes harmony. Sometimes she swells a manly throat, and her song kindles into ardour. The tone is so bold, and strikes with such energy, you would imagine the sprightly serenader in the very next thicket. Anon the strain languishes, and the mournful warbler melts into tenderness. The melancholy notes just steal upon the shades, and faintly touch your ear; or, in soft and sadly pleasing accents, they seem to die along the distant vales, silence is pleased, and night listens to the trilling tale.

What an invitation is this, to slip away from the thronged city! This coy and modest minstrel entertains only the lovers of retirement. Those who are carousing over their bowls, or ranting at the riotous club, lose this feast of harmony. Unlike manner, the pleasures of religion, and the joy of reconciliation with God; the satisfaction arising from an established interest in Christ, and from the prospect of a blissful immortality; these are all lost to the mind that is ever in the crowd, and dares not, or delights not, to retire within itself. Are we charmed with the nightingale's song! Do we wish to have it nearer, and hear it oftener! Let us seek a renewed heart, and a resigned will, a conscience that whispers peace, and passions that are tuned by grace; then shall we never want a melody in our breasts, far more musically pleasing than sweet Philomela's sweetest strains.

As different as the voices of these birds, are the circumstances of those few persons who continue awake. Some are squandering pearls, shall I say, or kingdoms? No; but what is unspeakably more precious—Time! squandering this inestimable talent with the most senseless and wanton prodigality. Not content with allowing a few spare minutes for the purpose of necessary recreation, they lavish many hours, devote whole nights, to that idle diversion of shuffling, ranging, and detaching a set of painted pasteboards. Others, instead of this busy trifling, act the part of their own tormentors. They even piquet themselves,* and call it amusement; they are torn by wild horses, yet term it a sport. What else is the gamester's practice? His mind is stretched on the tenter-hooks of anxious suspense, and agitated by the fiercest extremes of hope and fear. While the dice are rattling, his heart is throbbing, his fortune is tottering; and possibly, at the very next throw, the one sinks in the gulf of ruin, the other is hurried into the rage of distraction.

Some, snatched from the bloom of health and the lap of plenty, are confined to the chamber of sickness; where they are constrained either to plunge into the everlasting world in an unprepared condition, or else (sad alternative!) to think over all the follies of a heedless life, and all the bitterness of approaching death. The disease rages, it baffles the force of medicine, and urges the reluctant wretch to the brink of the precipice. While furies rouse the conscience, and point at the bottomless pit below. Perhaps his drooping mother, deprived long ago of the husband of her bosom, and bereft of all her other offspring, is even now receiving the blow which consummates her calamities.† In vain she tries to assuage the sorrows of a beloved son: in vain she attempts, with her tender offices, to prolong a life dearer than her own. He faints in her arms: he bows his head: he sinks in death. Fatal, doubly fatal, that last expiring pang! While it dislodges the unwilling soul, it rends an only child from the yearning embraces of a parent, and tears away the support of her age from a disconsolate widow.

* Alluding to a very painful punishment, inflicted on delinquents among the soldiery.

† This brings to my mind one of the deepest mourning-pieces extant in the productions of the pen. The sacred historian paints it in all the simplicity of style, yet with all the strength of colouring; "when Jesus came nigh to the gate of the city, behold! there was a dead man carried out, the only son of his mother, and she was a widow." What a graduation is here! How pathetically beautiful! every fresh circumstance widens the wound, aggravates the calamity, till the description is worked up into the most finished picture of exquisite and insupportable distress. He was a young man, cut off in the flower of life amidst a thousand gay expectations and smiling hopes. A son, an only son; the afflicted mother's all, so that none remained to preserve the name or perpetuate the family. What rendered the case still more deplorable, she was a widow! left entirely desolate; abandoned to her woes; without any to share her sorrows, or to comfort her under the irreparable loss. Is not this a fine sketch of the impassioned and picturesque? Who can consider the narrative with any attention, and not feel his heart penetrated with a tender commiseration? Luke vii. 12.

While these long for a reprieve, others invite the stroke. Quite weary of the world, with a restless impatience, they sigh for dissolution; some pining away under the tedious decays of an incurable consumption, or gasping for breath and almost suffocated by an inundation of dropsical waters. On some a relentless cancer has fastened its envenomed teeth, and is gnawing them, though in the midst of bodily vigour, in the midst of pitying friends, gradually to death. Others are on a rack of agonies, by convulsive fits of the stone. O! how the pain writhes their limbs! How the sweat bedews their flesh, and their eye-balls wildly roll! Methinks the night condoles with these her distressed children, and sheds dewy tears over their sorrowful abodes. But, of all mortals, they are the most exquisitely miserable, who groan beneath the pressure of a melancholy mind, or smart under the lashes of a resentful conscience. Though robed in ermine, or covered with jewels, the state of a slave chained to the galleys, or of an exile condemned to the mines, is a perfect paradise compared with theirs.

O that the votaries of mirth, whose life is a continued round of merriment and whim, would bestow one serious reflection on this variety of human woes! It might teach them to be less enamoured with the few languid sweets, that are thinly scattered through this vale of tears, and environed with such a multitude of ragged thorns. It might teach them no longer to dance away their years, with a giddy rambling impulse; but to aspire with a determined aim, after those happy regions, where delights abundant and unimbittered flow.

Can there be circumstances which a man of wisdom would more earnestly deprecate than these several instances of grievous tribulation? There are; and what is very astonishing, they are frequently the desire and the choice of those, who fancy themselves the sole heirs of happiness: Those, I mean, who are launching out into the depths of extravagance, and running excessive lengths of riot; who are prostituting their reputation, and sacrificing their peace, to the gratification of their lusts; supping the foundation of their health in debaucheries, or shipwrecking the interests of their families in their bowls, and what is worse, are forfeiting the joys of an eternal heaven, for the sordid satisfactions of the beast, for the transitory sensations of an hour. Ye slaves of appetite, how far am I from envying your gross sensualities and voluptuous revels! Little, ah! little are you sensible, that while indulgence showers her roses, and luxury diffuses her odours, they scatter poisons also, and shed unheeded bane. — Evils incomparably more malignant than the wormwood and gall of the sharpest affliction. Since death is in the drunkard's cup, and worse than poinards in the harlot's embrace, may it ever be the privilege of the man whom I love, to go without his share of these pestilent sweets! †

Abundance of living sparks glitter in the lanes, and twinkle under the hedges. I suppose they are the glow-worms, which have lighted their little lamps, and obtained leave, through the absence of the sun, to play a feeble beam. A faint glimmer just serves to render them perceivable, without tending at all to dissipate the shades, or making any amends for the departed day. Should some weather-beaten traveller, dropping with wet, and shivering with cold, hover round this mimicry of fire, in order to dry his garments and warm his benumbed limbs; should some bewildered traveller, groping for his way, in a starless night, and trackless desert, take one of these languid tapers, as a light to his feet, and a lantern to his path; how certainly would both the one and the other be frustrated of their expectation! And are they more likely to succeed, who, neglecting that sovereign balm which distilled from the cross, apply any carnal diversion to heal the anxiety of the mind? who, deaf to the infallible decisions of revelation, resign themselves over to the erroneous conjectures of reason, in order to find the way that leadeth unto life? or, lastly, who have recourse to the froth of this vain world, for a satisfactory portion and a substantial happiness? Their conduct is in no degree wiser; their disappointment equally sure; and their miscarriage infinitely more disastrous. To speak in the delicate language of a sacred writer, "they sow the wind, and will reap the whirlwind." Hos. viii. 7.

To speak more plainly, the pleasures of the world, which we are all so prone to dote upon; and the powers of fallen reason, which some are so apt to idolize; ‡ are not only vain, but treacherous; not only a painted flame, like the sparkling animals, but much like those unctuous exhalations, which arise from the marshy ground, and often dance before the eye of the benighted way-faring man. Kindled into a sort of fire, they personate a guide, and seem to offer their service; but blazing with delusive light, mislead their follower into hidden pits, headlong precipices, and unfathomable gulfs; where, far from his beloved friends, far from all hopes of succour, the unhappy wanderer is swallowed up and lost.

Not long ago we observed a very surprising appearance in the western sky. A prodigious star took its flaming route through those coasts; and trailed as it passed, a tremendous length of fire, almost over half the heavens. Some, I imagine, viewed the portentous stranger, with much the same anxious amazement as Belshazzar beheld the hand-writing upon the wall. Some looked upon it as a bloody* flag, hung out by divine resentment over a guilty world. Some read in its glaring visage the fate of nations, and the fall of kingdoms.† To others it shook, or seemed to shake, pestilence and war from its horrid hair. For my part, I am not so superstitious as to regard what every astrologer has to prognosticate upon the accession of a comet, or the projection of its huge vapoury train. Nothing can be more precarious and unjustifiable, than to draw such conclusions from such events; since they neither are preternatural effects, nor do they throw the frame of things into any disorder. I would rather adore that omnipotent Being, who rolled those stupendous orbs from his creating hand, and leads them by his providential eye, through unmeasurable tracts of ether; who bids them now approach the sun, and glow with unsufferable ardours; ‡ now retreat to the utmost bounds of our planetary system, and make their entry among other worlds.

They are harmless visitants. I acquit them from the charge of causing, or being accessory to desolating plagues. Would to God there were no other more formidable indications of approaching judgments, or impending ruin! But, alas! when vice becomes predominant, and irreligion almost epidemical; when the sabbaths of a jealous God are notoriously profaned, and that name which is great, wonderful, and holy, is prostituted to the meanest, or abused to the most execrable purposes; when the worship of our great Creator and Preserver is banished from many of the most conspicuous families, and it is deemed a piece of rude impertinence so much as to mention the gracious Redeemer in our genteel interviews; when it passes for an elegant freedom of behaviour to ridicule the mysteries of Christianity, and a species of refined conversation to taint the air with lascivious hints; when those who sit in the scorner's chair sin with a high hand, and many of those who wear the professor's garb, are destitute of the power, and content themselves with the mere form of godliness; when such is the state of a community, there is reason, too apparent reason, to be horribly afraid. Such phenomena abounding in the moral world, are not fanciful, but real omens. Will not an injured God be avenged on such a nation as this? Will he not be provoked to "sweep it with the besom of destruction?"*

O that the inhabitants of Great Britain would lay these alarming considerations to heart! The Lord of hosts has commanded the sword of civil discord to return into its sheath; but have we returned every one from his evil ways? Are we become a renewed people, devoted to a dying Saviour, and zealous of good works? What mean those peals of sobs which burst from the expiring cattle? What mean those melancholy moans, where the lusty droves were wont to low? † What mean those arrows of untimely deaths, discharged on our innocent and useful animals? ‡

No wantonness or sloth has vitiated the blood of these laborious, temperate creatures. They have contracted no disease as she exercises her powers within these appointed limits, she is unspeakably serviceable, and cannot be too industriously cultivated; but, when she sets up herself in proud contradiction to the sacred oracles; when, all arrogant and self-sufficient, she says to the word of scripture, I have no need of thee; she is then, I must be bold to maintain, not only a glow-worm, but an ignis fatuus, not only a bubble, but a snare.

May not this remark, with the strictest propriety, and without the least limitation, be applied to the generality of our modern romances, novels, and theatrical entertainments? These are commonly calculated to inflame a wanton fancy; or, if conducted with so much modesty as not to debase the affections, they pervert the judgment, and bewilder the taste. By their incredible adventures, their extravagant parade of gallantry, and their characters widely different from truth and nature, they inspire foolish conceits, begot idle expectations, introduce a disgust of genuine history, and indispose their admirers to acquiesce in the decent civilities, or to relish the sober satisfactions of common life.

* Isa. xiv. 23. The eternal sovereign, speaking of Babylon, denounces this threatening. "I will sweep it with the besom of destruction."—What a noble, but dreadful image is here! How strongly and awfully portrayed! How pregnant also is its signification; intimating the vile nature, and expressing the total extirpation of this wicked people: at the same time, suggesting the perfect ease with which the righteous God would execute his intended vengeance.

† If these papers should be so happy as to outlive their author, perhaps it may be needful to inform posterity, that the above mentioned hints allude to a most terrible contagious and mortal distemper, raging among the horned cattle in various parts of the kingdom.

from unseasonable indulgences and inordinate revellings. The pure stream is their drink; the simple herb their repast. Neither care disturbs their sleep, nor passion inflames their breast. Whence, then, are they visited with such terrible disorders, as no prudence can prevent, nor any medicines heal? Surely these calamities are the weapons of divine displeasure, and manifest chastisements of an evil generation! * Surely God, the God to whom vengeance belongeth, has still a controversy with our sinful land! And who can tell where the visitation will end? What a storm may follow these delusive drops? O that we may "hear the rod, and who hath appointed it!" Taught by these penal effects of our disobedience, may we remove the accursed thing from our tents, our practices, our hearts; (Joshua vi. 18.) May we turn from all ungodliness, before wrath come upon us to the uttermost; before iniquity prove our ruin!

Sometimes at this hour, another most remarkable sight amuses the curious, and alarms the vulgar. A blaze of lambent meteors is kindled, or some very extraordinary lights are refracted, in the quarters of the north. The streams of radiance, like legions rushing to the engagement, meet and mingle, insomuch that the air seems to be all conflicting fire. Within a while they start from one another, and, like legions in precipitate flight, sweep each a separate way through the firmament. Now they are quiescent, anon they are thrown into a quivering motion; presently the whole horizon is illuminated with the glancing flames. Sometimes, with an aspect awfully ludicrous, they represent extravagant and antic vagaries: at other times, you would suspect that some invisible hand was playing off the dumb artillery of the skies, and, by a strange expedient, giving us the flash without the roar.

The villagers gaze at the spectacle: first with wonder, then with horror. A general panic seizes the country. Every heart throbs, and every face is pale. The crowds that flock together, instead of diminishing, increase the dread. They catch contagion from each other's looks and words: while fear is in every eye, and every tongue speaks the language of terror. Some see hideous shapes, armies mixing in fierce encounter, or fields swimming with blood. Some foresee direful events, states overthrow, or mighty monarchs tottering on their thrones. Others, scared with still more frightful apprehensions, think of nothing but the day of doom. "Sure," says one, "the unalterable hour is struck, and the end of all things come." "See," replies another, "how the blasted stars look wan! Are not these the signs of the Son of man coming in the clouds of heaven?" "Jesus, prepare us," (cries a third, and lifts up his eyes in devotion) for the archangel's trump, and the great tribunal!"

If this waving brightness, which plays innocently over our heads, be so amazing to multitudes; what inexpressible consternation must overwhelm unthinking mortals, when the general conflagration commences! The day, the dreadful day, is approaching, "in the which the heavens shall pass away with a great noise;"* and the elements shall melt with fervent heat; the earth also, and all the works that are therein, shall be burnt up. That mighty hand, which once opened the windows from on high, and broke up the fountains of the great deep, will then unlock all the magazines of fire, and pour a second deluge upon the earth. The vengeful flames, kindled by the breath of the Almighty, spread themselves from the centre to the circumference. Nothing can withstand their impetuosity; nothing can escape their rage. Universal desolation attends their progress. Magnificent palaces, and solemn temples, are laid in ashes. Spacious cities, and impregnable towers, are mingled in one smoking mass. Not only the productions of human art, but the works of almighty power, are fuel for the devouring element. The everlasting mountains melt, like the snows which cover their summit. Even vast oceans serve only to augment the inconceivable rapidity and fury of the blaze. O! how shall I or others stand undismayed amidst the glare of a burning world, unless the Lord Jehovah be our defence? How shall we be upheld in security, when the globe itself is sinking in a fiery ruin, unless the Rock of ages be our support.

Behold a new spectacle of wonder! The moon is making her entry on the eastern sky. See her rising in clouded majesty!

* 2 Pet. iii. 10. I have often thought this verse an eminent instance of that kind of beautiful writing, in which the very sound bears a sort of significance; at least carries an exact correspondence with the sense. The original expression is one of the hoarsest and deepest words in language. Nothing could be more exquisitely adapted to affect the ear, as well as impress the imagination, with the wreck of nature, and the crash of a fallen world. I scarce ever read this clause, but it brings to my mind that admired description in Milton:

— On a sudden open fly,
With impetuous recoil, and jarring sound,
Th' infernal doors, and on their hinges grate
Harsh thunder.—Book. II. l. 379.

It is a pleasing office, and a very laudable office of true criticism, to point out these inferior recommendations of the sacred classics. Though I believe, the inspired writers themselves, amidst all the elevation and magnificence of their divine ideas, disclaimed a scrupulous attention to such little matters of style.

* *Hinc lætis vituli vulgo moriuntur in herbis
Et dulces animas plena ad præsepia redolent,

Antesque sonant: ripe, collesque cupini.—*Æt. g.

opening as it were, and asserting her original commission to rule over the night. All grand and stately, but somewhat sullied is her aspect. However, she brightens as she advances, and grows clearer as she climbs higher, till at length her silver loses all its dross: she unveils her peerless light, and becomes "the beauty of heaven, the glory of the stars,"* delighting every eye, and cheering the whole world, with the brightness of her appearance and the softness of her splendours.—O, thou queen of the shades! may it be my ambition to follow this thy instructive example! While others are fond to transcribe the fashions of little courts, and to mimic personages of inferior state; be it mine to imitate thy improving purity. May my conduct become more unblemished, and my temper more refined, as I proceed farther and farther in my probationary course. May every sordid desire wear away, and every irregular appetite be gradually lost, as I make nearer approaches to the celestial mansions. Will not this be a comfortable evidence, that I too shall shine in my adored Redeemer's kingdom? shine with a richer lustre than that which radiates from thy resplendent orb; shine with an unfading lustre, when every ray that beams from thy beauteous sphere is totally extinguished?

The day afforded us a variety of entertaining sights. These were all withdrawn at the accession of darkness. The stars, kindly officious, immediately lent us their aid. This served to alleviate the frown of night, rather than to recover the objects from their obscurity. A faint ray, scarcely reflected, and not from the entire surface of things, gave the straining eye a very imperfect glimpse; such as rather mocked than satisfied vision. Now the moon is risen, and has collected all her beams, the veil is taken from off the countenance of nature. I see the recumbent flocks; I see the green hedge-rows, though without the feathered choristers hoping from spray to spray. In short, I see once again the world's great picture; not indeed in its late lively colours, but more delicately shaded, and arrayed in softer charms.†

What a majestic scene is here! incomparably grand, and exquisitely fine! The moon, like an immense crystal lamp, pendant in the magnificent ceiling of the heavens. The stars, like so many thousands of golden tapers, fixed in their azure sockets. All pouring their lustre on spacious cities, and lofty mountains; glittering on the ocean, gleaming on the forest; and opening a prospect, wide as the eye can glance, more various than fancy can paint.* We are forward to admire the performances of human art. A landscape, elegantly designed, and executed with a masterly hand; a piece of statuary, which seems, amidst all the recommendations of exact proportion and graceful attitude, to soften into flesh, and almost breathe with life;—these little imitations of nature, we behold with a pleasing surprise. And shall we be less affected, less delighted, with the inexpressibly noble, and completely finished original? The ample dimensions of Ranelagh's dome, the gay illuminations of Vauxhall grove, I should scorn to mention on such an occasion, were they not the objects of general admiration. Shall we be charmed with those puny essays of finite ingenuity, and touched with no transport at this stupendous display of omnipotent skill? at the august grandeur, and shining stateliness of the firmament; which forms an alcove for ten thousand worlds, and is ornamented with myriads of everlasting luminaries? Surely, this must betray, not only a total want of religion, but the most abject littleness of mind, and the utmost poverty of genius.

The moon is not barely "an ornament in the high places of the Lord," (Eccles. xliii. 9.) but of signal service to the inhabitants of the earth. How uncomfortable is deep, pitchy, total darkness! especially in the long absence of the winter's sun. Welcome, therefore, thrice welcome, this auspicious gift of Providence, to enliven the nocturnal gloom, and line with silver the raven-coloured mantle of night. How desirable to have our summer evenings illuminated! that we may be able to tread the dewy meads, and breathe the delicious fragrance of our gardens; especially, when the sultry heats render it irksome and fatiguing to walk abroad by day. How cheering to the shepherd the use of this universal lantern, as he tends his fleecy charge, or late consigns them to their hurdled cots! How comfortable and how advantageous to the mariner, as he ploughs the midnight main, to adjust the tackling, to explore his way,

* As when the moon, refulgent lamp of night,
O'er heaven's clear azure spreads her sacred light;
When not a breath disturbs the deep serene,
And not a cloud o'ercasts the solemn scene;
Around her throne the vivid planets roll,
And stars unnumber'd gild the glowing pole;
O'er the dark trees a yellower verdure shed,
And tip with silver every mountain's head:
Then shine the vales, the rocks in prospect rise;
A flood of glory bursts from all the skies:
The conscious swains, rejoicing in the sight,
Eye the blue vault, and bless the useful light.
Iliad viii.

I transcribe these lines, because Mr. Pope says, they exhibit, in the original, the finest night-piece in poetry. And if they are so beautiful in Homer's language, who can suspect their suffering any disadvantage from the pen of his admirable translator?

and under the influence of this beaming sence, to avoid the fatal rock ! For these, and other beneficial purposes, the hand of the Almighty has hung the stately branch on high ; and filled it with a splendour not confined to a single edifice, or commensurate to a particular square, but diffusive as the whole extent of the hemisphere.

The most faithful of our inferior servants are sometimes tardy in their office, sometimes negligent of their duty. But this celestial attendant is most exactly punctual, at all the stated periods of her ministration. If we choose to prolong our journey after the sun is gone down, the moon, during her whole increase, is always ready to act in the capacity of a guide. If we are inclined to set out very early in the morning, the moon, in her decrease, prevents the dawn, on purpose to offer her assistance. And because it is so pleasant a thing for the eyes to behold the light, the moon, at her full, by a course of unintermitted waiting, gives us as it were a double day. How apparently has the divine wisdom interested it-self, in providing even for the pleasurable accommodation of man ! How desirous that he should want no piece of commodious furniture, no kind of delightful convenience ; and, in prosecution of these benevolent intentions, has annexed so valuable an appendage to the terrestrial globe. Justly, therefore, does the Psalmist celebrate that admirable constitution, which ordained the moon and the stars to govern the night, as an instance of rich goodness, and of mercy which endureth for ever : (Psalm cxxxvi. 9.

The moon, it is confessed, is no luminous body. All the brightness which beautifies her countenance is originally in the sun, and no more than transmissively in her. That glorious orb is the parent of day, and the palace of light. From thence the morning star gilds her horn ;* from thence the planetary circles are crowned with lustre ; and from thence the moon derives all her silver radiance. It is pleasing to reflect, that such is the case with the all-sufficient Redeemer, and his dependent people. We are replenished from his fulness. What do we possess which we have not received ; and what can we desire, which we may not expect from that never-failing source of all good ? He is the author of our faith, and the former of our graces. In his unspotted life, we see the path ; in his meritorious death, the price ; and in his triumphant reurrection, the proof—of bliss and immortality. If we offend and fall seven times a-day, he is the Lord our peace, (Judges vi. 24.) If we are depraved, and our best deeds very unworthy ; he is the Lord our righteousness, (Jer. xxiii. 6.) If we are blind, and even brutish, in heavenly knowledge ; he is the Lord our wisdom, (1 Cor. i. 30.) his word dispels the shades ; his Spirit scatters the intellectual gloom ; his eye looks our darkness into day. In short we are nothing, and “ Christ is all.” Worse than defective in ourselves, “ we are complete in him.” So that if we shine, it is with delegated rays, and with borrowed light. We act by a strength, and glory in merits, not our own. Oh ! may we be thoroughly sensible of our dependence on the Saviour. May we constantly imbibe his propitious beams ; and never, by indulging unbelief, or backsliding into folly, withdraw our souls from his benign influences ; lest we lose our comfort and our holiness, as the fair ruler of the night loses her splendour, when her urn is turned from its fountain,* and receives no more communications of solar effulgence.

The moon is incessantly varying, either in her aspect, or her stages. Sometimes she looks full upon us, and her visage is all lustre : Sometimes she appears in profile, and shows us only half her enlightened face ; anon, a radiant crescent but just adorns her brow ; soon it dwindles into a slender streak ; till at length, all her beauty vanishes, and she becomes a beamless orb. Sometimes she rises with the descending day, and begins her procession amidst admiring multitudes ; ere long, she defers her progress till the midnight watches, and steals unobserved upon the sleeping world. Sometimes she just enters the edges of the western horizon, and drops us a ceremonious visit. Within a while, she sets out on her nightly tour from the opposite regions of the east, traverses the whole hemisphere, and never offers to withdraw, till the more refugent partner of her sway renders her presence unnecessary. In a word, she is, while conversant among us, still waxing or waning, and “ never continueth in one stay.”

Such is the moon, and such are all sublunary things—exposed to perpetual vicissitudes. How often, and how soon, have the faint echoes of renown slept in silence, or been converted into the clamours of obloquy ! The same lips ; almost with the same breath, cry, Hosanna and Crucify. Have not riches confessed their notorious treachery a thousand and a thousand times ? either melting away like snow in our hands

* I might, to justify this expression, observe that the planet Venus, commonly called the morning star, is found by our telescopes frequently to appear horned ; or to have a crescent of light, somewhat like the moon, a little before or after her conjunction. But this would be a remark too deep and refined for my scheme : which proceeds only upon a superficial knowledge, and the most obvious appearances of nature.

by insensible degree, or escaping like a winged prisoner from its cage with a precipitate flight. Have we not known the bridegroom's closet an anti-chamber to the tomb; and heard the voice which so lately pronounced the sparkling pair husband and wife, proclaim an everlasting divorce, and seal the decree with that solemn asseveration, "Ashes to ashes, dust to dust!" Our friends, though the medicine of life—our health, though the balm of nature, are a most precarious possession. How soon may the first become a corpse in our arms; and how easily is the last destroyed in its vigour! You have seen, no doubt, a set of pretty painted birds, perching on your trees, or sporting in your meadows. You was pleased with the lovely visitants, that brought beauty on their wings, and melody in their throats. But could you insure the continuance of this agreeable entertainment? No, truly. At the least disturbing noise, at the least terrifying appearance, they start from their seats, they mount the skies, and are gone in an instant, are gone for ever. Would you choose to have a happiness which bears date with their arrival, and expires at their departure? If you could not be content with a portion, enjoyable only through such a fortuitous term, not of years, but of moments, O! take up with nothing earthly; set your affections on things above; there alone is "no variableness or shadow of turning."

Job is not a more illustrious pattern of patience, than an eminent exemplification of this remark. View him in his private estate. He heaps up silver as the dust; he washes his steps in butter; and the rocks pour him out rivers of oil. View him in his public character: Princes revere his dignity; the aged listen to his wisdom; every eye beholds him with delight; every tongue loads him with blessings. View him in his domestic circumstances: On one hand, he is defended by a troop of sons; on the other, adorned with a train of daughters; and on all sides surrounded by "a very great household." Never was human felicity so consummate; never was disastrous revolution so sudden. The lightning which consumed his cattle was not more terrible, and scarce more instantaneous; the joyful parent is bereft of his offspring, and his children are buried in death. The man of affluence is stripped of his abundance; and he who was clothed in scarlet, embraces the dunghill. The venerable patriarch is the derision of scoundrels; and the late darling of an indulgent providence, is become "a brother to dragons, a companion of owls." Nor need we go back to former ages for proofs of this afflicting truth. In our times, in all times, the wheel continues the same incessant whirl; and frequently those who are triumphing to-day in the highest elevations of joy, to-morrow are bemoaning the instability of mortal affairs in the very depths of misery.* Amid so much fluctuation and uncertainty, how wretched is the condition which has no anchor of the soul, sure and steadfast! May thy loving kindness, O God, be our present treasure; and thy future glory our reversionary inheritance! Then shall our happiness not be like the full-orbed moon, which is "a light that decreaseth in its perfection;" but like the sun, when he goeth forth in his strength, and knoweth no other change, but that of shining more and more unto the perfect day.

Methinks, in this ever varying sphere, I see a representation not only of our temporal advantages, but also of our spiritual accomplishments. Such, I am sure, is what the kind partiality of a friend would call my righteousness; and such, I am apt to suspect,† is the righteousness of every man living. Now we exercise it in some few instances, in some little degrees: anon, sin revives, and leads our souls into a transient though unwilling captivity. Now we are meek; but soon a ruffling accident intervenes, and turns our composure into a fretful disquietude. Now we are humble; soon we reflect upon some inconsiderable or imaginary superiority over others, and a sudden elatement swells our minds. Now, perhaps, we possess a clean heart, and are warm with holy love; but, O! how easily is the purity of our affections sullied! how soon the fervour of our gratitude cooled! And is there not something amiss even in our best moments? Something to be ashamed of in all we are, something to be repented of in all we do?

* I believe I may venture to apply what the Termanite says of the affairs of the wicked to all sublunary things, as a true description of their very great instability. Job xxii. 16. rendered by Schultens, "Flumen fusum fundamentum eorum." Their foundation, (or what they reckon their most solid and stable possession) is a flood poured out: which is one of the boldest images, and most poetical beauties I ever met with in any language sacred or profane. In order to have a tolerable conception of the image, and a taste of its beauty, you must suppose a torrent of waters, rushing in broken cataracts, and with impetuous rapidity, from a steep and craggy mountain. Then imagine to yourself an edifice built upon the surge of this rolling precipice, which has no other basis than one of those headlong whirling waves. Was there ever such a representation of transitory prosperity, tending with inconceivable swiftness, unto ruin? Yet such is every form of human felicity, that is not grounded on Jesus, and a participation of his merits, who is the Rock of ages; on Jesus, and his image formed in our hearts, which is the hope of glory.

† I would not be understood as measuring in this respect, others by myself; but as taking my estimate from the unerring standard of Scripture. And indeed, proceeding on this evidence, supported by this authority, I might have ventured farther than a bare suspicion. For "there is not a just man upon earth, that doeth good, and sinneth not," says the Spirit of inspiration by Solomon (Eccles. vii. 20.) Nay, such is the purity, and so extensive are the demands of the divine law, that an apostle makes a still more humbling acknowledgment; "In many things we offend all." (James iii. 2.) And the unerring teacher, who most thoroughly knew our frame, directs the most advanced, most established, and most watchful Christians, to pray daily for the forgiveness of their daily trespasses.—To which testimonies, I beg leave to add an elegant passage from the Canticles; because it not only expresses the sentiment of this paragraph, but illustrates it by the very same similitude. She (the church) is fair as the moon; clear as the sun. Fair as the moon, the lesser and changeable light, in her sanctification; clear as the sun, the greater and invariable luminary in her justification. The inherent holiness of believers being imperfect, and subject to many inequalities; while their imputed righteousness is every way complete, and constantly like itself. Cant. vi. 10.

With what gladness, therefore, and adoring thankfulness, should we submit to the righteousness of "our incarnate God;" and receive as a divine gift, what cannot be acquired by human works! (Rom. v. 17, —x. 3.) A writer of the first distinction, and nicest discernment, styles the obedience of our glorious Surety, an everlasting righteousness, (Dan. ix. 24.) such as was subject to no interruption, nor obscured by the least blemish, but preceded always in the same uniform tenor of the most spotless perfection. This righteousness, in another sense, answers the prophet's exalted description; as its beneficial and sovereign efficacy knows no end, but lasts through all our life; lasts in the trying hour of death; lasts at the decisive day of judgment; lasts through every generation; and will last to all eternity.

Sometimes I have seen that resplendent globe stript of her radiance; or, according to the emphatical language of Scripture, "turned into blood." The earth, interposing with its opaque body, intercepted the solar rays, and cast its gloomy shadow on the moon. The malignant influence gained upon her sickening orb, extinguished more and more the feeble remainders of light, till, at length, like one in a deep swoon, no comeliness was left in her countenance—she was totally overspread with darkness. At this juncture, what a multitude of eyes were gazing upon the rueful spectacle! even of those eyes which disregarded the empress of the night, or beheld her with indifference, when, robed in glory, and riding in her triumphal chariot, she shed a softer day through the nations. But now, under these circumstances of disgrace, they watch her motions with the most prying attention. In every place her misfortune is the object of general observation, and the prevailing topic of discourse in every company.

Is it not thus with regard to persons of eminence in their respective spheres? Kings at the head of their subjects; nobles surrounded with their dependants; and (after names of so much grandeur, may I be allowed to add?) ministers labouring among their people,* are each in a conspicuous station. Their conduct in its minutest step, especially in any miscarriage, will be narrowly surveyed, and critically scanned. Can there be a louder call to ponder the paths of their feet, and to be particularly jealous over all their ways? Those who move in inferior life may grossly offend, and little alarm be given, perhaps no notice taken. But it is not to be expected that the least slip in their carriage, the least flaw in their character will pass undiscovered. Malice, with her eagle-eyes, will be sure to discern them, while Censure, with her shrill trumpet, will be as far from concealing them, as Calumny, with her treacherous whispers, from extenuating them. A planet may sink below the horizon, or a star for several months withdraw its shining; and scarce one in ten thousand perceive the loss; but if the moon suffers a transient eclipse, almost half the world are spectators of her dishonour.

Very different was the case, when at this late hour, I have taken a solitary walk on the western cliffs. At the foot of the steep mountain, the sea, all clear and smooth, spread itself into an immense plain, and held a watery mirror to the skies. Infinite heights above the firmament stretched its azure expanse, bespangled with unnumbered stars, and adorned with the moon "walking in brightness." (Job xxxi. 26.) She seemed to contemplate herself with a peculiar pleasure, while the transparent surface both received and returned her silver image. Here, instead of being covered with sackcloth, she shone with double lustre; or rather, with a lustre multiplied, in proportion to the number of beholders, and their various situations.

Such, methinks, is the effect of an exemplary behaviour in persons of exalted rank. Their course, as it is nobly distinguished, so it will be happily influential; others will catch the diffusive ray, and be ambitious to resemble a pattern so attracting, so commanding. Their amiable qualities will not terminate in themselves, but we shall see them reflected from their families, their acquaintance, their retainers. Just as we may now behold another moon, trembling* in the stream, glittering in the canal, and displaying its lovely impress on every collection of waters.

The moon, philosophy says, is a sort of sovereign over the great deep. Her orb, like a royal sceptre, sways the ocean, and actuates the fluid realms. It swells the tides, and perpetuates the reciprocal returns of ebb and flow, by which means the liquid element purges off its filth, and is preserved from being putrefied itself, and from poisoning the world. Is the moon thus operative on the vast abyss? and shall not the faith of eternal and infinite delights to come, be equally efficacious on this soul of mine? Far above her argent fields are treasures of happiness, unseen by mortal eye, by mortal ear unheard, and unconceived by any human imagination. In that desirable world, the most distinguished and exalted honours also are conferred; in comparison with which the thrones and diadems of earthly monarchs are empty pageants, and childish toys. Yonder arch of sapphire, with all its spangles of gold, is but the floor of those divine abodes. What then are the apartments? what is the palace? How bright with glories! how rich with bliss!

* "Ye are the light of the world. A city that is set on a hill cannot be hid." Matt. v. 14.

* Splendet tremulo sub lumine pontus.

O! ye mansions of blessedness; ye beauties of my Father's kingdom, which far outshine the lamps of the visible heaven, transmit your sweet and winning invitations to my heart. Attract and refine all my affections. Withdraw them from stagnating on the sordid shores of flesh; never suffer them to settle upon the impure lees of sense; but impress them with emotions of restless desire after sublime and celestial joys,—joys, that will proceed, still proceed, in a copious and everlasting flow, when seas shall cease to roll,—joys, that will charm every faculty with unimaginable pleasure, when the moon, with her waxing splendours, shall cheer our sight no more.

Enough for the present evening. My thoughts have been sufficiently exercised, and my steps begin to be attended with weariness. Let me obey the admonition of nature, and give respite to my meditations, slumber to my eyes. But stay.—Shall I retire to the bed of sleep, with as little ceremony, and with as much inattention, as the brutes to their sordid lair? Are no acknowledgments due to that divine Being who is the support of my life, and the length of my days? Have I no farther need of his protecting care; no more occasion for the blessings of his goodness? Lepidus perhaps may laugh at the bended knee, and have a thousand darts of raillery ready to discharge on the practice of devotion. The wits, I know, are unmercifully severe on what they call the drudgery of prayer, and the fantastical rant of praise. These they leave to the illiterate labourer, and the mean mechanic; or treat them with a contemptuous sneer, as the parson's ignoble trade.

Is it then an instance of superstitious blindness to distinguish, or of whimsical zeal to celebrate, the most supereminent excellency and merit? Is it an ungraceful business, or does it argue a grovelling disposition, to magnify goodness transcendently rich and diffusive? What can be so truly becoming a dependant state, as to pay our adoring homage to the Author of all perfection? and profess our devoted allegiance to the supreme Almighty Governor of the universe? Can any thing more significantly bespeak an ingenuous temper, or administer a more real satisfaction to its finest feelings, than the exercises of penitential devotion, by which we give vent to an honest anguish, or melt into filial sorrow, for our insensibility to the best of friends, for our disobedience to the best of parents? In a word, can there be a more sublime pleasure, than to dwell in fixed contemplation on the beauties of the eternal mind; the amiable original of all that is fair, grand, and harmonious; the beneficent giver of all that is convenient, comfortable, and useful? Can there be a more advantageous employ, than to present our requests to the Father of mercies; opening our minds to the irradiations of his wisdom, and all the faculties of our souls to the communications of his grace? It is strange, unaccountably strange, that the notion of dignity in sentiment, and the pursuit of refined enjoyment, should ever be disunited from devotion; that persons who make pretensions to an improved taste, and exalted genius, should neglect this most ennobling intercourse with the wisest and best of beings, the inexhaustible source of honour and joy.

Shall I be deterred from approaching this source of the purest delight? deterred from pursuing this highest improvement of my nature? deterred from all by a formidable banter, or confuted by one irrefragable smile? No: let the moon in her resplendent sphere, and yonder pole with all its starry train, witness if I be silent even or morn; if I refrain to kindle in my heart, and breathe from my lips, the reasonable incense of praise; praise to that great and glorious God who formed the earth and built the skies, who poured from his hand the watery world, and shed the all-surrounding air abroad. "Thou also madest the night, Maker omnipotent! and thou the day; which I, though less than the least of all thy mercies, have passed in safety, tranquillity, and comfort. When I was lost in the extravagance of dreams, or lay immersed in the insensibility of sleep, thy hand recovered me from the temporary lethargy; thy hand set a new, a delicately fine edge, on all my blunted senses, and strung my sinews with recruited vigour. When my thoughts were benumbed and stupified, thy quickening influence roused them into activity; when they were disconcerted and wild, thy regulating influence reduced them into order; refitting me at once to relish the innocent entertainments of an animal, and to enjoy the sublime gratifications of a rational capacity. When darkness covered the creation, at thy command the sun arose, painted the flowers, and distinguished every object; gave light to my feet, and gave nature with all her beautiful scenes to my eye. To thee, O thou God of my strength, I owe the continuance of my being, and the vivacity of my constitution. By thy sacred order, without any consciousness of mine, the wheels of life move, and the crimson fountain plays. Overruled by thy exquisite skill, it transforms itself, by the nicest operations of an inexplicable kind of chemistry, into a variety of the finest secretions, which glide into the muscles, and swell them for action, or pour themselves into the fluids, and repair their incessant decays; which cause cheerfulness to sparkle in the eye, and health to bloom in the cheek.

“Disastrous accidents, injurious to the peace of my mind, or fatal to the welfare of my body, beset my paths. But thy faithfulness and truth, like an impenetrable shield, guarded me all around. Under this divine protection, I walked secure amidst legions of apparent perils; and passed unhurt through a far greater multiplicity of unseen evils. Not one of my bones was broken; not a single shaft grazed upon my ease; even when the eye that watched over me, saw, in its wide survey, thousands falling beside me in irrecoverable ruin, and ten thousands deeply wounded on my right hand. If sickness has at any time saddened my chamber, or pain harrowed my flesh, it was a wholesome discipline, and a gracious severity. The chastisement proved a sovereign medicine to cure me of an immoderate fondness for this imperfect troublesome state, and to quicken my desires after the unembittered enjoyments of my eternal home. Has not thy munificence, unwearied and unbounded, spread my table, furnished it with the finest wheat, and replenished it with marrow and fatness: while temperance sweetened the bowl, appetite seasoned the dish, contentment and gratitude crowned the repast? Has not thy kindness, O God of the family of Israel, preserved my affectionate relations, who study by their tender offices to soften every care, and heighten every joy? Has not thy kindness given me valuable friends, whose presence is a cordial to cheer me in a dejected hour, and whose conversation mingles improvement with delight?

“When sin lay disguised amidst flowery scenes of pleasure; enlightened by thy wisdom, I discerned the latent mischief; made resolute by thy grace, I shunned the luscious bane. If, through the impulse of sensuality, or the violence of passion, I have been hurried into the snare, and stung by the serpent; thy faithful admonitions have recalled the foolish wanderer, while the blood of thy Son has healed his deadly wounds. Some, no doubt, have been cut off in the midst of their iniquities, and transmitted from the thrillings of polluted joy to the agonies of eternal despair; whereas I have been distinguished by long-suffering mercy; and, instead of lifting up my eyes in torments, to behold a heaven irrecoverably lost, I may lift them up under the pleasing views of being admitted, ere long, into those abodes of endless felicity. In the mean time, thou hast vouchsafed me the revelation of thy will, the influences of thy Spirit, and abundance of the most effectual aids, for advancing in knowledge, and growing in godliness; for becoming more conformable to thy image, and more meet for thy presence; for tasting the pleasures of religion, and securing the riches of eternity.

“How various is thy beneficence, O thou lover of souls! It has unsealed a thousand sources of good; opened a thousand avenues of delight; and heaped blessings upon me with a ceaseless liberality. If I should attempt to declare them, they would be more than the starry host which glitter in this unclouded sky; more than the dewy gems, which will adorn the face of the morning.

“And, shall I forget the God of my salvation, the author of all my mercies! Rather let my pulse forget to beat. Shall I render him no expressions of thankfulness? Then might all nature reproach my ingratitude. Shall I rest satisfied with the bare acknowledgment of my lips? No; let my life be vocal, and speak his praise, in that only genuine, that most emphatical language, the language of devout obedience. Let the bill be drawn upon my very heart; let all my affections acknowledge the draught, and let the whole tenor of my actions, in time and through eternity, be continually paying the debt, the ever-pleasing, ever-growing debt of duty, veneration, and love.

“And can I, O thou guide of my goings, and guardian of all my interests, can I distrust such signal, such experienced goodness? Thou hast been my helper through all the busy scenes of day; therefore under the shadow of thy wings will I repose myself, during the darkness, the danger, and death-like inactivity of the night. Whatever defilement I have contracted, wash it thoroughly away in redeeming blood; and let neither the sinful stain, nor the sinful inclination, accompany me to my couch. Then shall I lay me down in peace, and take my rest; cheerfully referring it to thy all-wise determination, whether I shall open my eyes in this world, or awake in the unknown regions of another.

CONTEMPLATIONS

THE STARRY HEAVENS.

THIS evening, I exchange the nice retreats of art, for the noble theatre of nature. Instead of measuring my steps, under the covert of an arbour, let me range along the summit of this gently rising hill. There is no need of the leafy shade, since the sun has quitted the horizon, and withdrawn his scorching beams. But see how advantages and inconveniences are usually linked, and chequer our affairs below! If the annoying heat ceases, the landscape and its pleasing scenes are also removed. The majestic castle and the lowly cottage are vanished together. I have lost the aspiring mountain, and its russet brow; I look round but to no purpose, for the humble vale, and its flowery lap. The plains whitened with flocks, and the heath yellow with furze, disappear. The advancing night has wrapt in darkness the long extended forest, and drawn her mantle over the windings of the silver stream. I no longer behold that luxuriant fertility in the fields, that wild magnificence of prospect, and endless variety of images, which have so often touched me with delight, and struck me with awe, from this commanding eminence.

The loss, however, is scarcely to be regretted; since it is amply compensated by the opening beauties of the sky. Here I enjoy a free view of the whole hemisphere, without any obstacle from below to confine the exploring eye, or any cloud from above, to overcast the spacious concave. It is true, the lively vermillion, which so lately streaked the chambers of the west, is all faded? But the planets, one after another, light up their lamps; the stars advance in the glittering train; a thousand and a thousand luminaries shine forth in successive splendours; and the whole firmament is kindling into the most beautiful glow. The blueness of the ether, heightened by the season of the year, and still more enlivened by the absence of the moon, gives those gems of heaven the strongest lustre.

One pleasure more the invading gloom has not been able to snatch from my sense. The night rather improves than destroys the fragrance which exales from the blooming beans. With these the sides of this sloping declivity are lined; and with these the balmy zephyrs perfume their wings. Does Arabia, from all her spicy groves, breathe a more liberal, or a more charming gale of sweets? And, what is a peculiar commendation of the rural entertainments presented in our happy land, they are alloyed by no apprehensions of danger. No poisonous serpent lurks under the blossom; nor any ravenous beast lies ready to start from the thicket. But I wander from a far more exalted subject. My thoughts, like my affections, are too easily diverted from the heavens, and detained by inferior objects. Away, my attention! from these little blandishments of the earth; since all the glories of the sky invite thy regard.

We have taken a turn among the tombs, and viewed the solemn memorials of the dead, in order to learn the vanity of mortal things, and to break their soft enchantment. We have surveyed the ornaments of the garden; not that the heart might be planted in the parterre, or take root among the flowery race; but that these delicacies of a day might teach us to aspire after a better paradise, where beauty never fades, and delight is ever in the bloom. A third time we lighted the candle of meditation; and sought for wisdom, not in the crowded city or wrangling schools, but in the silent and lonely walks of ancient Night.* Let us once more indulge the contemplative vein, and raise our speculations to those sublimer works of the great Creator which the regions of the sky contain, and the dusky hour unveils.*

If we have discerned the touches of his pencil glowing in the colours of spring, if we have seen a sample of his beneficence exhibited in the stores of nature, and a ray of his brightness beaming in the blaze of day; what an infinitely richer field for the display of his perfections are the heavens! The heavens, in the most emphatical manner, declare the glory of God. The heavens are nobly eloquent of the Deity, and the most magnificent heralds of their Maker's praise. They speak to the whole universe; for there is neither speech so barbarous, but their language is understood; nor nation so distant, but their voices are heard among them. (Psalm xix. 2.) Let me, then, in this solemn season, formed for thought, and a calm intercourse with heaven, let me listen to their silent lectures. Perhaps I may receive such impressive manifestations of "the eternal power and Godhead," as may shed religion on my soul while I walk the solitary shades, and may be a tutelary friend to my virtue, when the call of business and the return of light expose me again to the inroads of temptation.

The Israelites, instigated by frenzy rather than devotion, worshipped the host of heaven. And the pretenders to judicial astrology talk of I know not what mysterious efficacy in the different aspect of the stars, or the various conjunction and opposition of the planets. Let those who are unacquainted with the sure word of revelation, give ear to these sons of delusion, and dealers in deceit. For my part, it is a question of indifference to me, whether the constellations shone with smiles, or lowered in frowns, on the hour of my nativity. Let Christ be my guard; and, secure in such a protection, I would laugh at their impotent menaces. Let Christ be my guide; and I shall scorn to ask as well as despair of receiving, any predictive information from such senseless masses. What! shall "the living seek to the dead?" (Isaiah viii. 19.) Can these bodies advertise me of future events, which are unconscious of their own existence? Shall I have recourse to dull unintelligent matter, when I may apply to that all-wise being, who with one comprehensive glance distinctly views whatever is lodged in the bosom of immensity, or forming in the womb of futurity? Never, never will I search for any intimations of my fate, but often trace my Creator's footsteps* in yonder starry plains. In the former case, they would be teachers of lies; in the latter, they are oracles of truth. In this, therefore, this sense only, I profess myself the pupil of the stars.

The vulgar are apprehensive of nothing more than a multitude of bright spangles dropt over the ethereal blue. They have no higher notion of these fine appearances, than that they are so many golden studs with which the empyrean arch is decorated. But studious minds, that carry a more accurate and strict inquiry among the celestial bodies, bring back advices of a most astonishing import. Let me just recollect the most material of those stupendous discoveries, in order to furnish out proper subjects for contemplation. And let the unlearned remember, that the scene I am going to display, is the workmanship of that incomprehensible God, who is "perfect in knowledge and mighty in power;" whose name, whose nature, and all whose operations are "great and marvellous;" who summons into being with equal ease, a single grain, or ten thousand worlds. To this if we continually advert, the assertions, though they will certainly excite our admiration, need not transcend our belief.

The earth is, in fact, a round body, however it may seem in some parts to be sunk into vales, and raised into hills; † in other parts, to be spread into a spacious plain, extending to the confines of the heavens, or terminated by the waters of the ocean.

* "It is most becoming" (says a great author) "such imperfect creatures as we are, to contemplate the works of God with this design, that we may discern the manifestations of wisdom in them; and thereby excite in ourselves those devout affections, and that superlative respect, which is the very essence of praise, as it is a reasonable and moral service." Advertizing on the Attributes. And, indeed, if we are sincerely disposed to employ ourselves in this excellent, this delightful duty of praising the infinite Creator; the means and the motives are both at hand. His works, in a wonderful and instructive variety, present themselves with pregnant manifestations of the most transcendent excellencies of their Maker. They pour their evidence from all quarters, and into all the avenues of the mind. They invite us, especially in the magnificent system of the universe, to contemplate counsel consummately wise, and execution imitably perfect; power, to which nothing is impossible; and goodness, which extendeth to all, which endureth for ever. To give, not a full display, but only some slight strictures of these glorious truths, is the principal scope of the following remarks.

† A learned writer, I think Dr. Derham, has somewhere an observation to this purpose: That the loftiest summits of hills, and the most enormous ridges of mountains, are no real objections to the globular or round form of the earth. Because, however they may render it, to our limited sight, vastly uneven and protuberant, yet they bear no more proportion to the entire surface of the teraqueous ball, than a particle of dust, casually dropt on the mathematician's globe, bears to its whole circumference. Consequently, the rotund figure is no more destroyed in the former case than in the latter. On the same principle, I have not thought it necessary to take any notice of the comparatively small difference between the polar and equatorial diameter of the earth.

* Night opens the noblest scenes, and sheds an awe,
Which give those venerable scenes full weight,
And deep reception in th' entender'd heart.

Night Thoughts, No. 1X.

We may fancy that it has deep foundations, and rests upon some prodigiously solid basis: But it is pendent in the wide transpicuous ether, without any visible cause to uphold it from above, or support it from beneath. It may seem to be sedentary in its attitude, and motionless in its situation: But it is continually sailing* through the depths of the sky; and in the space of twelve months finishes the mighty voyage. Which periodical rotation produces the seasons and completes the year. As it proceeds in the annual circuit, it spins upon its own centre, and turns its sides alternately to the fountain of light. By which means the day dawns in one hemisphere, while the night succeeds in the other. Without this expedient, one part of its regions would, during half the great revolution, be scorched with excessive heat, or languish under an unintermitted glare; while the other, exposed to the contrary extremes, would be frozen to ice, and buried under a long oppression of dismal and destructive darkness.

I cannot forbear taking notice, that in this compound motion of the earth, the one never interferes with the other, but both are perfectly compatible. Is it not thus with the precepts of religion, and the needful affairs of the present life; not excepting even the innocent gratifications of our appetites? Some, I believe, are apt to imagine, that they must renounce society, if they devote themselves to Christ; and abandon all the satisfactions of this world, if they once become zealous candidates for the felicity of another. But this is a very mistaken notion, or else a very injurious representation of the doctrine which is according to godliness. It was never intended to drive men into deserts, but to lead them, through the peaceful and pleasant paths of wisdom, into the blissful regions of life eternal. It was never intended to strike off the wheels of business, or cut in sunder the sinews of industry; but rather to make men industrious, from a principle of conscience, not from the instigations of avarice; that so they may promote their immortal happiness even while they provide for their temporal maintenance. It has no design to extirpate our passions, but only to restrain their irregularities; neither would it extinguish the delights of sense, but prevent them from evaporating into vanity, and subsiding into gall. A person may be cheerful among his friends, and yet joyful in God. He may taste the sweets of his earthly estate, and, at the same time cherish his hopes of a nobler inheritance in heaven. The trader may prosecute the demands of commerce, without neglecting to negotiate the affairs of his salvation. The warrior may wear his sword, may draw in a just cause that murderous weapon, yet be a good soldier of Jesus Christ, and obtain the crown that fadeth not away. The parent may lay up a competent portion for his children, and not forfeit his title to the treasures either of grace or of glory. So far is Christianity from obstructing any valuable interest, or withholding any real pleasure, that it improves the one, and advances the other: Just as the diurnal and annual motions are so far from clashing, that they entirely accord; and instead of being destructive of each other, by mutually blending their effects, they give proportion and harmony to time, fertility and innumerable benefits to nature.

To us who dwell on its surface, the earth is by far the most extensive orb that our eyes can any where behold. It is also clothed with verdure, distinguished by trees, and adorned with a variety of beautiful decorations. Whereas, to a spectator placed on one of the planets, it wears an uniform aspect; looks all luminous, and no larger than a spot. To beings who dwell at still greater distances, it entirely disappears. That which we call, alternately, the morning and the evening star, (as in one part of her orbit she rides foremost in the procession of night, in the other ushers in and anticipates the dawn,) is a planetary world; which, with the four others, that so wonderfully vary their mystic dance, are in themselves dark bodies, and shine only by reflection; have fields, and seas, and skies of their own; are furnished with all accommodations for animal subsistence, and are supposed to be the abodes of intellectual life. All which, together with this our earthly habitation, are dependant on that grand dispenser of divine munificence—the sun! receive their light from the distribution of his rays, and derive their comforts from his benign agency.

The sun, which seems to perform its daily stages through the sky, is in this respect,* fixed and immoveable. It is the great axle of heaven, about which the globe we inhabit, and other more spacious orbs, wheel their staid courses. The sun, though seemingly smaller than the dial it illuminates, is abundantly larger† than this whole earth, on which so many lofty mountains rise, and such vast oceans roll.

* I say, in this respect, that I may not seem to forget or exclude the revolution of the sun round its own axis.

† 100,000 times, according to the lowest reckoning. Sir Isaac Newton computes the sun to be 900,000 times bigger than the earth.—Religious Philosopher, p. 740

* With what amazing speed this vessel, (if I may carry on the allusion,) filled with a multitude of nations, and freighted with all their possessions, makes her way through the ethereal space.

A line, extending from side to side, through the centre of that resplendent orb, would measure more than eight hundred thousand miles : a girdle, formed to go round its circumference, would require a length of millions : were its solid contents to be estimated, the account would overwhelm our understanding, and be almost beyond the power of language to express.* Are we startled at these reports of philosophy? Are we ready to cry out in a transport of surprise, How mighty is the being, who kindled such a prodigious fire, and keeps alive, from age to age, such an enormous mass of flame? Let us attend to our philosophic guides, and we shall be brought acquainted with speculations more enlarged and more amazing.

The sun, with all its attendant planets, is but a very little part of the grand machine of the universe. Every star, though in appearance no bigger than the diamond that glitters upon a lady's ring, is really a vast globe, like the sun in size, and in glory; no less spacious, no less luminous, than the radiant source of our day. So that every star is not barely a world, but the centre of a magnificent system : has a retinue of worlds, irradiated by its beams, and revolving round its attractive influence; all which are lost to our sight in unmeasurable wilds of ether. That the stars appear like so many diminutive, and scarce distinguishable points, is owing to their immense, and inconceivable distance. Immense and inconceivable indeed it is; since a ball, shot from a loaded cannon, and flying with unabated rapidity, must travel, at this impetuous rate, almost seven hundred thousand years,† before it could reach the nearest of those twinkling luminaries.

Can any thing be more wonderful than these observations? Yes; there are truths far more stupendous; there are scenes far more extensive. As there is no end of the almighty Maker's greatness, so no imagination can set limits to his creating hand. Could you soar beyond the moon, and pass through all the planetary choir; could you wing your way to the highest apparent star, and take your stand on one of the loftiest pinnacles of heaven—you would there see other skies expanded; another sun distributing his inexhaustible beams by day; other stars that gild the horrors of the alternate night; and other,‡ perhaps nobler,

* Dr. Derham, after having calculated the dimensions of the planets, adds, "Amazing as these masses are, they are all far outdone by that stupendous globe of light, the sun; which, as it is the fountain of light and heat to all the planets about it, so doth it far surpass them all in its bulk: its apparent diameter being computed at 822,148 English miles, its ambit at 2,582,373 miles, and its solid contents at, 290,971,000,000,000,000." Astro-Theology, Book I. ch. ii.

† See Religious Philosopher, p. 818.

‡ See Astro-Theology, Book II. chap. ii. where the author, having assigned various reasons to support systems established—established in unknown profusion, through the boundless dimensions of space. Nor does the dominion of the universal Sovereign terminate there. Even at the end of this vast tour, you would find yourself advanced no farther than the suburbs of creation, arrived only at the frontiers of the great Jehovah's kingdom.*

And do they tell me that the sun, the moon, and all the planets, are but a little part of his works? How great, then, are his signs! and how mighty are his wonders. (Dan. iv. 3.) And if so, what is the Creator himself? How far exalted above all praise! who is so high, that he looks down on the highest of these dazzling spheres, and sees, even the summit of creation, in a vale! so great, that this prodigious extent of space is but a point in his presence; and all this confluence of worlds, as the lightest atom, that fluctuates in air, and sports in the meridian ray.†

Thou most sublime and incomprehensibly glorious God, how I am overwhelmed with awe! how sunk into the lowest prostration of mind! when I consider thy "excellent greatness," and my own utter insignificance? And have I, excessively mean as I am, have I entertained any conceited apprehensions of myself; have I felt the least elatement of thought, in the presence this theory of our modern astronomers, adds, "Besides the fore-mentioned strong probabilities, we have this farther recommendation of such an account of the universe, that it is far more magnificent, and worthy of the infinite Creator, than any other of the narrower schemes."

* Job, after a most beautiful dissertation on the mighty works of God, as they are distributed through universal nature, from the heights of heaven to the very depths of hell, closes the magnificent account with this acknowledgment; Lo! these are parts of his ways. Or, as the original word more literally signifies, and may, I think, be more elegantly rendered, These are only the skirts, the very uttermost borders of his works. No more than a small preface to the immense volume of the creation. From the Hebrew (extremities;) I cannot forbear thinking on the extreme and very attenuated fibres of the root, when compared with the whole substance of the trunk; or on the exquisitely small size of the capillary vessels, when compared with the whole structure of the body. Job xxxvi. 14.

† This puts me in mind of a very fine remark on a scriptural beauty and a solid correction of the common translation, made by that learned, sagacious, and devout expositor Vitrinus. Isa. xl. 15. We find it written of the Supreme Being, that he taketh up the isles as a very little thing. Which, our critic observes, is neither answerable to the import of the original, nor consonant to the structure of the discourse. The prophet had no intention to inform mankind what the Almighty could do with regard to the islands, if he pleased to exert uncontrollable power. His design was to show how insignificant, or rather what mere nothing they are, in his esteem, and before his Majesty. The islands, says he, though so spacious as to afford room for the erection of kingdoms, and the abode of nations; though so strong as to withstand, for many thousands of years, the raging and reiterated assaults of the whole watery world, are yet, before the adored Jehovah, small as the minutest grain which the eye can scarce discern, light as the feathered mote which the least breath hurries away like a tempest. Insule sunt ut leve quid, quod avelat. The deep-rooted islands are as the volatile atom, which by the gentlest undulations of the air, is wafted to and fro in perpetual agitation.

of so majestic and adorable a being? How should this wound me with sorrow, and cover me with confusion! O my God, was I possessed of all the high perfections, which accomplish and adorn the angels of light; amidst all these noble endowments I would fall down in the deepest abasement at thy feet. Lost in the infinitely superior blaze of thy uncreated glories, I would confess myself to be nothing, to be less than nothing and vanity. How much more ought I to maintain the most unfeigned humiliation before thy divine majesty, who am not only dust and ashes, but a compound of ignorance, imperfection, and depravity!

While, beholding this vast expanse, I learn my own extreme meanness, I would also discover the abject littleness of all terrestrial things. What is the earth with all her ostentatious scenes, compared with this astonishing grand furniture of the skies? What, but a dim speck hardly perceivable in the map of the universe? It is observed by a very judicious writer,* that if the sun himself, which enlightens this part of the creation, was extinguished, and all the host of planetary worlds which move about him, were annihilated; they would not be missed by an eye that can take in the whole compass of nature, any more than a grain of sand upon the sea-shore. The bulk of which they consist, and the space which they occupy, is so exceedingly little in comparison of the whole, that their loss would scarce leave a blank in the immensity of God's works. If then, not our globe only, but this whole system, be so very diminutive, what is a kingdom or a country? what are a few lordships, or the so much admired patrimonies of those who are styled wealthy? When I measure them with my own little pittance, they swell into proud and bloated dimensions. But when I take the universe for my standard, how scanty is their size, how contemptible their figure! They shrink into pompous nothings.

When the keen-eyed eagle soars above all the feathered race, and leaves their very sight below: when she wings her way with direct ascent up the steep of heaven, and, steadily gazing on the meridian sun, accounts its beaming splendours all her own: does she then regard with any solicitude, the mote that is flying in the air, or the dust which she shook from her feet? And shall this eternal mind, which is capable of contemplating its Creator's glory, which is intended to enjoy the visions of his countenance; shall this eternal mind, endued with such great capacities, and made for such exalted ends, be so ignobly ambitious as to sigh for the tinsel of state; or so poorly covetous as to grasp after ample territories on a needle's point? No; under the influence of such considerations, I feel my sentiments expand, and my wishes acquire a tone of sublimity. My throbbing desires after worldly grandeur die away; and I find myself, if not possessed of power, yet superior to its charms. Too long, must I own, have my affections been pinioned by vanity, and immured in this earthly clod. But these thoughts break the shackles;* these objects open the door of liberty. My soul, fired by such noble prospects, weighs anchor from this little nook, and coasts no longer about its contracted shores; dotes no longer on its painted shells. The immensity of things is her range, and an infinity of bliss is her aim.

Behold this immense expanse, and admire the condescension of thy God. In this manner, an inspired and princely astronomer improved his survey of the nocturnal heavens. "When I consider thy heavens, even the work of thy fingers, the moon and the stars, which thou hast ordained: I am smitten with wonder at thy glory, and cry out in a transport of gratitude, Lord, what is man, that thou art mindful of him! or the son of man, that thou visitest him!" (Psalm viii. 3, 4.) How amazing, how charming, is that divine benignity, which is pleased to bow down its sacred regards to so foolish and worthless a creature! yea, disdains not, from the height of infinite exaltation, to extend its kind providential care to our most minute concerns! this is amazing. But that the everlasting Sovereign should give his Son to be made flesh, and become our Saviour! shall I call it a miracle of condescending goodness? Rather what are all miracles, what are all mysteries, to this ineffable gift!

Had the brightest archangel been commissioned to come down, with the olive branch of peace in his hand, signifying his eternal Maker's readiness to be reconciled; on our bended knees, with tears of joy, and a torrent of thankfulness, we ought to have received the transporting news. But when, instead of such an angelic envoy, he sends his only begotten Son, his Son beyond all thought illustrious, to make us the gracious overture—sends him from the "habitation of his holiness and glory," to put on the infirmities of mortality, and dwell in a tabernacle of clay; sends him, not barely to make us a transient visit, but to abide many years in our inferior and miserable world; sends him, not to exercise dominion over monarchs, but to wear out his life in the ignoble form of a servant; and at last, to make his exit under the infamous character of a malefactor! Was ever love like this? Did ever grace stoop so low? Should the sun be shorn of all his radiant hours, and degraded into a clod of the valleys; should all the dignities of heaven be deposed from their thrones, and degenerate into insects of a day; great, great would be the abasement: but nothing to thine, most blessed Jesus! nothing to thine, thou prince of peace! when for us men, and for our salvation, thou didst not abhor the coarse accommodations of the manger; thou didst not decline even the gloomy horrors of the grave.

It is well the sacred oracles have given this doctrine the most explicit confirmation, and evidence quite incontestible; otherwise a favour so undeserved, so unexpected, and rich beyond all imagination, might stagger our belief. Could He who launches all these planetary globes through the illimitable void, and leads them on, from age to age, in their extensive career: could he resign his hands to be confined by the girding cord, and his back to be ploughed by the bloody scourge! Could he who crowns all the stars with inextinguishable brightness, be himself defiled with spitting, and disfigured with the thorny scar! It is the greatest of wonders, and yet the surest of truths.

O! ye mighty orbs, that roll along the spaces of the sky; I wondered a little while ago at your vast dimensions and ample circuits; but now my amazement ceases, or rather is entirely swallowed up by a much more stupendous subject. Methinks your enormous bulk is shrivelled to an atom, your prodigious revolutions are contracted

* This reminds me of a very noble piece of sacred oratory, where, in a fine series of the most beautiful gradations, the apostle displays the admirably condescending kindness of our Saviour. He thought it no robbery, it was his indisputable right, to be equal with the infinite, self-existent, immortal God. Yet, in mercy to sinners, he emptied himself of the incommunicable honours, and laid aside the robes of incomprehensible glory. When he entered upon his mediatorial state, instead of acting in the grand capacity of universal Sovereign, he took upon him the form of a servant; and not the form of those ministering spirits, whose duty is dignity itself, who are throned, though adoring. He took not on him the nature of angels, but stooped incomparably lower; assumed a body of animal dust, and was made in the likeness of men, those inferior and depraved creatures. Astonishing condescension! but not sufficient for the overflowing richness of the Redeemer's love. For, being found in fashion as a man, he humbled himself farther still; occupied the lowest place, where all was low and ignoble. He not only submitted to the yoke of the law, but also bore the infirmities, and ministered to the necessities of mortals. He even washed the feet of others, and had not where to lay his own head. Yea, he carried his meritorious humiliation to the very deepest degrees of possible abasement. He became obedient unto death; and not to a common or natural death, but a death more infamous than the gibbet, more torturous than the rack, even the accursed death of the cross, Phil ii 6—8.

to a span, while I muse upon the far more elevated heights, and unfathomable depths, the infinitely more extended lengths, and unlimited breadths, of the love of God in Christ Jesus; (Eph. iii. 18, 19.)

Contemplating this stately expanse, I see a mirror which represents in the most awful colours the heinousness of human guilt. Ten thousand volumes wrote on purpose to display the aggravations of my various acts of disobedience, could not so effectually convince me of their inconceivable enormity, as the consideration of that all-glorious person, who, to make an atonement for them, spilt the last drop of his blood. I have sinned, may every child of Adam say; and what shall I do unto thee, O thou observer of men? * Shall I give my first-born for my transgression, the fruit of my body for the sin of my soul? vain commutation! and such as would be rejected by the blessed God with the utmost abhorrence. Will all the potentates that sway the sceptre in a thousand kingdoms, devote their royal and honoured lives to rescue an obnoxious creature from the stroke of vengeance? Alas! it must cost more, incomparably more, to expiate the malignity of sin, and save a guilty wretch from hell. Will all the principalities of heaven be content to assume my nature, and resign themselves to death for my pardon? † Even this would be too mean a satisfaction for inexorable justice; too scanty a reparation of

* Job vii. 21. Not preserver, as it stands in our version, but observer of men. Which phrase, as it denotes the exact and incessant inspection of the divine eye, as it intimates the absolute impossibility that any transgression should escape the divine notice, is evidently most proper, both to assign the reason, and heighten the emphasis of the context.

† Milton sets this thought in a very poetical and striking light.—All the sanctities of heaven stand round the throne of the supreme Majesty. God foresees and foretels the fall of man; the ruin which will unavoidably ensue on his transgression; and the utter impossibility of his being able to extricate himself from the abyss of misery.

He, with his whole posterity must die;
Die he, e'er justice must; unless for him
Some other able, and as willing, pay
The rigid satisfaction, death for death.

After which affecting representation, intending to raise the most tender emotions of pity, the following inquiry is addressed to all the surrounding angels.

Say, heav'nly powers, where shall we find such love?
Which of you will be mortal to redeem
Man's mortal crime? and die the dead to save?
He ask'd; but all the heav'nly choir stood mute,
And silence was in heav'n.

There is, to me at least, an inimitable spirit and beauty in the last circumstance. That such an innumerable multitude of generous and compassionate beings should be struck dumb with surprise and terror at the very mention of the deadly forfeiture and ransom set; no language is so eloquent as this silence. Words could not possibly have expressed, in so emphatical a manner, the dreadful nature of the task; the absolute inability of any or all creatures to execute it; the supremum and matchless love of the eternal Father in undertaking the tremendous work; not only without reluctance, but unsought, and unimplored, with readiness, alacrity and delight.

Par. Lost, Book III. line 209. Edit. Bent.

God's injured honour. So flagrant is human guilt, that nothing but a victim of infinite dignity could constitute an adequate propitiation. He who said, "Let there be light, and there was light;" let there be a firmament, and immediately the blue curtains floated in the sky; he must take flesh; he must feel the fierce torments of crucifixion; and pour out his soul in agonies if ever such transgressors are pardoned.

How vast is that debt, which all the wealth of both the Indies cannot discharge! How vitiated that habit of body, which all the drugs produced by nature herself cannot rectify! But how much more ruined was thy condition, O my soul! how much more heinous were thy crimes! since nothing less than the sufferings and death of Messiah, the Son of God, and radiant image of his glory, could effect thy recovery, or cancel thy iniquity. Though, perhaps, thou art not sunk so very deep in pollution as some of the most abandoned profligates, yet remember the inestimable ransom paid to redeem thee from everlasting destruction. Remember this, and "never open thy mouth any more," (Ezek. xvi. 63,) either to murmur at the divine chastisements, or to glory in thy own attainments. Remember this, and even "loathe thyself for the multitude of thy provocations," (Ezek. xxxvi. 31,) and thy great baseness.

Once more let me view this beautiful, this magnificent expanse, and conceive some juster apprehensions of the unknown richness of my Saviour's atonement. I am informed, by a writer who cannot mistake, that the High Priest of my profession, who was also the sacrifice for my sins, is higher than the heavens; (Heb. vii. 26,) more exalted in dignity, more bright with glory, than all the heavenly mansions, and all their illustrious inhabitants. If my heart was humbled at the consideration of its excessive guilt, how do all my drooping powers revive at this delightful thought! The poor criminal, that seemed to be tottering on the very brink of the infernal pit, is raised by such a belief, even to the portals of paradise. My self-abasement, I trust will always continue, but my fears, under the influence of such a conviction, are quite gone.* I do not, I cannot doubt the efficacy of this propitiation. While I see a glimpse of its matchless excellency, and

* I am sorry to find, that some of my readers were a little disgusted at this expression, "my fears are quite gone;" as thinking it discovered a tincture of arrogance in the writer, and tended to discourage the weak Christian. But I hope a more mature consideration will acquit me from both these charges. For, what has the author said? Only that at some peculiarly happy moments, when the Holy Ghost bears witness of Christ in his heart, and he is favoured with a glimpse of the Redeemer's matchless excellency—that in these brighter intervals of life, his trembling fears with regard to the decisive sentence verily believe myself interested in its merits, I know not what it is to feel any mis-giving suspicions, but am steadfast in faith, and joyful through hope.

Be my iniquities like debts of millions of talents, here is more than full payment for all that prodigious sum. Let the enemy of mankind, and accuser of the brethren, load me with invectives; this one plea, A Divine Redeemer died! most thoroughly quashes every indictment. For though there be much turpitude, and manifold transgressions, "there is no condemnation to those that are in Christ Jesus." Nay, were I chargeable with all the vilest deeds which have been committed in every age of the world, by every nation of men; even in this most deplorable case I need not sink into despair. Even such guilt, though grievous beyond all expression, is not to be compared with that abundance of grace and righteousness which dwell in the incarnate Divinity. How great, how transcendently glorious, are the perfections of the adored Jehovah! So great, so superlatively precious, is the expiation of the dying Jesus. It is impossible for the human mind to exalt this atonement too highly; * it is impossible for the humble penitent to confide in it too steadily. The scriptures of eternal truth have said it, (exult my soul, in the belief of it!) that the blood on which we rely, is God's own blood; (Acts xx. 28,) and therefore all-sufficient to expiate, omnipotent to save.

David, that egregious sinner, but more exemplary saint, seems to have been well acquainted with this comfortable truth. What else can be the import of that very remarkable, but most devout declaration! "Thou shalt purge me† with hyssop, and I shall be clean: thou shalt wash me, and I shall be whiter than snow." I have been of the great tribunal, are turned into pleasing expectations. And what is there in such a declaration offensive to the strictest modesty, or dispiriting to the weakest believer? Instead of creating discouragement, it points out the way to obtain a settled tranquillity. Its natural tendency is, to engage the serious mind in a more constant and attentive meditation on the unknown merits of the divine Mediator. And were we more thoroughly acquainted, more deeply affected, with his unutterable dignity, I am persuaded our uneasy apprehensions would proportionally vanish; our faith be established, our hopes brightened, and our joys enlarged.

* This doctrine, though rich with consolation to the ruined sinner, yet, is it not likely to open a door for licentiousness, and embolden transgressors to prosecute their vices? No; it is the most powerful motive to that genuine repentance which flows from an unfeigned love of God, and operates in a hearty detestation of all sin. One who knew the unmeasurable goodness of the Lord, and was no stranger to the sinful perverseness of our nature, says, "There is mercy with thee; therefore shalt thou be feared," Psalm cxxx. 4. Words full to my purpose; which at once add the highest authority to this sentiment, and direct our minds to its proper influence, and due improvement.

† Psalm li. 7. "Thou shalt purge." I prefer this translation before the new one; because this speaks guilty, I must confess, of the most complicated and shocking crimes; crimes, inflamed by every aggravating circumstance, with regard to myself, my neighbour, and my God. Myself, who have been blessed above men, and the distinguished favourite of Providence; my neighbour, who, in the most dear and tender interests, has been irreparably injured; my God, who might justly expect the most grateful returns of duty, instead of such enormous violations of his law. Yet, all horrid and execrable as my offence is, it is nothing to the superabundant merit of that great Redeemer who was promised from the foundations of the world; in whom all my fathers trusted; who is the hope of all the ends of the earth. Though my conscience be more loathsome, with adulterous impurity, than the dunghill; though treachery and murder have rendered it even black as the gloom of hell; yet, washed in the fountain open for sin and for uncleanness, (Zech. xiii. 1.) I shall be, I say not pure only, this were a disparagement to the efficacy of my Saviour's death; but I shall be fair as the lily, and white as the snow. Nay, let me not derogate from the glorious object of my confidence; cleansed by this sovereign sanctifying stream, I shall be fairer than the full-blown lily, whiter than the new-fallen snows."

Power, saith the Scripture, belongeth unto God; (Psalm lxii. 11.) And in what majestic lines is this attribute of Jehovah written throughout the whole volume of the creation! especially through those magnificent pages unfolded in yonder starry regions; which are therefore styled, by the sweet and seraphic singer of Israel, "The firmament of his power." (Psalm cl. 1.) because the grand exploits of Omnipotence are there displayed with the utmost pomp, and recorded in the most legible characters.

Who that looks upward to the midnight sky, and with an eye of reason beholds its rolling wonders, who can forbear inquiring of what were those mighty orbs formed? Amazing to relate: They were produced without materials! They sprung from emptiness itself. The stately fabric of universal nature emerged out of nothing. What instruments were used by the supreme Architect, to fashion the parts with such exquisite niceness, and give so beautiful a polish to the whole? How was all connected into one finely proportioned, and nobly finished structure? A bare fiat accomplished all! Let them be, saith God. He added no more; and immediately the marvellous edifice arose, adorned with every beauty, displaying innumerable perfections, and declaring, amidst enraptured seraphs, its great Creator's praise. "By the word of the Lord were the heavens made, and all the host of them by the breath of his mouth."* What foreeful machinery fixed some of those ponderous globes on an immoveable basis? What irresistible impulse bowled others through the circuit of the heavens? What coercive energy confined their impetuous courses within limits astonishingly large, yet most minutely true? Nothing but his sovereign will. For all things were at first constituted, and all to this day abide according to his ordinance.

Without any toilsome assiduity, or laborious process, to raise, to touch, to speak such a multitude of immense bodies into being; to launch them through the spaces of the sky, as an arrow from the hand of a giant; to impress on such unwieldy masses a motion far outstripping the swiftness of the winged creation;† and to continue them in the same rapid whirl for thousands and thousands of years; what an amazing instance of infinite might is this! Can any thing be impossible to the Lord, the Lord God, the Creator and Controller of all the ends of the earth, all the regions of the universe? Rather, is not all that we count difficult, perfect ease to that glorious Being, who only spake, and the world was made? (Psalm xxxiii. 9.) who only gave command, and the stupendous axle was lodged fast, the lofty wheels moved complete? What a sure defence, O my soul, is this everlasting strength of thy God! Be this thy continual refuge in the article of danger; this thy

* If this thought is admitted a second time, and suffered to enoble the next paragraph, it is partly because of its unequalled sublimity; partly, because it awakens the most grand idea of creating power; and partly, because the practice of the Psalmist, an authority too great to be controverted, is my precedent. The beautiful stanza quoted from Psalm xxxiii. 6, is a proof how thoroughly the royal poet entered into the majesty of the Mosaic narration. The repetition of the sentiment, verse 9, intimates how peculiarly he was charmed with that noble manner of describing the divine operations, while the turn of his own composition shows how perfectly he possessed the same elevated way of thinking: And this, long before Longinus wrote the celebrated treatise, which has taught the Heathen, as well as the Christian world, to admire the dignity of the Jewish legislator's style.—Vid. Longin. de Sublim. Sect ix.

† To give one instance of this remark: The earth, in the diurnal revolution which it performs on its own axis, whirls about at the rate of above a thousand miles an hour. And, as the great orbit, which it describes annually round the sun, is reckoned at 540 millions of miles, it must travel near a million and a half each day. What a force must be requisite to protrude so vast a globe, and wheel it on, loaded as it is with huge mountains and ponderous rocks, at such a prodigious degree of rapidity! It surpasses human conception. How natural, how pertinent, how almost necessary after such an observation, is the acknowledgment made by holy Job! "I know that thou canst do every thing, and that no thought, no imaginable scheme can be withholden from thee, can lie beyond thy power to execute." Chap. xlii. 2.

the language of a more steadfast belief, and gives the highest honour to the divine goodness. Were the words intended to bear no more than the common petitionary sense, and not to be expressive of a noble plerophory of faith, they would rather have been imperatives and not futures.

What cannot this uncontrollable power of the great Jehovah effect for his people? Be their miseries ever so galling, cannot this God relieve them? Be their wants ever so numerous, cannot this God supply them? Be their corruptions within ever so inveterate, or their temptations without ever so importunate, cannot this mighty, mighty God, subdue the former, and fortify them against the latter? Should trials, with an incessant vehemence, sift thee as wheat; should tribulation, with a weight of woes, almost grind thee to powder! should pleasure, with her bewitching smiles, solicit thee to delicious ruin; yet hold thou fast by God and lay thy help upon him that is omnipotent.* Thou canst not be involved in such calamitous circumstances, or exposed to such imminent peril, but thy God, whom thou servest is able to deliver thee from the one, and to support thee under the other. To support! to deliver!—Let me not dishonour the unlimited greatness of his power: He is able to exalt thee from the deepest distress to the most triumphant joy; and to make even a complication of evils work together for thy everlasting good. He is able, not only to accomplish what I have been speaking, but

* It is a most charming description, as well as a most comfortable promise, which we find in Isaiah xl. 29, 30, 31. He giveth power to the feeble; and to them that have no might at all, he not only imparteth, but increaseth strength; making it to abound, where it did not so much as exist. Without this aid of Jehovah, even the youths, amidst the very prime of their vigour and activity, shall become languid in their work, and weary in their course. And the young men, to whose resolution and abilities nothing seemed impracticable, shall not only not succeed, but utterly fail, and miscarry in their various enterprises. Whereas they that wait upon the Lord, and confide in his grace, shall press on with a generous ardour from one degree of religious improvement to another. Instead of exhausting, they shall renew their strength; difficulties shall animate, and toil invigorate them. They shall mount up, as with soaring wings, above all opposition; they shall be carried through every discouragement, as eagles cleave the yielding air: They shall run with speed and alacrity the way of God's commandments, and not be weary: They shall hold on (progredienter, carpentiter) with constancy and perseverance in those peaceful paths, and not faint; but arrive at the end of their progress, and receive the prize of their high calling.

To this most cheering doctrine, permit me to add its no less beautiful and delightful contrast. Eliphaz, speaking of the enemies of the righteous, says, Nihil excivum factio nobis adversaria. We should reckon our language acquitted itself tolerably well, if, when deprecating the abilities of an adversary, it should represent them weak as the scorched thread, feeble as the dissolving smoke. But these are cold forms of speech compared with the eloquence of the east. According to the genius of our Bible, all the power that opposes the godly, is a mere nothing; or, to speak with a more emphatical air of contempt, a destroyed, an extirpated nothing. Admire this expression, ye that are charmed with daring images, and (what Tully calls verbum audens) a spirited and glowing diction. Remember this declaration, ye that fight the good fight of faith. The united force of all your enemies, be it ever so formidable to the eye of flesh, is before your almighty Guardian, nihil nihilissimum, not only nothing, but less than nothing, and vanity. Job xxii.

to "do exceeding abundantly above all that we can ask or think.*"

O! the wretched condition of the wicked, who have this Lord of all power for their enemy! O! the desperate madness of the ungodly, who provoke the Almighty to jealousy! Besotted creatures! are you able to contend with your Maker, and enter the lists against incensed Omnipotence? Can you bear the fierceness of his wrath, or sustain the vengeance of his lifted arm? At his presence, though awfully serene, the hills melt like wax, and the "mountains skip like frightened lambs." At the least intimation of his displeasure, the foundations of nature rock, and the pillars of heaven tremble. How then can a withered leaf endure, when "his lips are full of indignation, and his tongue as a devouring fire?" Or, can any thing screen a guilty worm, when the great and terrible God shall whet his glittering sword, and his hand take hold on inexorable judgment? When that hand, which shoots the planets—masses of excessive bulk,† with such surprising rapidity, through the sky; that hand which darts the comets to such unmeasurable distances beyond the orbit of our remotest planet, beyond the pursuit of the strongest eye; when that hand is stretched out to punish, can the munition of rocks, the intervention of seas, or even interposing worlds divert the blow? Consider this, ambition, and bow thy haughty crest. Consider this, disobedience, and bend thy iron sinew! O! consider this, all ye that forget, or affront the tremendous Jehovah. He can, by a single act of his will, lay the universe in utter ruin; and can he want power to bring you, in a moment, in the twinkling of an eye, to the dust of death, or to the flames of hell? He has—I say not ten thousand lightnings to scorch you to ashes, ten thou-

* I should in this place avoid swelling the notes any farther, were it not to take notice of the imitable passage quoted above, and to be found Ephesians iii. 20. Which, if I do not greatly mistake, is the most complete representation of divine power that it is possible for words to frame. To do all that our tongue can ask, is a miracle of might: But we often think more than we can express, and are actuated with groanings unutterable. Yet, to answer these vast desires, is not beyond the accomplishment of our heavenly Father. Nay, to make his gifts and his blessings commensurate to the largest stretch of human expectations, is a small thing with the God of glory. He is able to do above all that the most enlarged apprehension can imagine; yea, to do abundantly more, exceeding abundantly more, than the mind itself, in the utmost exertion of all its faculties, is capable of wishing, or knows how to conceive.

sand thunders to crush you into atoms; but, what is unspeakably more dreadful, he has an army of terrors even in the look of his angry countenance. His very frown is worse than destruction.

I cannot dismiss this subject without admiring the patience of the blessed God; who, though so strong and powerful, yet is provoked every day. Surely, as is his majesty, so is his mercy—his pity altogether commensurate to his power. If I vilify but the name of an earthly monarch, I lose my liberty, and am confined to the dungeon. If I appear in arms, and draw the sword against my natural sovereign, my life is forfeited, and my very blood will scarce atone for the crime. But thee I have dishonoured, O thou king immortal and invisible! Against thee my breast has fomented secret disaffection; my behaviour has risen up in open rebellion; and yet I am spared, yet I am preserved. Instead of being banished from thy presence, I sit at thy table, and am fed from thy hand. Instead of pursuing me with thunderbolts of vengeance, thy favours surround me on every side. That arm, that injured arm, which might justly fall, with irretrievable ruin, on a traitor's head, is most graciously stretched out to caress him with the tenderest endearments, to cherish him with every instance of parental kindness! O, thou mightiest, thou best of Beings, how am I pained at my very soul, for such shameful and odious disingenuity! Let me always abominate myself, as the basest of creatures, but adore that unwearied long suffering of thine, which refuses to be irritated; love that unremitted goodness, which no acts of ingratitude could stop, or so much as check, in its gracious current. O! let this stubborn heart, which duty could not bind, which threatenings could not awe, be the captive, the willing captive, of such triumphant beneficence.

I have often been struck with wonder at that almighty skill, which weighed the mountains in scales, and the hills in a balance; which proportioned the waters in the hollow of its hand, and adjusted the dust of the earth by a measure.* But how much more marvellous is that magnificent economy, which poised the stars with inexpressible nicety, and meted out the heavens with a span! where all is prodigiously vast, immensely various, and yet more than mathematically exact. Surely the wisdom of God manifests itself in the skies, and shines in those lucid orbs; shines on the contemplative mind, with a lustre incomparably brighter than that which their united splendours transmit to the eye.

Behold yonder countless multitude of globes; consider their amazing magnitude; regard them as the sovereigns of so many systems, each accompanied with his planetary equipage. Upon this supposition, what a multiplicity of mighty spheres must be perpetually running their rounds in the upper regions! Yet none mistake their way, or wander from the goal, though they pass through trackless and unbounded fields. None fly off from their orbits into extravagant excursions; none press in upon their centre, with too near an approach: none interfere with each other in their perennial passage, or intercept the kindly communications of another's influence.* But all their rotations proceed in eternal harmony, keeping such time, and observing such laws, as are most exquisitely adapted to the perfection of the whole.

While I contemplate this excellent wisdom, which made the heavens, and attunes all their motions, how am I abashed at that mixture of arrogance and folly which has at any time inclined me to murmur at thy dispensations? O Lord, what is this, but a sort of implicit treason against thy supremacy, and a tacit denial of thy infinite understanding! Hast thou so regularly placed such a wonderful diversity of systems through the spaces of the universe? Didst thou, without any probationary essays, without any improving retouches, speak them into the most consummate perfection? Dost thou continually superintend all their circumstances, with a sagacity that never mistakes the minutest tittle of propriety? And shall I be so unaccountably stupid, as to question the justness of thy discernment in choosing my inheritance, and fixing the bounds of my habitation? Not a single erratum, in modelling the structure, determining the distance,† and conducting the ca-

* Isa. xl. 12. The dust of the earth, in this sublime scripture, signifies the dry land, or solid part of our globe; which is placed in contradistinction to the whole collection of fluid matter, mentioned in the preceding clause. Perhaps this remarkable expression may be intended to intimate, not only the extreme niceness which stated the dimensions of the world in general, or in the gross, but also that particular exactness with which the very smallest materials that constitute its frame, (not excepting each individual atom) were calculated and disposed;—g. d. It is a small thing to say, no such enormous redundancies, as unnecessary ridges of mountains, were suffered to subsist. There was not so much as the least grain of sand superfluous, or a single particle of dust deficient. As the grand aim of the description is to celebrate the consummate wisdom exemplified in the creation, and to display that perfect proportion with which every part tallies, coincides, and harmonizes with the whole, I have taken leave to alter the word of our English translation comprehend, and introduce in its stead a term equally faithful to the Hebrew, and more significative of the prophet's precise idea.

* The interception of light, by means of an eclipse happens very rarely, and then it is of so short a continuance as not to be of all inconvenient. Nay, it is attended with such circumstances as render it rather useful than prejudicial.

† The sun in particular, (and let this serve as a specimen of that most curious exactness with which the other celestial bodies are constituted, and all their circumstances regulated,) the sun is formed of such a determinate magnitude, and placed at such a convenient distance, "as not to annoy, but only re-reer of unnumbered worlds ! And shall my preevish humour presume to censure thy interposition with regard to the affairs of one inconsiderable creature ; whose stature, in such a comparative view, is less than a span, and his present duration little more than a moment ?

O ! thou God, "in whose hand my breath is, and whose are all my ways," let such sentiments as now possess my thoughts be always lively on my heart ! These shall compose my mind into a cheerful acquiescence and a thankful submission, even when afflictions gall the sense, or disappointments break my schemes. Then shall I, like the grateful patriarch, (Gen. xii. 7, 8,) in all the changes of my condition, and even in the depths of distress, erect an altar of adoring resignation, and inscribe it with the apostle's motto, "To God only wise." Then, shouldst thou give me leave to be the carver of my own fortunes, I would humbly desire to relinquish the grant, and recommit the disposal of myself to thy unerring beneficence ; fully persuaded, that thy counsels, though contrary to my forward inclinations, or even afflictive to my flesh, are incomparably more eligible, than the blind impulse of my own will, however soothing to animal nature.

On a careless inspection, you perceive no accuracy or uniformity in the position of the heavenly bodies. They appear like an illustrious chaos ; a promiscuous heap of shining globes ; neither ranked in order, nor moving by line. But what seems confusion, is all regularity. What carries a show of negligence, is really the result of the most masterly contrivance. You think, perhaps, they rove in their aerial flight ; but they rove by the nicest rule, and without the least error. Their circuits, though seemingly devious, their mazes, though intricate to our apprehensions,* are marked out, not indeed with golden compasses, but by the infinitely more exact determinations of the all-wise Spirit.

So, what wears the appearance of calamity in the allotments appointed for the godly, has really the nature of a blessing. It issues from fatherly love, and will terminate in the richest good. If Joseph is snatched from the embraces of an indulgent parent, and abandoned to slavery in a foreign land, it is in order to save the whole family from perishing by famine, and to preserve the seed in whom all the nations of fresh us, and nourish the ground with its kindly warmth. If it was larger, it would set the earth on fire ; if smaller, it would leave it frozen. the earth should be blessed. If he falls into the deepest disgrace, it is on purpose that he may rise to the highest honours. Even the confinement of the prison, by the unsearchable workings of Providence, opens his way to the right hand of the throne itself. Let the most afflicted servant of Jesus wait the final upshot of things : He will then discover the apparent expediency of all those tribulations which now, perhaps, he can hardly admit without reluctance, or suffer without some struggles of dissatisfaction. Then, the gushing tear and the heaving sigh will be turned into tides of gratitude and hymns of holy wonder.

In the mean time, let no audacious railer presumptuously impeach the divine procedure ; but, adoring where we cannot comprehend, let us expect the evolution of the mysterious plan. Then shall every eye perceive, that the seeming labyrinths of providence were the most direct and compendious way to effect his general purposes of grace, and to bring about each one's particular happiness.* Then also shall it be clearly shown, in the presence of applauding worlds, why virtue pined in want, while vice rioted in affluence ; why amiable innocence so often dragged the dungeon chain, while horrid guilt trailed the robe of state. That day of universal audit, that day of everlasting retribution, will not only vindicate but magnify the whole management of heaven. The august sessions shall close with this unanimous, this glorious acknowledgment : "Though clouds and darkness, impenetrable by any human scrutiny, were sometimes round about the supreme conductor of things, yet righteousness and judgment were the constant habitation of his seat, (Psalm cxvii. 2.) the invariable standard of all his administrations." Thus (if I may illustrate the grandest truths by inferior occurrences) while we view the arras on the side of least distinction, it is void of any elegant fancy ; without any nice strokes of art ; nothing but a confused jumble of incoherent threads. No sooner is the piece beheld in its proper aspect, but the suspected rudeness vanishes, and the most curious arrangement takes place. We are charmed with designs of the finest taste, and figures of the most graceful form. All is shaped with symmetry, all is clad in beauty.

The goodness of God is most eminently displayed in the skies. Could we take an understanding survey of whatever is formed by the divine Architect, throughout the whole extent of material things, our minds would be transported with their excellencies, and our tongues echo back that great encomium, they are good, very good, (Gen. i. 31.) Most beautiful* in themselves; contrived by unerring wisdom, and executed with inimitable skill. Most useful* in their functions; exactly fitting the places they fill, and completely answering the purposes for which they were intended. All the parts of the inanimate creation proclaim, both by their intrinsic and relative excellencies, the all-diffusive beneficence of their Maker.

How much more wonderful are the displays of divine indulgence in the worlds of life! Because dead matter is incapable of delight, therefore the gracious Creator has raised innumerable ranks of perceptive existence; such as are qualified to taste his bounty, and enjoy each a happiness suited to its peculiar state. With this view, he furnished the regions of inferior nature with an order and a series of sensitive beings. The waters teem with shoals of finny inhabitants: The dry land swarms with animals of every order: The dwellings of the firmament are occupied by multitudes of winged people. Not so much as a green leaf, philosophers say, but lodges and accommodates its puny animalcule tenants.† And therefore this diversity, this profusion of living creatures, flying the air, treading the ground, and gliding through the paths of the sea? For this most glorious reason: That the eternal Sovereign may exercise his superabundant goodness; that his table may be furnished with millions and millions of guests; that he may fill every hour, every

* This kalocœtia of the universe, and all its parts, has been very highly and very justly extolled by the ancient inquirers into nature; and was indeed an illustrious scene spread before the sages of the Heathen world, wherein to contemplate the goodness and the glories of the supreme Being. It was nobly said by a Pagan philosopher, on this occasion, "That God, when he undertook the work of creation, transfused himself into love." But he need not transform himself into this amiable principle; for "God is love;" as was much more nobly said by one whom that philosopher would have termed a barbarian. 1 John iv. 8.

† A very celebrated poet, in a beautiful paragraph on this subject, informs his readers, that all nature swarms with life. In subterranean cells, the earth heaves with vital motion. Even the hard stone, in the very inmost recesses of its impenetrable citadel, holds multitudes of animated inhabitants. The pulp of mellow fruit, and all the productions of the orchard, feed the invisible nations. Each liquid, whether of acid taste or milky relish, abounds with various forms of sensitive existence. Nor is the pure stream, or transparent air, without their colonies of unseen people. In which constitution of things we have a wonderful instance, not only of the divine goodness to those minute beings, in giving them a capacity for animal gratifications, but of his tender care for mankind, in making them imperceptible to our senses.

But what a small theatre are three or four elements for the operations of Jehovah's bounty! His magnificent liberality seems such scanty limits. If you ask, wherefore has he created all worlds, and replenished them with an unknown multiplicity of beings, rising one above another, in an endless gradation of still richer endowments, and still nobler capacities? The answer is, for the manifestation of his own glory, and especially for the communication of his inexhaustible beneficence.* The great Creator could propose no advantage to himself. His bliss is incapable of any addition. "Before the mountains were brought forth, or ever the earth and the world were made," he was supremely happy, in his own independent and all-sufficient self. His grand design, therefore, in erecting so many stately fabrics, and peopling them with so many tribes of inhabitants, was to transfuse his exuberant kindness, and impart felicity in all its forms. Ten thousand worlds, stocked with ten thousand times ten thousand ranks of sensitive and intelligent existence, are so many spacious gardens, which, with rivers of communicated joy, this overflowing fountain waters continually.

Boundless,† and (which raises our idea of this divine principle to the very highest degree of perfection) disinterested‡ munificence! How inexpressibly amiable is the blessed God, considered in this charming light! Is it possible to conceive any excellence so adorable and lovely, as infinite benevolence, guided by unerring wisdom, and exerting almighty power, on purpose to make a whole universe happy? O my soul, what an irresistible attractive is here! what a most worthy object for thy most fervent affection! shall now every glittering toy become a rival to this transcendently beneficent being, and rob him of thy heart? No, let his all-creating arm teach thee to trust in the fulness of his sufficiency; let his all-superintending eye incline thee to acquiesce in the dispensations of his providence: and let his bounty, so freely vouchsafed, so amply diffused, induce thee to love him, with all the ardour of a grateful and admiring soul; induce thee to serve him, not with a joyless awe, or slavish dread, but with unfeigned alacrity, and a delightful complacency.

* A sacred writer, considering this delightful subject, and confining his observation within the narrow limits of his own country, cries out with a mixture of amazement and gratitude: "How great is his goodness, and how great is his beauty!" Who then can forbear being lost in wonder, and transported with delight, when he extends his survey to those infinitely more copious communications of divine bounty, which, like salutary and refreshing streams, run through all worlds, and make not only the little valleys of a single kingdom, but the immensity of creation laugh and sing? Zech. ix. 17.

† In this sense, "There is none good but one, that is God." None universally and essentially good; none whose goodness extends itself, in an infinite variety of blessings, to every capable object; or who always dispenses his favours from the sole principle of free and disinterested benevolence.

If the goodness of God is so admirably seen in the works of nature and the favours of providence, with what a noble superiority does it even triumph in the mystery of redemption! * Redemption is the brightest mirror in which to contemplate this most lovely attribute of the Deity. Other gifts are only as mites from the divine treasury; but redemption opens, I had almost said exhausts, all the stores of indulgence and grace. Herein "God commendeth his love;" (Rom. v. 8;) not only manifests, but sets it off, as it were, with every bright and grand embellishment; manifests it in so stupendous a manner, that it is beyond parallel; beyond thought; "above all blessing and praise." Was He not thy Son, everlasting God, thy only Son, the Son of thy bosom from eternal ages, the highest object of thy complacental delight? Was not thy love to this adorable Son incomparably greater than the tenderest affection of any, or the united affections of all mortal parents? Was not the blessed Jesus more illustrious in excellency than all angels; more exalted in dignity than all heavens? Yet didst thou resign him for poor mortals, for vile sinners! Couldst thou see him descend from his royal throne, and take up his abode in the sordid stable? see him forego the homage of the seraphim, and stand exposed to the reproachful indignities of an insolent rabble! see him arraigned at the bar, and sentenced to death; numbered with malefactors, and nailed to the gibbet; bathed in his own innocent blood, and pouring out his soul in agonies of sorrow! Could the Father, the Father himself, with unknown philanthropy, † say, "It shall, it shall be so! My pity to rebellious man pleads, and prevails. Awake, therefore, O sword, (Zech. xiii. 7,) edged with divine wrath! awake, and be sheathed in that immaculate breast; pierce that dearly beloved heart. I am content that my Son endure the sharpness of death, rather than sinful mortals perish for ever." Incomprehensible love! May it henceforward be the favourite subject of my meditation, more delightful to my musing mind than applause to the ambitious ear! May it be the darling theme of my discourse; sweeter to my tongue than the droppings of the honey comb to my taste! May it be my choicest comfort through all the changes of life; and my reviving cordial even in the last extremities of dissolution itself!

* In this, and in other parts of the Contemplations, the reader will observe, that the attributes of the Deity are represented as shining with more distinguished lustre in the wonders of redemption than in the works of creation. If such remarks should seem to be unprecedented, or to stand in need of a vindication, permit me to subjoin the sentiments of a great critic, equally versed in both those sublime theories. "In a perfect orator," he says "Tully requires some skill in the nature of heavenly bodies; because his mind will become more extensive and unconfined; and when he descends to treat of human affairs, he will both think and write in a more exalted and magnificent manner. For the same reason, that excellent master would have recommended the study of those great and glorious mysteries, which revelation has discovered to us; to which the noblest parts of this system of the world are as much inferior, as the creature is less excellent than the Creator."

Spectator, vol. xiii. no. 633.

A prophet, contemplating with a distant survey this unexampled instance of Almighty love, is wrapt into a transport of devotion. At a loss for proper acknowledgments, he calls upon the whole universe to aid his labouring breast, and supply his lack of praise. Sing melodiously, ye vaulted heavens; exult, and even leap for gladness, thou cumbersome earth; ye mountains, break your long silence, and burst into peals of loudest acclamation;* for the Lord, by his precious gift, and this great salvation, hath comforted his people. A sacred historian hath left it upon record, that at the first exhibition of this ravishing scene, there was with the angel who brought the blessed tidings, a multitude of the heavenly host, praising God, and making the concave of the skies resound with their hallelujahs. At the dawn of the Sun of Righteousness, when he was beginning to rise with healing in his wings, the morning-stars sang together, and all the sons of God shouted for joy. And shall man, whom this gracious dispensation principally respects; shall man, who is the centre of all these gladdening rays; shall he have no heart to adore, no anthem to celebrate, this Love without end, and without measure, grace?

Milton.

How pure is the state of the sky, and how clear its aspect! Clearer than the limpid stream, purer than the transparent crystal, and more curiously fine than the polished mirror. That stately ceiling fretted with gold, and stretched to an extent of many millions of leagues, is not disfigured with a single flaw. That azure canopy,

* Isa. xlix. 13. I have not adhered to our common translation, but endeavoured to preserve, somewhat more faithfully, the noble pathos, and inimitable energy of the sacred original. The love of God manifested in a divine and dying Saviour, is a blessing of such inconceivable richness, as must render all acknowledgments flat and all encomiums languid. Yet I think the most poetical and most emphatical celebration of that unspeakable instance of goodness, is contained in this rapturous exclamation of the prophet; which intimates with a wonderful majesty of sentiment, that even the whole compass of the inanimate creation, could it be sensible of the benefit and capable of delight, would express its gratitude in all these demonstrations of the most lively and exuberant joy.

embroidered with stars, and spacious enough to form a covering for unnumbered worlds, is without the least spot or wrinkle. Yet this, even this, will scarce yield us so much as a faint representation of the divine purity. God is a God of matchless and transcendent excellency. His ways are uprightness itself. His counsels and words are the very sanctity of wisdom and of truth. The laws which he hath given to universal nature, are exquisitely contrived, and beyond all possibility of improvement. The precepts which he hath appointed for the human race, are a complete summary of all that is honourable in itself and perfective of the rational mind. Not the least oversight, in planning a series of events for all futurity. Not the least mal-administration, in managing the affairs of every age since time began, and of every nation under the whole heavens. Pardon these disparaging expressions: A negative perfection is far, far beneath thy dignity, O thou most highest.* In all these instances, in all thy acts, and all thy attributes, thou art not only holy, but "glorious in holiness."

So inconceivably holy is the Lord God of hosts, that he sees defilement even in the brightness of the firmament. The living sapphire of the heavens, before his majesty, loses its lustre. Yea, the stars, (though the most pure and resplendent part of the heavens) are not pure in his sight. How much less man, who in his fallen and depraved state, is but as a worm that crawls in the corrupted carcase; and the Son of Man, who, by reason of his manifold actual impurities, is too justly compared to an insect, that wallows amidst stench and putrefaction?† Is there not then abundant

* "O thou most highest." This expression occurs more than once in the psalms used by the established church. It is, I think, one of those beauties which, because often exhibited, generally escape our notice. It is a superlative formed on a superlative; and, though not strictly conformable to grammatrical rules, is nobly superior to them all. The language seems to be sensible of its own deficiency, when the incomprehensible Jehovah is addressed or celebrated. Oppressed as it were with the glories of the subject, it labours after a more emphatical manner of diction than the ordinary forms of speech afford. It is, if I rightly judge, one of those daring and happy peculiarities of a masterly genius, which Mr. Pope so finely describes, and while he describes, exemplifies:

Great wits sometimes may gloriously offend,
And rise to faults: true critics dare not mend;
From vulgar bounds with brave disorder part,
And snatch a grace beyond the reach of art.

Essay on Criticism.

St Paul's is a beautiful passage of the like nature: which our translators have very properly rendered, less than the least of all saints. His pollo million ketihsion, is another instance of the same kind. But here the English version fails. Far better, is extremely forced, compared with the nervous original. And I greatly question, whether it is possible to translate the sentence with equal conciseness, and with equal spirit. See Eph. iii. 9. Phil. i. 23.

† Job xxv. 5, 6. I submit to the judgment of the learned, whether this is not the true meaning of the text. It may not, perhaps, recommend itself to the cause for the most irreproachable and eminent of mankind to renounce all arrogant pretensions, to lay aside every assuming air, to take nothing but shame and confusion to themselves? A holy prophet, and a holy prince, felt such humbling impressions from a glimpse of the uncreated purity. I abhor myself in dust and ashes, (Job xlii. 6,) was the declaration of the one: I am a man of unclean lips, (Isaiah vi. 5,) the confession of the other. Should not this teach us all to adore the divine mercies, for that precious purifying fountain,* which was foretold from the foundation of the world, but was opened at that awful juncture, when knotty whips tore the flesh, when ragged thorns mangled the temples, when sharpened nails cut fresh sluices from the crimson current, when the gash of the spear completed the dreadful work, and forthwith flowed therefrom the wounded heart blood and water!

Especially since God himself saw no blemish in his dear Son. He looketh to the moon, and it shineth not; yet his all-penetrating and jealous eye discerned nothing amiss, nothing defective in our glorious Redeemer. Nothing amiss? He bore this most illustrious testimony concerning his holy child Jesus; "In him I am pleased; I am well pleased; I acquiesce, with entire complacency and with the highest delight, in his person, his undertaking, and the whole execution of his office." How should this thought enliven our hopes, while the other mortifies our pride? Should not our hearts spring within us, and even leap for joy, at the repeated assurance given us by revelation, that such a divinely excellent person is our Mediator? What apparent reason has every believer to adopt the blessed virgin's exclamation, "My soul doth magnify the Lord for his transcendent mercy; and my spirit rejoices, not in wide exsqueamishly nice critic; or to those persons who dream of, I know not what, dignity in our fallen nature. But it seems, in preference to every other interpretation, suitable to the sacred context; and is far from being injurious to the character of that apostate race, which is "altogether become abominable," and "is as an unclean thing." On this supposition there is not only an apparent, but a very striking contrast, between the purity of God and the pollution of man. The purity of the most high God, which outshines the moon and eclipses the stars; the pollution of degenerate man, which, exclusive of a Saviour, would render him as loathsome to the all-seeing eye, as the vilest vermin are in ours. Without assigning this sense to the passage, I cannot discern the force of the antithesis, nor indeed the propriety of the sentiment. Worms, in the general, give us an idea of meanness and infirmity, not of defilement and impurity, unless they are insects hatched amidst putrefaction, and considered in such noisome circumstances. The two words of the original are evidently used in this signification by Moses and Isaiah; by the former, to denote the vermin which devoured the putrefied manna; by the latter, to express the reptiles which swarm in the body that sees corruption. Exod. xvi. 20. Isa. xiv. 11.

tended harvests, waving over my fertile glebe;* not in armies vanquished, and leaving the peculiar treasure of nations for my spoil;* but in an infinitely richer, nobler blessing, even in God my Saviour: "That a person so sublime and perfect has vouchsafed to become my surety; to give himself for my ransom in the world below, and to act as my advocate in the royal presence above; yea, to make my recovery the reward of his sufferings; my final felicity the honour of his mediatorial kingdom!

When an innumerable multitude† of bodies, many of them more than a hundred thousand miles in diameter,‡ are all set in motion; when the orbits in which they perform their periodical revolutions, are extended at the rate of several hundreds of millions; when each has a distinct and separate sphere for finishing his vast circuit; when no one knows what it is to be cramped, but each most freely expatiates, in his unbounded career; when every one is placed at such an immense remove from each other, that they appear to their respective inhabitants, only as so many spots of light—how astonishing must be the expanse which yields room for all those mighty globes, and their widely-diffused operations! To what prodigious lengths did the almighty builder stretch his line, when he marked out the stupendous platform! I wonder at such an immeasurable extent. My very thoughts are lost in this abyss of space. But be it known to mortals, be it never forgot by sinners, that, in all its most surprising amplitude, it is small, it is scanty, compared with the bounty and the mercy of its Maker.

His bounty is absolutely without limits,§ and without end. The most lavish generosity cannot exhaust, or even diminish his munificence. O! all ye tribes of men; or rather, all ye classes of intelligent creatures,

* The inspired penman, from these two occasions of distinguished joys, sets forth the incomparably greater delight which arises from the gift of a Saviour, and the blessing of redemption; Isa. ix. ver. 3. compared with ver. 6.

† This refers, not only to the planets which pass and repass about our sun, but also to the other planetary worlds, which are supposed to attend the several fixed stars.

‡ The diameter of Jupiter is calculated at 130,650 miles, while its orbit is reckoned to consist of 895,134,000. Which computation, according to the maxims of astronomy, and the laws of proportion, may, as is taken for granted in the Contemplations, be applied to other planets revolving round other suns.

§ By bounty, I mean not the actual exercises, or the sensible effects, of this excellency in the Deity. These are, and always must be, through the immense perfection of the attribute, and the necessary scantiness of the recipient, bounded. But I would be understood as speaking of the divine power, and the divine will, to exert divine beneficence. These can have no real, no imaginable limits. These, after a profusion of blessings, distributed to unnumbered worlds, continued through unnumbered ages, must still have more to bestow, for ever have more to bestow, infinitely more to bestow, than it is possible for creation itself to receive.

ye are not straitened in the liberality of your ever-blessed Creator; be not straitened in your own expectations. "Open your mouth wide, and he shall fill it" with copious and continual draughts from the cup of joy. Your God, on whom is your whole dependence, is more than able, is more than willing, to "supply all your need, according to his riches in glory." When the Lord Jehovah is the giver, and his grace* the gift; let your wishes be unbounded, and your cravings insatiable. All that created beings can possibly covet, is but a very small pittance of that unknown happiness which the everlasting Benefactor is ready to bestow. Suppose every charitable disposition which warms the hearts of the human race, added to those more enlarged affections which glow in heavenly bosoms; what were they all, even in their highest exercise, compared with the benignity of the divine nature? Bless me, then, thou eternal source of love; bless all that reverence thy holy name, according to thy own most profuse goodness, whose great prerogative it is to disdain all measure. O! bless us, in proportion to that grace, the richness of which (unutterable by the tongues of men and of angels) was once spoken in the groans, and written in the wounds, of thy expiring Son!

Spacious indeed are these heavens! where do they begin? where do they end? what is their extent? Can angels answer my question? have angels travelled the vast circuit? can angels measure the bounds of space? No; it is boundless, it is unknown, it is amazing all. How charming, then, to reflect, that the mercy of God is "greater than the heavens; is more extensive than the dimensions of the sky." Transporting reflection! Let me indulge thee once more.† Let me think over the delightful displays of this lovely attribute; and, while I admire the trophies of forgiving goodness, add one to the number. With what amiable and affecting colours is this represented in the

* 2 Cor. ix. 8. "God is able to make all grace abound towards you, that ye, having all sufficiency in all things, may abound to every good work." How beautiful and emphatical is this description; inferior to nothing but that extent of ability, and those riches of liberality which it so eloquently celebrates. Does it not exhaust all the powers of language, while it attempts to give us a specimen of the munificence of the Lord?

† Once more refers to Reflections on a Flower Garden. Some of the following pages exhibit a digressive view of the divine mercy. I thought it proper to apprise my reader of this excursion; though I hope it will be needless to offer any apology for enlarging upon a theme incomparably joyous. Who can complain of tediousness, while I speak consolation to the distressed, and recovery to ruined creatures? The divine mercy is the sole fountain of all our present and future blessings. In conformity to this benign attribute, human hopes arise, and human felicity flows. Who, therefore, can be weary of viewing and reviewing, when the lengths and breadths of forgiving grace are the ravishing prospect?

parable of the prodigal! What could induce that foolish youth to forsake his father's house? Had he not been tenderly cherished by the good parent, and loaded with benefits from his indulgent hand? Were not the restraints of parental government an easy yoke; or rather a preservative from ruin? Notwithstanding every endearing obligation, he revolts from his duty; and launches into such scandalous irregularities, as were dishonourable to his family, and destructive to himself. When necessity, not choice, but sharp necessity drove him to a submissive return, does the injured father stand aloof or shut his doors? Quite the reverse. He espies him, while he is yet a great way off; and the moment he beholds the profligate youth, he has compassion on him. His bowels yearn, they "sound like a harp," touched with notes divinely soft. He never once thinks of his ungracious departure, and infamous debaucheries. Pity, parental pity, passes an act of oblivion; and in one instant, cancels a series of long-continued provocations. So strong are the workings of fatherly affection, that he is almost impatient to embrace the naked and destitute wretch. The son's pace is slow, he arose and came; the father's is swift, he sprung forth (aged as he was) and ran. And is there a single frown in his brow, an upbraiding word on his tongue? Instead of loathing the sordid creature, or reproaching him for his odious excesses, he falls on his neck, clasps him in his arms, and hugs him to his bosom. Instead of disowning the riotous spendthrift, or rejecting him for his un dutiful behaviour, he receives and welcomes him with kisses of delight. He rejoices at his return from extravagance and vice, as he formerly rejoiced on the day of his nativity. When this companion of harlots opens his mouth—before he speaks, the father hears. He interrupts him in the midst of his intended speech. The overflows of his compassionate heart can brook no delay. He seems to be uneasy himself, till he has made the afflicted penitent glad with the assurance of his acceptance, and the choicest of his favours. While the poor abashed offender seeks nothing more than not to be abhorred, he is thoroughly reconciled, and honoured before the whole family. While he requests no other indulgence than only to be treated as the meanest servant, he is clothed with the best robe; he is feasted with the fatted calf; he is caressed as the dearest of children. Was there ever so bright and winning a picture of the tenderest mercy, most freely vouchsafed, even to the most unworthy of creatures? Yet thus, my soul, and thus, my fellow-sinner, will the Lord God of everlasting compassions receive us, if, sensible of our misery, and thirsting for salvation, we turn to him through Jesus Christ.

Where sin has abounded, says the proclamation from the court of heaven, grace doth much more abound. Manasseh was a monster of barbarity; for he caused his own children to pass through the fire, and filled Jerusalem with innocent blood. Manasseh was an adept in iniquity; for he not only multiplied, and to an extravagant degree, his sacrilegious impieties, but he poisoned the principles and perverted the manners of his subjects, making them to do worse than the most detestable of the heathen idolaters. (2 Chron. xxxiii.) Yet, through this superabundant grace, he is humbled, he is reformed, and becomes a child of forgiving love, an heir of immortal glory. Behold that bitter and bloody persecutor Saul, when, breathing out threatenings,* and bent upon slaughter, he worried the lambs, and put to death the disciples of Jesus. Who, upon the principles of human judgment, would not have pronounced him a vessel of wrath, destined to unavoidable damnation? nay, would not have been ready to conclude, that, if there were heavier chains, and a deeper dungeon, in the world of woe, they must surely be reserved for such an implacable enemy of true godliness? Yet (admire, and adore the inexhaustible treasures of grace!) this Saul is admitted into the godly fellowship of the prophets; is numbered with the noble army of martyrs; and makes a distinguished figure among the glorious company of the apostles. The Corinthians were flagitious even to a proverb. Some of them wallowed in such abominable vices, and habituated themselves to such outrageous acts of injustice, as were a reproach to human nature. Yet even these sons of violence, and slaves of sensuality "were washed, were sanctified, were justified, (1 Cor. vi. 9, 10, 11): washed in the precious blood of a dying Redeemer; sanctified by the powerful operations of the blessed Spirit; justifi-

* Acts ix. 1. "Saul yet breathing out threatening and slaughter."—What a representation is here of a mind mad with rage, and abandoned to the fiercest extremes of barbarity! I scarce know whether I am more shocked at the persecutor's savage disposition, or charmed with the evangelist's lively description. The adverb yet seems referable to chap. viii. ver. 3, and has, in this connexion, a peculiar force. The havoc he had committed, the inoffensive families he had already ruined were not sufficient to assuage his vengeful spirit. They were only a taste; which, instead of glutting the blood-hound, made him more closely pursue the track, and more eagerly pant for destruction. He is still athirst for violence and murder. So eager and insatiable is his thirst that he even breathes out threatening and slaughter. His words are spears and arrows, and his tongue a sharp sword. It is as natural for him to menace the Christians, as to breathe the air. Nay, they bleed every hour, every moment, in the purposes of his rancorous heart. It is only owing to want of power, that every syllable he utters, every breath he draws, does not deal about deaths, and cause some of the innocent disciples to fall.

fied through the infinitely tender mercies of a gracious God. Those who were once the burden of the earth, are now the joy of heaven, and the delight of angels.

There is another instance of Scripture, which most loudly publishes that sweetest of the divine names! "The Lord, the Lord God, merciful and gracious, long-suffering, and abundant in goodness and truth; keeping mercy for thousands, forgiving iniquity, transgression and sin," (Exod. xxiv. 6, 7,) an instance this, which exceeds all the former; which exceeds whatever can be imagined; which, if I was to forget, the very stones might cry out, and sound it in my ears: I mean the case of those sinners who murdered the Prince of peace and Lord of glory. These men could scarce have the shadow of an excuse for their crime, hardly a circumstance to extenuate their guilt. They were well acquainted with his exemplary conversation; they had often heard his heavenly doctrines; they were almost daily spectators of his unequalled miracles. They therefore had all possible reason to honour him as the most illustrious of beings, and to receive his gospel as the most inestimable of blessings. Yet, notwithstanding all these engaging motives to love him, even above their own lives, they seize his person, asperse his character, drag him before a heathen tribunal, and extort a sentence of death against innocence and holiness itself. Never was the vilest slave so contumeliously abused; nor the most execrable malefactor so barbarously executed. The sun was confounded at the shocking scene; and one cannot but wonder how the avenging lightnings could withhold their flashes. The earth trembled at the horrid deed; and why, why did it not cleave asunder, and open a passage for such blood-thirsty miscreants into the nethermost hell? Shall these ever hope to obtain forgiveness from the righteous Judge? Shall not these be consigned over to inexorable wrath, and the severest torments? O the miraculous effects of divine grace! O the triumphant goodness of God our Saviour! Many, even of these impious wretches, at the descent of the Holy Ghost, were convinced of their miserable state; were wounded with penitential remorse, fled to the sanctuary of the cross, had their pardon ratified by the baptismal seal, and, continuing in the apostles' doctrine, were made partakers of the kingdom of heaven; where they now shine as so many everlasting monuments of most distinguished mercy, and receive beatitude past utterance from that very Redeemer whom once "with wicked hands they crucified and slew."

Well might the prophet cry out, with a pleasing amazement, "Who is a God like unto thee, that pardoneth iniquity, and passeth by transgression!" (Micah vii. 18.) Let all flesh know assuredly, let all flesh rejoice greatly, that with the Lord there is such mercy, and with his Christ such plentiful redemption. And O! for the voice of an archangel, to circulate the glad tidings through the universe, that the American savage, as well as the European sage, may learn the exceeding riches of grace in Christ, through whose infinitely great propitiation, all manner of sin, barbarity, and blasphemy, are freely forgiven unto men.

What a grand and majestic dome is the sky! Where are the pillars which support the stately concave? What art, most exactly true, balanced the pressure? What props of insuperable strength sustain the weight? How is that immeasurable arch upheld, unshaken and unimpaired, while so many generations of busy mortals have sunk and disappeared as bubbles upon the stream? If those stars are of such an amazing bulk, how are they also fastened in their lofty situation? By what miracle in mechanics are so many thousands of ponderous orbs kept from falling upon our heads; kept from dashing both the world to pieces and its inhabitants to death? Are they hung in golden or adamantine chains? Rest they their enormous load on rocks of marble or columns of brass? No; they are pendulous in fluid ether; yet are more immovably fixed, than if the everlasting mountains lent their forests for an axle tree, or their ridges for a basis. The almighty Architect stretches out the north, and its whole starry train, over the empty place. He hangs the earth and all the ethereal globes upon nothing. (Job xxvii. 7.) Yet are their foundations laid so sure, that they can never be moved at any time.

No unfit representation to the sincere Christian, of his final perseverance: * such

* With regard to the final perseverance of the true believer, I am sensible this point is not a little controverted. The sentiments which follow are my steadfast belief. It is by no means proper, in a work of this nature, to enter upon a discussion of the subject. Neither have I room so much as to hint what might be urged for its support. Let my reader observe, that I am far from delivering it as essential to Christianity, or necessary to salvation. Millions of the very contrary conviction are, I doubt not, high in the favour of God, and in a growing meetness for his heavenly kingdom. As I blame none for rejecting, none, I hope, will be offended with me for espousing this particular doctrine. To be of different opinions, at least in some inferior instances, seems an unavoidable consequence of our present state, where ignorance in part cleaves to the wisest minds, and prejudice easily begets the most impartial judgments. This may turn to our common advantage, and afford room for the display and exercise of those healing virtues, moderation, meekness, and forbearance. Let me only be permitted to ask, whether this tenet does not evidently tend to establish the comfort of the Christian, and to magnify the fidelity of God our Saviour? Whether, far from countenancing sloth, or encouraging remissness, to know that our labour should not be in vain, is not the most prevailing inducement to abound in the work of the Lord? 1 Cor. xv. 58.

as points out the cause which effects it, and constitutes the pledge which ascertains it. His nature is all enfeebled. He is not able of himself to think a good thought. He has no visible safeguard, nor any sufficiency of his own. And yet whole legions of formidable enemies are in a confederacy to compass his ruin. The world lays unnumbered snares for his feet; the devil is incessantly urging the siege, by a multitude of fiery darts, or wily temptations: the flesh, like a perfidious inmate, under colour of friendship, and a specious pretence of pleasure, is always forward to betray his integrity. But amidst all these threatening circumstances of personal weakness and imminent danger, an invisible aid is his defence: "I will uphold thee," says the blessed God, "with the right hand of my righteousness." (Isa. xli. 10.) Comfortable truth! The arm which fixes the stars in their order, and guides the planets in their course, is stretched out to preserve the heirs of salvation. "My sheep," adds the great Redeemer, "are mine, and they shall never perish; neither shall any pluck them out of my hand." (John x. 28.) What words are these! and did they come from him who hath all power in heaven and on earth? and were they spoken to the weakest of the flock; to every unfeigned follower of the great Shepherd? Then, Omnipotence itself must be vanquished before they can be destroyed, either by the seductions of fraud, or the assaults of violence.

If you ask, therefore, what security we have of enduring to the end, and continuing faithful unto death? the very same that establishes the heavens, and settles the ordinances of the universe. Can these be thrown into confusion? (Jer. xxxi. 35, 36,) then

Is any one inclined to examine the reasons which made the author a proselyte to this persuasion? He may find them displayed in the memorial, delivered by several select and eminent divines of the church of England, at the renowned synod of Dort. (See Acta Synod. Dordrech. par. 2, page 236 of the Latin edition, published in a single quarto volume.) Those who have no opportunity of consulting the memoirs of that venerable assembly, I would refer to the works of the indefatigable and very learned Turretin, or to those of the candid and elegant Witsius. Turretin. tom. ii. q. xvi. Wits. Oecon. lib. iii. cap. xlii.

The latest and fullest view of the point, which I ever remember to have met within any of our English writers, is in the Lime-street Lectures; which are a defence of several most important doctrines of the gospel, and contained in two octavo volumes, the united labours of nine modern divines, most of whom are well known to the world by their other evangelical and useful writings. In those lectures, the final perseverance of the saints is very particularly stated; and, to my apprehension at least, most satisfactorily proved; the arguments usually urged against it are impartially considered; and I cannot but think (with all due deference to the judgment of others) unanswerably confuted.

And here (not to swell this note any farther,) I shall only just hint, that the judicious Hooker, (an authority, perhaps, as weighty and unexceptionable as any that can well be produced) gives a solemn attestation of this tenet, in a short discourse on the perpetuity of faith, subjoined to his Ecclesiastical Polity. Fol edit.

may the true believer draw back unto perdition. Can the sun be dislodged from his sphere, and rush lawlessly through the sky? Then, and then only, can the faith of God's elect be finally overthrown. (Titus i. 2.) Be of good courage, then, my soul, rely on those divine succours which are so solemnly stipulated, so faithfully promised. Though thy grace be languid as the glimmering spark, though the overflowings of corruption threaten it with total extinction, yet, since the great Jehovah has undertaken to cherish the dim principle, "many waters cannot quench it, nor all floods drown it." Nay, though it were feeble as the smoking flax,* goodness and faithfulness stand engaged to augment the heat, to raise the fire, and feed the flame, till it beam forth, a lamp of immortal glory in the heavens.

As to the faithfulness of a covenanting God, this may be emblematically seen in the stability of the heavenly bodies, and the perpetuity of their motion: (Psalm cxix. 89, 90.) Those that are fixed or stationary, continue unalterable in their grand elevations: no injurious shocks, no violence of conflicting elements, are able to displace those everlasting hinges on which dependant worlds revolve: through the whole flight of time, they recede not so much as a hair's breadth from the precise central point of their respective systems; while the erratic, or planetary, perform their prodigious stages without any intermission, or the least embarrassment. How soon, and how easily is the most finished piece of human machinery disconcerted! But all the celestial movements are so nicely adjusted, all their operations so critically proportioned, and their mutual dependencies so strongly connected, that they prolong their beneficial courses throughout all ages. While mighty cities are overwhelmed with ruin, and their very names lost in oblivion; while vast empires are swept from their foundations, and leave not so much as a shadowy trace of their ancient magnificence ; while all terrestrial things are subject to vicissitude and fluctuating in uncertainty ;—these are permanent in their duration ; these are invariable in their functions : Not one fail-eth. Who doubts the constant succession of day and night, or the regular returns of summer and winter ? And why, O ! why shall we doubt the veracity of God, or distrust the accomplishment of his holy word ? Can the ordinances of heaven depart ? Then only can God forget to be gracious, or neglect the performance of his promise. Nay, our Lord gives us yet firmer grounds of affiance, he affords us a surer bottom for our faith, than the fundamental laws of the universe. Heaven and earth, he says, shall pass away, but my words shall not in a single instance, or in one tittle of their import, pass away, No : his sacred word, whatever may obstruct it, whoever may oppose it, shall be fulfilled to the very uttermost.

* The tenderness and faithfulness of God to his people, are finely pictured by the prophet Isaiah, chap. xlii. ver. 3. Which passage, because of its rich consolation, and uncommon beauty, is deservedly adopted by St. Matthew, and ingrafted into the system of evangelical truths. He will not himself break, nor suffer to be broken by any other, the bruised reed, nor quench the smoking flax. Was it possible to have chosen two more delicate and expressive representations? Could any image be more significant of a very intrin and enfeebled faith, than the flexible reed that bows before every wind; which, besides its natural weakness, is made abundantly weaker by being bruised, and so is ready to fall in pieces of itself! Or could any thing, with a more pathetic exactness describe the extreme incibility of that other principle of the divine life, love! The state of the flax just beginning to burn is liable to be put out by the least blast; more liable still is the wick of the lamp, when it is not so much as kindled into a glimmering flame, but only breathing smoke, and uncertain whether it shall take fire or not. Yet true faith and heavenly love, though subsisting amidst such pitiable infirmities, will not be abandoned by their great Author, shall not be extinguished by any temptations, but be maintained, invigorated, and made finally triumphant. Matt. xii. 20.

O powerful word ! How astonishing is its efficacy ! When this word was issued forth, a thousand worlds emerged out of nothing. Should the mighty orders be repeated, a thousand more would spring into existence. By this word, the vast system of created things is upheld in constant and immutable perfection. Should it give command, or cease to exert its energy, the universal frame would be dissolved, and all nature revert to her original chaos. And this very word is pledged for the safety, the comfort, the happiness of the godly. This inviolable, this almighty word speaks in all the promises of the gospel. How strangely infatuated are our souls, that we should value it so little ! What infidels are we in fact, that we should depend upon it no more ! Did it create whatever has a being, and shall it not work faith in our breasts ? Do unnumbered worlds owe their support to this word ; and shall it not be sufficient to buoy up our souls in troubles, or establish them in trials ? Is it the life of the universe, and shall it be a dead letter to mankind ?

If I wish to be heard when I implore heavenly blessings, is not this privilege most clearly made over to my enjoyment in that well-known text, " Ask, and it shall be given you." (Matt. vii. 7.) If I long for the eternal Comforter to dwell in my heart, and sanctify my nature, have I not an apparent title to this high prerogative conferred in that sweet assertive interrogation, " How much more shall your heavenly Father give the Holy Spirit to those that ask him ?" (Luke xi. 13.) If I earnestly covet the inestimable treasures that are comprised in the great Immanuel's mediation, can I have a firmer claim to the noble portion than is granted in that most precious scripture.

" Him that cometh to me, I will in no wise cast out." (John vi. 37.) What assurance of being interested in these unspeakable mercies would I desire ? What form of conveyance, what deed of settlement, were it left to my own option, should I choose ? Here is the word of a king, the king immortal and invisible ; all whose declarations are truth itself.* If a monarch bestow immunities on a body of men, and confirm them by an authentic charter, no one controverts, no one questions their right to the royal favours. And why should we suspect the validity of those glorious grants which are made by the everlasting Sovereign of nature ; which he has also ratified by an oath, and sealed with the blood of his Son ? Corporations may be disfranchised, and charters revoked ; even mountains may be removed, and stars drop from their spheres ; but a tenure founded on the divine promise is unalienably secure, is lasting as eternity itself.

We have endeavoured to spell a syllable of the eternal name in the ancient manuscript of the sky. We have caught a glimpse of the Almighty's glory from the lustre of innumerable stars. But would we behold all his excellencies pourtrayed in full perfection, and drawn to the very life ; let us attentively consider the Redeemer. I observe there are some parts of the firmament in which the stars seem as-it were to cluster. They are sown thicker, they lie closer than usual, and strike the eye with redoubled splendour. Like the jewels on a crown, they mingle their beams, and reflect an increase of brilliancy on each other. Is there not such an assemblage, such a constellation of the divine honours, most amiably effulgent in the blessed Jesus ?

Does not infinite wisdom † shine, with surpassing brightness, in Christ ? To the making of a world there was no obstacle ; but to the saving of man, there seemed to be insurmountable bars. If the rebel is suffered to escape, where is the inflexible justice which denounces death as the wages of sin ? If the offender is thoroughly pardoned, where is the inviolable veracity which has solemnly declared, " The soul that sinneth shall die ?" These awful attributes are set in terrible array, and, like an impenetrable battalion, oppose the salvation of apostate mankind. Who can suggest a method to absolve the traitorous race, yet vindicate the honours of almighty sovereignty ? This is an intricacy which the most exalted of finite intelligencies are unable to clear. But behold the unsearchable secret revealed !

* ——— If these fail,
The pillared firmament is rottenness,
And earth's base built on stubble.—

revealed in the wonderful redemption accomplished by a dying Saviour! so plainly revealed, that, "he who runs may read," and even babes understand what minds of the deepest penetration could not contrive. The Son of God, taking our nature, obeys the law, and undergoes death in our stead. By this means, the threatened curse is executed in all its rigour, and free grace is exercised in all its riches. Justice maintains her rights, and with a steady hand administers impartial vengeance; while mercy dispenses her pardons, and welcomes the repentant criminal with the tenderest embraces. Hereby the seemingly thwarting attributes are reconciled; the sinner is saved not only in full consistence with the honour of the supreme perfections, but to the most illustrious manifestation of them all.

Where does the divine power* so signally exert itself as in the cross of Christ, and in the conquests of grace? Our Lord, in his lowest state of humiliation, gained a more glorious victory than when, through the dividing sea, and the waste howling wilderness, "he rode upon his chariots and horses of salvation." When his hands were riveted with irons to the bloody tree, he disarmed death of its sting, and plucked the prey from the jaws of hell. Then, even then, while he was crucified in weakness, he vanquished the strong man, and subdued our most formidable enemies. Even then he spoiled principalities, triumphed over the powers of darkness, and led captivity captive. Now he is exalted to his heavenly throne, with what a prevailing efficacy does his grace go forth "conquering and to conquer!" By this the slaves of sin are rescued from their bondage, and restored to the liberty of righteousness. By this depraved wretches, whose appetites were sensual, and their dispositions devilish, are not only renewed, but renewed after the image of God, and made partakers of a divine nature. Millions, millions of lost creatures are snatched, by the interposition of grace, like brands from the burning; and, translated into everlasting mansions, shine brighter than the stars, shine bright as the sun in the kingdom of their Father.

Would you, then, see an incomparably more bright display of the divine excellence than the spotted firmament, the spangles of heaven, or the golden fountain of day exhibit? Contemplate Jesus of Nazareth! He is the brightness of his father's glory, and the express image of his person. In his immaculate nature, in his heavenly temper, in his most holy life, the moral perfections of the Deity are represented to the highest advantage.* Hark! how mercy with her charming voice speaks in all he utters. See how benevolence pours her choicest stores, in all he does. Did ever compassion be so amiably soft, as in those pitying tears which swelled his eyes, and trickled down his cheeks, to bedew the rancour of his inveterate enemies? Was it possible for patience to assume a form so lovely, as that sweetly-winning conduct, which bore the contradiction of sinners? which treated the obstinate to be reconciled; besought the guilty not to die? In other things, we may find some scattered rays of Jehovah's glory; but in Christ they are all collected and united, in Christ they beam forth with the strongest radiance, with the most delightful effulgence. Out of Zion, and in Sion's great Redeemer, hath God appeared in perfect beauty.

Search then, my soul, above all other pursuits, search the records of redeeming love. Let these be the principal objects of thy study. Here employ thyself with the most unwaried assiduity: In these are hid all the treasures of wisdom and knowledge; † Such wisdom as charms and astonishes the very angels, engages their closest attention, and fills them with the deepest adoration; ‡ such knowledge, as qualifies the possessor, if not for offices of dignity on earth, yet for the most honourable advancements in the kingdom of heaven. Disunited from which knowledge, all application is but elaborate impertinence; and all science no better than pompous ignorance. These records contain the faultless model of duty, and the noblest motives to obedience. Nothing so

† Col. ii. 3. Not a mean degree, but a treasure; not one treasure, but many: not many only, but all treasures of true wisdom and saving knowledge, are in Christ and his glorious gospel. The transcendent excellency of those treasures seems to be finely intimated in that expression, hid; which may be interpreted by the Hebrew, Job iii. 21, laid up with the utmost care, and the greatest safety: Not left, at all adventures, to be stumbled upon by every giddy wanderer, or to fall into the arms of the yawning slyard, but, like jewels of the brightest lustre, or riches of the highest value, kept in store to adorn and reward the diligent searcher.

‡ This, I believe, is the import of the apostle's language, though it is not a literal translation of 1 Pet. i. 12. I never had such a lively apprehension of the beautiful significance of the last word, as when I have attended a dissection of some part of the animal body. In order to discern the minutiae of the admirable frame, the latent wonders of art and mechanism, the eye is so sharpened, and its application so intensely bended, as gives a very just experimental comment on that expressive phrase. With such earnest attention is the everlasting gospel contemplated by the angelic orders. How much more, if it were possible, does it deserve the devout and incessant consideration of human minds! Since by them, it is not only to be speculated as a bright and ravishing display of the divine attributes, but to be applied to their fallen nature as a most benign scheme of recovering grace; as the sure and only method of obtaining life and immortality.

* Christ, the wisdom of God, and the power of God. 1 Cor. i. 24. To the intent that now, unto the principalities and powers in heavenly places, might be known by the church, (by the amazing contrivance and accomplishment of its redemption, the deep,) extensive, and greatly diversified wisdom of God. Eph. iii. 10.

powerful to work a lively faith and a joyful hope, as an attentive consideration of our Lord's unutterable merits. Nothing so sovereign to antidote the pestilential influence of the world, and deliver our affections from a slavery to ignoble objects, as an habitual remembrance of his extreme agonies. The genuine, the ever-fruitful source of all morality, is the unfeigned love of Christ; and the cross,* the cross is the appointed altar, from which we may fetch a coal† to kindle this sacred fire.

Behold, therefore, the man! the matchless and stupendous man! whose practice was a pattern of the most exalted virtue, and his person the mirror of every divine perfection. Examine the memoirs of his heavenly temper and exemplary conversation. Contemplate that choir of graces which were associated in his mind, and shed the highest lustre on all his actions. Familiarize to thy thoughts his instructive discourses, and enter into the very spirit of his refined doctrines; that the graces may be transfused into thy breast, and the doctrines transcribed in thy life. Follow him to Calvary's horrid eminence! to Calvary's fatal catastrophe! where innocence, dignity, and merit, were made perfect through sufferings; each shining, with all possible splendour, through the tragical scene; somewhat like his own radiant bow, then glowing with the greatest beauty when appearing in the darkest cloud. Be thy most constant attention fixed on that lovely and sorrowful spectacle. Behold the spotless victim nailed to the tree, and stabbed to the heart. Hear him pouring out prayers for his murderers, before he poured out his soul for transgressors. See the wounds that stream with forgiveness, and bleed balm for a dis-tempered world. O! see the justice of the Almighty and his goodness; his mercy and his vengeance; every tremendous and gracious attribute manifested—manifested with inexpressible glory in that most ignominious, yet grandest of transactions.

Since God is so inconceivably great as these his marvellous works declare;

Since the great Sov'reign sends ten thousand worlds,
'To tell us, he resides above them all,
In glory's unapproachable recess;‡

* "And I," says our Lord, "if I be lifted up from the earth, and extended on the cross, will draw all men unto me;" will give such a rich and transcendent display of my love, as shall constitute the most powerful and prevailing attractive of theirs. John xii. 32.

† Alluding to Isaiah vi. 6.
‡ For this quotation, and several valuable hints, I acknowledge myself indebted to those beautiful and sublime poems, entitled Night Thoughts; of which I shall only say, that I receive fresh pleasure and richer improvement from every renewed perusal. And I think I shall have reason to bless the indulgent Bestower of all wisdom, for these instructive and animating compositions, even in my last moments; than which nothing can more emphatically speak their superior excellence, nor give a more solid satisfaction to their worthy Author. Happy should I how can we forbear hastening, with Moses, bowing ourselves to the earth, and worshipping! O! what an honourable, as well as advantageous employ, is prayer!—Advantageous: By prayer, we cultivate that improving correspondence with Jehovah, we carry on that gladdening intercourse with his spirit, which must begin here, in order to be completed in eternity.—Honourable: By prayer, we have access to that mighty Potentate, whose sceptre sways universal nature, and whose rich regalia fills the skies with lustre. Prayer places us in his presence-chamber; while the blood of sprinkling procures us a gracious audience.

Shall I then blush to be found prostrate before the throne of grace? Shall I be ashamed to have it known that I offer up social supplications in the family, or am conscientious in observing my private retirements? Rather let me glory in this unspeakable privilege. Let me reckon it the noblest posture, to fall low on my knees before his footstool; and the highest honour, to enjoy communion with his most exalted Majesty: Incomparably more noble, than to sit in person on the triumphal chariot, or to stand in effigy amidst the temple of worthies.

Most inestimable, in such a view, is that promise, which so often occurs in the prophetic writings, and is the crowning benefit of the new covenant, I will be thy God, (Heb. viii. 10.) Will this supremely excellent and almighty Being vouchsafe to be my portion? to settle upon a poor sinner, not the heritage of a country, not the possession of the whole earth, but his own ever-blessed self? May I, then, through his free condescending grace, and the unknown merits of his Son, look upon all these infinitely noble attributes as my treasure? May I regard the wisdom which superintends such a multitude of worlds, as my guide? the power which produced and preserves them in existence, as my guard? the goodness which, by an endless communication of favours, renders them all so many habitations of happiness, as my exceeding great reward? What a fund of felicity is included in such a blessing! How often does the Israelitish prince exult in the assurance, that this unutterable and boundless good is his own! Interested in this, he bids defiance to every evil that can be dreaded, and rests in certain expectation of every blessing that can be desired. "The Lord is my light and my salvation; whom then shall I fear? The Lord," with an air of exultation he repeats both his affianced and his challenge, "is the strength of my life; of whom then shall I be afraid?" (Psalm xxvii. 1.) Nothing so effectual as this appropriating faith, to inspire a dignity of mind superior to transitory trials; or to create a calmness of temper unalarmed by vulgar fears, unappalled by death itself. "The Lord is my Shepherd," says the same truly gallant and heroic personage; "therefore shall I lack nothing." (Psalm xxiii. 1.) How is it possible he should suffer want, who has the all-sufficient fulness for his supply? So long as unerring wisdom is capable of contriving the means, so long as uncontrollable power is able to execute them, such a one cannot fail of being safe and happy, whether he continue amidst the vicissitudes of time, or depart into the unchangeable eternity.

Here let us stand a moment, and humbly contemplate this great God, together with ourselves, in a relative view. If we reflect on the works of material nature, their number incomprehensible, and their extent unmeasurable; each of them apart so admirably framed, the connexions of the whole so exquisitely regulated, and all derived from one and the same glorious agent: if we recollect the far more noble accomplishments of elegant taste and discerning judgment, of refined affections and exalted sentiments, which are to be found among the several orders of intelligent existence; and all of them flowing, in rich emanations, from the one sole fountain of intellectual light: if we farther consider this Author of material beauty and moral excellency, as a Guardian, a Governor, and Benefactor to all his creatures; supporting the whole system, and protecting each individual by an ever-watchful providence, presiding over the minutest affairs, and causing all events to terminate in the most extensive good; heaping, with unremitting liberality, his benefits upon every capable object, and making the circuit of the universe a seminary of happiness: is it possible for the human heart, under such captivating views, to be indifferent towards this most benign, most bountiful original of being and of bliss? Can any be so immersed in stupidity, as to say unto the Almighty—in the language of an irreligious temper and licentious life, to say "Depart from us, we implore not thy favour, nor desire the knowledge of thy ways?" Wonder, O heavens! be amazed, O earth! and let the inhabitants of both express their astonishment at this unparalleled complication of disingenuous, ungrateful, destructive perverseness!

If we consider our fallen and imperfect state—frail in our bodies; enfeebled in our minds; in every part of our constitution, and in all the occurrences of life, "like a tottering wall, or a broken hedge:" If we survey our indigent and infirm state—without holiness, without spiritual strength, our possession of present conveniences entirely dependent on God's sovereign pleasure; yea, forfeited, justly forfeited, with every future hope, by a thousand aggravated iniquities: If we add the various disasters of our condition—agitated as we are by tumultuous passions; oppressed with dispiriting fears; held in suspense by a variety of perplexing* cares; liable to pains, and exposed to troubles; troubles from every quarter, troubles of every kind: Can we, amidst so many wants, under such deplorable infirmities, and subject to such disastrous accidents; can we be unconcerned whether God's omnipotent, irresistible, all-conducting hand be against us, or for us? Imagination itself shudders at the thought! Can we rest satisfied, without a well-grounded persuasion, that we are reconciled to this supreme Lord, and the objects of his unchangeable goodness? If there be an abandoned wretch, whose apprehensions are so fatally blinded, who is so utterly lost to all sense of his duty and of his interest; let me bewail his misery, while I abhor his impiety—bewail his misery, though popularity, with her choicest laurels, adorn his brow; though affluence, with her richest delicacies, load his table; though half a nation, or half a world, conspire to call him happy.

May I, by a believing application, solace myself in this everlasting source of love, perfection and joy! Grant me this request, and I ask no more. Only that I may expect, not with a reluctant anxiety, but with a ready cheerfulness, the arrival of that important hour, when this veil of flesh shall drop, and the shadows of mortality flee away; when I shall no longer complain of obscure knowledge, languid affections, and imperfect fruition; but shall see the uncreated and immortal majesty—see him, not in this distant and unaffected method, of reasoning from his works, but with the most clear and direct intuition of the mind: when I shall love him, not with a cold and contracted spirit, but with the most lively and enlarged emotions of gratitude: when I shall incessantly enjoy the light of his countenance, and be united, inseparably united, to his all-glorious Godhead. Take, ye ambitious, unenvied and unopposed, take to yourselves the toys of state. May I be enabled to rejoice in this blessed hope, and to triumph in that amiable, that adorable, that delightful name, the Lord my God! And I shall scarce bestow a thought on the splendid pageantry of the world, unless it be to despise its empty pomp, and to pity its deluded admirers.

* Perplexing—Those who read the original language of the New Testament, are sufficiently apprised, that such is the significance of that benevolent dissuasive, urged by our Lord, Matth. vi. 25. I beg leave, for the sake of the unlearned reader, to observe, that our translation, though for the most part faithful and excellent, has here misrepresented our divine Master's meaning. Take no thought for your food, for your raiment, for your bodily welfare, is not only not the true sense, but the very reverse of this scriptural doctrine. We are required to take a prudent and moderate thought for the necessities of life. The sluggard, who neglects this decent precaution, is severely reprimanded; is sent to one of the meanest animals, to blush for his folly, and learn discretion from her conduct, Prov. vi. 6. Our Saviour's precept, and the exact sense of his expression, is, Take no anxious thought; indulge no perplexing care; no such care as may argue an unreasonable distrust of Providence, or may tend and tear your minds with distressing, with pernicious solicitude.

All these bodies, though immense in their size, and almost infinite in their multitude, are obedient to the divine command. The God of wisdom "tellecth their numbers," and is intimately acquainted with their various properties. The God of power "callecth them all by their names," and assigns them whatsoever office he pleases. He marshalls all the starry legions, with infinitely greater ease and nicer order, than the most expert general arranges his disciplined troops. He appoints their posts, he marks their route, he fixes the time for their return: The posts which he appoints, they occupy without fail; in the route, which he settles, they persevere without the least deviation; and to the instant,* which he fixes for their return, they are precisely punctual. He has given them a law which, through a long revolution of ages, shall not be broken, unless his sovereign will interposes for its repeal. Then, indeed, the motion of the celestial orbs is controlled; their action remains suspended; or their influence receives a new direction.—The sun, at his creation, issued forth with a command to travel perpetually through the heavens; since which he has never neglected to perform the great circuit, "rejoicing as a giant to run his race." But, when it is requisite to accomplish the purposes of divine love, the orders are countermanded; the flaming courier remits his career, stands still in Gibeon; † and, for the conveniency of the chosen people, holds back the falling day. The moon was dispatched with a charge, never to intermit her revolving course till day and night come to an end: But, when the children of Providence are to be favoured with an uncommon continuance of light, she halts in her march, makes a solemn pause in the valley of Ajalon,* and delays to bring on her attendant train of shadows. When the enemies of the Lord are to be discomfited, the stars are levied into the service; the stars are armed, and take the field; the stars, in their courses, fought against Sisera. ‡

So dutiful is material nature! so obsequious in all her forms to her Creator's pleasure! The bellowing thunders listen to his voice; and the vollied lightnings observe the direction of his eye. The flying storm and impetuous whirlwind wear his yoke. The raging waves reverence his nod; they shake the earth, they dash the skies, yet never offer to pass the limits which he has prescribed. Even the planetary spheres, though vastly larger than this wide extended earth, are in his hand as clay in the hands of the potter. Though swifter than the northern blast, they sweep the long tracts of ether; yet are they guided by his reins, and execute whatever he enjoins. All those enormous globes of central fire, which beam through the boundless azure, in comparison of which, an army of planets were like a swarm of summer-insects; those, even those, are conformable to his will; as the melting wax to the impressed seal.

Since all—all is obedient throughout the whole ascent of things, shall man be the only rebel against the almighty Maker? Shall these unruly appetites reject his government, and refuse their allegiance? Shall these headstrong passions break loose from divine restraint, and run wild in exorbitant sallies after their own imaginations.

O my soul! be stung with remorse, and overwhelmed with confusion, at the thought! Is it not a righteous thing that the blessed God should sway the sceptre, with the

* Josh. x. 12, 13. The prophet Habbakkuk, according to his lofty manner, celebrates this event; and points out in very poetical diction, the design of so surprising a miracle. The sun and moon stood still in their habitation; in the light, the long continued and miraculous light, thy arrows, edged with destruction, walked on their awful errand; in the clear shining of the day, protracted for this very purpose, thy glittering spear, launched by thy people, but guided by thy hand, sprung to its prey. Hab. iii. 11.

† Judg. v. 20. The scriptural phrase, fought against, will, I hope, be a proper warrant for every expression I have used on this occasion. The passage is generally supposed to signify, that some very dreadful meteors (which the stars were thought to influence,) such as fierce flashes of lightning, impetuous showers of rain, and rapid storms of hail, were employed by the Almighty to terrify, annoy, and overthrow the enemies of Israel. If so, there cannot be a more clear and lively paraphrase on the text, than these five lines of a Jewish writer. "His severe wrath shall he sharpen for a sword: and the world shall fight with him against the ungodly. Then shall the right-aiming thunderbolts go abroad, and from the clouds, as from a well-drawn bow, shall they fly to the mark. And hail-stones full of wrath shall be cast out of a stone bow; and the water of the sea shall rage against them; and the floods (as was the case of the river Kishon) shall cruelly drown them. Yea, a mighty wind shall stand up against them; and, like a storm, shall blow them away. Wisd. v. 20—23.

* "The planets and all the innumerable host of heavenly bodies, perform their courses and revolutions with so much certainty and exactness, as never once to fail: but, for almost 6000 years, come constantly about to the same period, in the hundredth part of a minute."—Stackhouse's History of the Bible.

† This is spoken in conformity to the Scripture language, and according to the common notion. With respect to the power which affected the alteration, it is much the same thing, and alike miraculous, whether the sun or the earth be supposed to move.

most absolute authority, over all the creatures which his power has formed? especially over those creatures whom his distinguishing favour has endued with the noble principle of reason, and made capable of a blissful immortality? Sure, if all the ranks of inanimate existence conform to their Maker's decree, by the necessity of their nature, this more excellent race of beings should pay their equal homage by the willing compliance of their affections.* Come, then, all ye faculties of my mind; come, all ye powers of my body; give up yourselves, without a moment's delay, without the least reserve, to his governance. Stand like dutiful servants at his footstool, in an everlasting readiness to do whatsoever he requires; to be whatsoever he appoints; to further, with united efforts, the purposes of his glory in this earthly scene; or else to separate, without reluctance, at his summons—the one to sleep in the silent dust; the other, to advance his honour in some remoter colony of his kingdom. Thus may I join with all the works of the Lord, in all places of his dominion, to recognise his universal supremacy, and proclaim him Sovereign of souls as well as Ruler of worlds.

At my first coming abroad, all these luminaries were eclipsed by the overpowering lustre of the sun. They were all placed in the very same stations, and played the same sprightly beams; yet not one of them was seen. As the daylight wore away, and the sober shades advanced, Hesperus, who leads the starry train, disclosed his radiant forehead, and caught my eye. While I stood gazing on his bright and beautiful aspect, several of his attendants peeped through the blue curtains. Scarcely had I turned to observe these fresh emanations of splendour, but others dropt the veil, others stole into view. When, lo! faster and more numerous, multitudes sprung from obscurity; they poured, in shining troops, and in sweet confusion, over all the empyrean plain, till the firmament seemed like one vast constellation, and a flood of glory burst from all the skies.

* This argument, I acknowledge, is not absolutely conclusive, but it is popular and striking. Nor can I think myself obliged in such a work, where fancy bears a considerable sway, to proceed always with the caution and exactness of a disputer in the schools. If there be some appearance of analogy between the fact and the inference, it seems sufficient for my purpose, though the deduction should not be necessary, nor the process strictly syllogistical. One of the apostolic fathers has an affecting and sublime paragraph, which runs entirely in this form: "The sun, the moon, and the starry choir, without the least deviation, and with the utmost harmony, perform the revolutions appointed them by the supreme decree." From which remark, and abundance of other similar instances observable in the economy of nature, he exhorts Christians to a cordial unanimity among themselves, and a dutiful obedience to God. Ed. Clem. Roman. l. Eph. ad Corinth. Sect. 20. See also a beautiful ode in Dr. Watt's lyric poems, entitled The Comparison and Complaint, which turns upon this very thought.

Is not such the rise, and such the progress of a true conversion in the prejudiced infidel, or inattentive sinner? During the period of his vainer years, a thousand interesting truths lay utterly undiscovered, a thousand momentous concerns were entirely disregarded. But when divine grace dissipates the delusive glitter which dazzled his understanding and beguiled his affections, then he begins to discern, dimly to discern, the things which belong unto his peace. Some admonition of scripture darts conviction into his soul, as the glimmering of a star pierces the gloom of night. Then, perhaps, another awful or cheering text impresses terror or diffuses comfort. A threatening alarm his fears, or a promise awakens his hopes. This possibly is succeeded by some afflictive dispensation of providence, and improved by some edifying and instructive conversation. All which is established as to its continuance, and enlarged as to its influence, by a diligent study of the sacred word. By this means, new truths continually pour their evidence; scenes of refined and exalted, but hitherto unknown delight, address him with their attractives. New desires take wing; new pursuits are set on foot. A new turn of mind forms his temper; a new habit of conversation regulates his life. In a word, old things are passed away, and all things become new. He who was sometime darkness, is now light, and life, and joy in the Lord.

The more attentively I view the crystal concave, the more fully I discern the riches of its decorations. Abundance of milder lights, which lay concealed from a superficial notice, are visible on a closer examination; especially in those tracts of the sky, which are called the galaxy; and are distinguishable by a sort of milky path. There the stars are crowded, rather than disseminated. The regions seem to be all on a blaze, with their blended rays. Besides this vast profusion, which in my present situation the eye discovers, were I to make my survey from any other part of the globe, lying near the southern pole, I should behold a new choir of starry bodies, which have never appeared within our horizon. Was I, (which is still more wonderful,) either here or there, to view the firmament with the virtuoso's glass, I should find a prodigious multitude of flaming orbs, which, immersed in depths of ether, escape the keenest unassisted sight.* Yet, in these various situations, even with the aid of the telescopic tube, I should not be able to describe the half, perhaps not a thousandth part of those majestic luminaries, which the vast expansive heavens contain.* So, the more diligently I pursue my search into those oracles of eternal truth, the scriptures, I perceive a wider, a deeper, an ever-increasing fund of spiritual treasures. I perceive the brighter strokes of wisdom, and the richer displays of goodness; a more transcendent excellency in the illustrious Messiah, and a more deplorable vileness in fallen man; a more immaculate purity in God's law, and more precious privileges in his gospel; yet, after a course of study ever so assiduous, ever so prolonged, I should have reason to own myself a mere babe in heavenly knowledge, or at most, but a puerile proficient in the school of Christ.

After all my most accurate inspection, those starry orbs appear but as glittering points. Even the planets, though so much nearer our earthly mansion, seem only like burning bullets. If, then, we have such imperfect apprehensions of visible and material things, how much more scanty and inadequate must be our notions of invisible and immortal objects! We behold the stars. Though every one is incomparably bigger than the globe we inhabit, yet they dwindle upon our survey into the most diminutive forms. Thus we see by faith the glories of the blessed Jesus, the atoning efficacy of his death, the justifying merit of his righteousness, and the joys which are reserved for his followers. But, alas! even our most exalted ideas are vastly below the truth; as much below the truth, as the report which our eyes make of those celestial edifices is inferior to their real grandeur. Should we take in all the magnifying assistances which art has contrived, those luminous bodies would elude our skill, and appear as small as ever. Should an inhabitant of earth travel towards the cope of heaven, and be carried forwards, in his aerial journey, more than a hundred and sixty millions of miles † even in that advanced situation, those oceans of flame would look no larger than radiant specks. In like manner, conceive ever so magnificently of the Redeemer's honours, and of the bliss which he has purchased for his people, yet you will fall short. Raise your imagination higher; stretch your invention wider; give them all the scope which a soaring and excursive fancy can take: still your conceptions will be extremely disproportionate to their genuine perfections. Vast are the bodies which roll in the expanse of heaven; vaster far are those fields of ether, through which they run their endless round; but the excellency of Jesus, and the happiness laid up for his servants, are greater than either, than both, than all. An inspired writer calls the former, "the unsearchable riches of Christ;" and styles the latter, "an exceeding great and eternal weight of glory."

If those stars are so many great and inexhaustible magazines of fire, and immense reservoirs of light; there is no reason to doubt but they have some very grand uses, suitable to the magnificence of their nature. To specify or explain the particular purposes they answer, is altogether impossible in our present state of distance and ignorance. This, however, we may clearly discern; they are disposed in that very manner which is most pleasing and most serviceable to mankind. They are not placed at an infinite remove, so as to lie beyond our sight, neither are they brought so near our abode, as to annoy us with their beams. We see them shine on every side. The deep azure which serves them as a ground, heightens their splendour. At the same time, their influence is gentle, and their rays are destitute of heat. So that we are surrounded with a multitude of fiery globes which beautify and illuminate the firmament, without any risk, either to the coolness of our night, or the quiet of our repose. Who can sufficiently admire that wondrous benignity, which, on our account, strews the earth with blessings of every kind, and vouchsafes to make the very heavens subservient to our delight?

It is not solely to adorn the roof of our palace with costly gildings, that God commands the celestial luminaries to glitter through the gloom. We also reap considerable benefits from their ministry. They divide our time, and fix its solemn periods. They settle the order of our works; and are, according to the destination mentioned in sacred writ, "for signs and for seasons; for days and for years." The returns of heat and cold alone would have been too precarious a rule; but these radiant bodies, by the variation, and also by the regularity, of their motions, afford a method of calculating absolutely certain, and sufficiently obvious. By this the farmer is instructed when to commit his grain to the furrows,

* How noble, considered in this view, are the celebrations of the divine Majesty which frequently occur in the sacred writings! It is the Lord that made the heavens. Psalms xcvi. 5. What a prodigious dignity does such a sense of things give to that devout ascription of praise! "Thou, even thou, art Lord alone; thou hast made heaven, the heaven of heavens with all their host." Neh. ix. 6. Examined by this rule, the beautiful climax in our inspired hymn, is sublime beyond compare! "Praise ye him, sun and moon; praise him, all ye stars of light; praise him, ye heaven of heavens." Psalms cxlviii. 3, 4.

† This, incredible as it may seem, is not a mere supposition, but a real fact. For, about the 21st of December, we are above 160,000,000 of miles nearer the northern parts of the sky, than we are on 21st of June. And yet, with regard to the stars situate in that quarter, we perceive no change in their aspect, nor any augmentation of their magnitude.

and how to conduct the operations of Husbandry. By this, the sailor luc-ws when to proceed on his voyage with least peril, and how to carry on the business of navigation with most success.

Why should not the Christian, the probationer for eternity, learn from the same monitors, to number for nobler purposes, to number his days, and duly to transact the grand, grand affairs of his everlasting salvation? Since God has appointed so many bright measurers of our time, to determine its larger periods, and to minute down its ordinary stages; sure, this most strongly inculcates its value, and should powerfully prompt us to improve it. Behold! the supreme Lord marks the progress of our life, in that most conspicuous calendar above. Does not such an ordination tell us, and in the most emphatical language, that our life is given for use, not for waste; that no portion of it is delivered, but under a strict account; that all of it is entered, as it passes, in the divine register; and therefore, that the stewards of such a talent are to expect a future reckoning? Behold the very heavens are bidden to be the accountants of our years, and months, and days. O! may this induce us to manage them with a vigilant frugality: to part with them as misers with their hoarded treasure, warily and circumspectly; and, if possible, as merchants with their rich commodities, not without an equivalent, either in personal improvement, or social usefulness!

How bright the starry diamonds shine! the ambition of eastern monarchs could imagine no distinction more noble and sublime, than that of being likened to those beaming orbs. (Num. xxiv. 17. Dan. viii. 10.) They form night's richest dress; and sparkle upon her sable robe, like jewels of the finest lustre. Like jewels! I wrong their character. The lucid stone has no brilliancy, quenched is the flame even of the golden topaz, compared with those glowing decorations of heaven. How widely are their radiant honours diffused! No nation so remote but sees their beauty, and rejoices in their usefulness. They have been admired by all preceding generations, and every rising age will gaze on their charms with renewed delight. How animating then, is that promise made to the faithful ministers of the gospel! "They that turn many to righteousness, shall shine as the stars for ever and ever." (Dan. xii. 3.) Is not this a most winning encouragement "to spend and be spent" in the service of souls? Methinks the stars beckon as they twinkle. Methinks they show me their splendours, on purpose to inspire me with alacrity in the race set before me: on purpose to enliven my activity in the work that is given me to do. Yes, ye majestic monitors, I understand your meaning. If honour has any charms, if true glory, the glory which cometh from God, is any attractive, you display the most powerful incitements to exercise all assiduity in my holy vocation. I will henceforth observe your intimation; and when zeal becomes languid, have recourse to your heavenly lamps; if so be I may rekindle its ardour at those inextinguishable fires.

Of the polar star it is observable, that while other luminaries alter their situation, this seems invariably fixed.* While other luminaries now mount the battlements of heaven, and appear upon duty; now retire beneath the horizon, and resign to a fresh set the watches of the night; this never departs from its station. This, in every season, maintains an uniform position, and is always to be found in the same tract of the northern sky. How often has this beamed bright intelligence on the sailor, and conducted the keel to its desired haven! In early ages, those who went down to the sea in ships, and occupied their business in great waters, had scarce any other sure guide for their wandering vessel. This, therefore, they viewed with the most solicitous attention. By this they formed their observations and regulated their voyage. When this was obscured by clouds, or enveloped in mists, the trembling mariner was bewildered on the watery waste. His thoughts fluctuated as much as the floating surge; and he knew not where he was advanced, or whither he should steer. But when this auspicious star broke through the gloom, it dissipated the anxiety of his mind, and cleared up his dubious passage; he reassumed with alacrity the management of the helm, and was able to shape his course with some tolerable degree of satisfaction and certainty.

Such, only much clearer in its light, and much surer in its direction, is the holy word of God to those myriads of intellectual beings who are bound for the eternal shores; who, embarked in a vessel of feeble flesh, are to pass the waves of this tempestuous and perilous world. In all difficulties, those sacred pages shed an encouraging ray, in all uncertainties, they suggest the right determination, and point out the proper procedure. What is still a more inestimable advantage, they, like the star which conducted the eastern sages, make plain the way of access to a Redeemer. They display his unspeakable merits; they discover the method of being interested in his great atonement; and lead the weary soul, tossed by troubles, and shattered by temptations, to that only harbour of peaceful repose. Let us therefore attend to this unerring directory, with the same constancy of regard, as the seafaring man observes his compass. Let us become as thoroughly acquainted with this sacred chart, as the pilot is with every trusty mark, that gives notice of a lurking rock, and with every open road that yields a safe passage into the port. Above all, let us commit ourselves to this infallible guidance, with the same implicit resignation; let us conform our conduct to its exalted precepts, with the same sedulous care, as the children of Israel, when sojourning in the trackless desert, followed the pillar of fire, and the motions of the miraculous cloud. So will it introduce us, not into an earthly Canaan, flowing with milk and honey, but into an immortal paradise, where is the fulness of joy, and where are pleasures for evermore. It will introduce us into those happy, happy regions, where our sun shall no more go down, nor our moon withdraw itself; for the Lord shall be our everlasting light, and the days of our mourning, together with the fatigues of our pilgrimage, shall be ended. (Isaiah lx. 20.)

* I speak in conformity to the appearance of the object. For, though this remarkable star revolves round the pole, its motion is so slow, and the circle it describes so small, as renders both the revolution and change of situation hardly perceivable.

I perceive a great variety in the size and splendour of those gems of heaven. Some are of the first magnitude; others of an inferior order. Some glow with intense flames; others glimmer with fainter beams. Yet all are beautiful, all have their peculiar lustre, and distinct use; all tend in their different degrees to enamel the cope of heaven, and embroider the robe of night. This circumstance is remarked by an author, whose sentiments are a source of wisdom, and the very standard of truth. "One star," says the apostle of the Gentiles, "differeth from another star in glory; so also is the resurrection of the dead."

In the world above, are various degrees of happiness, various seats of honour. Some will rise to more illustrious distinctions, and richer joys.* Some, like vessels of ample capacity, will admit more copious accessions of light and excellence. Yet there will be no want, no deficiency in any, but a fulness both of divine satisfactions and personal perfections. Each will enjoy all the good, and be adorned with all the glory, that his heart can wish or his condition receive. None will know what it is to envy. Not the least malevolence, nor the least selfishness, but everlasting friendship prevails, and a mutual complacency in each other's delight. Love, cordial love, will give every particular saint a participation of all the fruitions which are diffused through the whole assembly of the blessed. No one eclipses, but each reflects light upon his brother. A sweet interchange of rays subsist, all enlightened by the great Fountain, and all enlightening one another. By which reciprocal communication of pleasure and amity, each will be continually receiving from, each incessantly adding to, the general felicity.

Happy, supremely happy they, who are admitted into the celestial mansions. Better to be a doorkeeper in those "ivory palaces," (Psalm xlv. 8.) than to fill the most gorgeous throne on earth. The very lowest place at God's right hand is distinguished honour and consummate bliss. O that we may, in some measure, anticipate that beatific state while we remain in our banishment below! May we, by rejoicing in the superior prosperity of another, make it our own; and provided the general result is harmony, be content, be pleased, with whatsoever part is assigned to our share in the universal choir of affairs.

While I am considering the heavenly bodies, I must not entirely forget those fundamental laws of our modern astronomy, projection and attraction. One of which is the all-combining cement, the other is the ever-operative spring, of the mighty frame. In the beginning the all-creating fiat impressed a proper degree of motion on each of those whirling orbs; which, if not controlled, would have carried them on in straight lines, and to endless lengths, till they were even lost in the abyss of space. But, the gravitating property being added to the projectile force, determined their courses to a circular form,* and obliged the reluctant rovers to perform their destined rounds. Were either of those causes to suspend their action, all the harmoniously moving spheres would be disconcerted, would degenerate into sluggish, inactive masses, and, falling into the central fire, be burnt to ashes; or else would exorbitate into wild confusion, and each, by the rapidity of its whirl, be dissipated into atoms. But the impulsive and attractive energy being most nicely at-

* 1 Cor. xv. 41, 42. The great Mr. Mead prefers the sense here given, and the learned Dr. Hammond admits it into his paraphrase. Whose joint authority, though far from excluding any other, yet is a sufficient warrant for this application of the words.

* I am aware the planetary orbits are not strictly circular, but rather elliptical. However, as they are but a small remove from the perfectly round figure, and partake of it incomparably more than the trajectories of the comets, I choose to represent the thing in this view; especially, because the notion of a circle is so much more intelligible to the generality of readers, than that of an ellipsis; and because I laid it down for a rule, not to admit any such abstruse sentiment, or difficult expression, as should demand a painful attention, instead of raising an agreeable idea. For which reason, I have avoided technical terms; have taken no notice of Jupiter's satellites, or Saturn's ring: have not so much as mentioned the names of the planets, nor attempted to wade into any depths of the science; lest, to those who have no opportunity of using the telescope, or of acquainting themselves with a system of astronomy, I should propound riddles, rather than display entertaining and edifying truths.

tempered to each other; and, under the immediate operation of the Almighty, exerting themselves in perpetual concert, the various globes run their radiant races without the least interruption, or the least deviation, so as to create the alternate changes of day and night, and distribute the useful vicissitudes of succeeding seasons; so as to answer all the great ends of a gracious Providence, and procure every comfortable convenience for universal nature.

Does not this constitution of the material, very naturally lead the thoughts to those grand principles of the moral and devotional world—faith and love? These are often celebrated by the inspired apostle, as a comprehensive summary of the gospel; (Col. i. 4. Philem. ver. 5.) These inspire the breast, and regulate the progress of each private Christian. These unite the whole congregation of the faithful to God, and one another;—to God, the great centre, in the bonds of gratitude and devotion; to one another, by a reciprocal intercourse of brotherly affections and friendly offices. If you ask, Why is it impossible for the true believer to live at all adventures? to stagnate in sloth, or habitually to deviate from duty? We answer, it is owing to “his faith working by love.” (Gal. v. 6.) He assuredly trusts, that Christ has sustained the infamy, and endured the torment due to his sins. He firmly relies on that divine propitiation for the pardon of all his guilt; and humbly expects everlasting salvation as the purchase of his Saviour’s merits. This produces such a spirit of gratitude, as refines his inclinations, and animates his whole behaviour. He cannot, he cannot run to excess of riot; because love to his adorable Redeemer, like a strong, but silken curb, sweetly restrains him. He cannot, he cannot lie lulled in a lethargic indolence; because love to the same infinite Benefactor, like a pungent but endearing spur, pleasingly excites him. In a word, faith supplies the powerful impulse, while love gives the determining bias, and leads the willing feet through the whole circle of God’s commandments. By the united efficacy of these heavenly graces, the Christian conduct is preserved, in the uniformity and beauty of holiness; as by the blended power of those Newtonian principles, the solar system revolves in a steady and magnificent regularity.

How admirable, how extensive, how diversified, is the force of this single principle, attraction!* This penetrates the very essence of all bodies, and diffuses itself to the remotest limits of the mundane system. By this the worlds, impressed with motion, hang self-balanced on their centres, and, though orbs of immense magnitude, require nothing but this amazing property for their support. To this we ascribe a phenomenon of a very different kind—the pressure of the atmosphere, which, though an yielding and expansive fluid, yet, constricted by an attractive energy, surrounds the whole globe, and incloses every creature, as it were, with a tight bandage. An expedient this, absolutely necessary to preserve the texture of our bodies, and indeed to maintain every species of animal existence. Attraction! Urged by this wonderful impetus, the rivers circulate, copious and unintermitted, among all the nations of the earth; sweeping with rapidity down the steeps, or softly edding through the plains. Impelled by the same mysterious force, the nutritious juices are detached from the soil, and ascending the trees, find their way through millions of the finest meanders, in order to transfuse vegetative life into all the branches. This confines the ocean within proper bounds; though the waves thereof roar, though they toss themselves, with all the madness of indigent rage; yet, checked by this potent, this inevitable curb, they are unable to pass even the slight barrier of sand. To this the mountains owe that unshaken firmness, which laughs at the shock of careering winds, and bids the tempest, with all its mingled horrors, impotently rave. By virtue of this invisible mechanism, without the aid of crane or pulley, or any instrument of human device, many thousand tons of water are raised every moment into the regions of the firmament: by this they continue suspended in thin air, without any capacious cistern to contain their substance, or any massy pillars to sustain their weight: By this same variously acting power, they return to the place of their native residence, distilled in gentle falls of dew, or precipitated in impetuous showers of rain; they slide into the fields in fleecy flights of snow, or are darted upon the houses in clattering storms of hail. This occasions the strong cohesion of solid bodies; without which, our large machines could exert themselves with no vigour, and the nicer utensils of life would elude our expectations of service. This affords a foundation for all those delicate or noble mechanic arts, which furnish mankind with numberless conveniences, both of ornament and delight. In short, this is the prodigious ballast, which composes the equilibrium, and constitutes the stability of things; this is the great chain, which forms the connexions of universal nature; and the mighty engine which prompts, facilitates, and in good measure, accomplishes all her operations. What complicated effects from a single cause!*

* I mean the attraction both of gravitation and cohesion.

* See another remarkable instance of this kind, in the Reflections on a Flower-Garden, page 33, 35, to-

What profusion, amidst frugality! an unknown profusion of benefits, with the utmost frugality of expense!

And what is this attraction? Is it a quality, in its existence inseparable from matter, and in its acting independent on the Deity? Quite the reverse. It is the very finger of God; the constant impression of divine power; a principle, neither innate in matter, nor intelligible by mortals. Does it not, however, bear a considerable analogy to the agency of the Holy Ghost, in the Christian economy? Are not the gracious operations of the blessed Spirit thus extensive, thus admirable, thus various? That almighty Being transmits his gifts through every age, and communicates his graces to every adherent on the Redeemer. All, either of illustrious memory, or of beneficial tendency; in a word all the good that is done upon earth, he doth it himself. Strong in his aid, and in the power of his might, the saints of all times have trod vice under their feet, have triumphed over this abject world, and conversed in heaven while they dwelt on earth. Not I, but the grace of God, which was with me (1 Cor. xv. 10.) is the unanimous acknowledgment of them all. By the same kindly success, the whole church is still enlightened, quickened, and governed. Through his benign influences, the scales of ignorance fall from the understanding; the leprosy of evil concupiscence is purged from the will; and the fetters, the more than adamantine fetters of habitual iniquity, drop off from the conversation. He breathes even upon dry bones,* and they live: they are animated with faith; they pant with ardent and heavenly desire; they exercise themselves in all the duties of godliness. His real, though secret inspiration, dissolves the flint in the impenitent breast, and binds up the sorrows of the broken heart; raises the thoughts high in the elevations of holy hope, yet lays them low in the humiliations of inward abasement; steels the soul with impenetrable resolution and preserving fortitude, at the same time softens it into a dove-like meekness, and melts it in penitential sorrow.

When I contemplate those ample and magnificent structures erected over all the ethereal plains; when I look upon them as so many splendid repositories of light, or fruitful abodes of life; when I remember, that there may be other orbs, vastly more remote than those which appear to our unaided sight; orbs, whose effulgence, though travelling ever since the creation, is not yet arrived upon our coasts;† when I stretch my thoughts to the innumerable orders of being which inhabit all those spacious systems, from the loftiest seraph to the lowest reptile, from the armies of angels which surround the throne of Jehovah to the puny nations which tinge with blue the surface of the plum,‡ or mantle the standing pool with green—how various appear the links in this immense chain! how vast the gradations in this universal scale of existence! Yet all these, though ever so vast and various, are the work of God's hand, and are full of his presence.

He rounded in his palm those dreadfully large globes which are pendulous in the vault of heaven. He kindled those astonishingly bright fires, which fill the firmament with a flood of glory. By him they are suspended in fluid ether, and cannot be shaken; by him they dispense a perpetual tide of beams, and are never exhausted. He formed, with inexpressible nicety, that delicately fine collection of tubes, that unknown multiplicity of subtle springs, which organize and actuate the frame of the minutest insect. He bids the crimson current roll, the vital movements play, and associates a world of wonders even in an animated point.‡ In all these is a single ex-

* If this conjecture (which has no less a person than the celebrated Mr. Huygens for its author) concerning unseen stars, be true; if to this observation be added, what is affirmed by our skilful astronomers, that the motion of the rays of light is so surprisingly swift, as to pass through ten millions of miles in a single minute: how vast—beyond imagination vast and unmeasurable—are the spaces of the universe! While the mind is distended with the grand idea; or rather while she is despatching her ablest powers of piercing judgment, and excessive fancy; and finds them all dropt short; all baffled by the amazing subject; permit me to apply that spirited exclamation, and noble remark;

—Say, proud arch
Built with divine ambition; in disdain
Of limit built; built in the taste of heaven!
Vast concave! ample dome! wast thou designed

‡ There are living creatures abundantly smaller than the mite. Mr. Bradley in his treatise on gardening, mentions an insect which, after an accurate examination, he found to be a thousand times less than the least visible grain of sand. Yet such an insect, though quite imperceptible to the naked eye, is an elephant, is a whale, compared with other animals, almost infinitely more minute, discovered by Mr. Lewenhock. If we consider the several limbs which compose such an organized particle; the different muscles which actuate such a set of limbs; the flow of spirits, incomparably more attenuated, which put those muscles in motion; the various fluids which circulate; the different secretions which are performed; together with the peculiar minuteness of the solids before they arrive at their full growth—not to mention other more astonishing modes of diminution, sure we shall have the utmost reason to acknowledge; that the adored Maker is maximus in minimis, greatly glorious even in his smallest works.

libitation of creating power; to all these are extended the special regards of preserving goodness. From hence let me learn to rely on the providence, and to revere the presence of the supreme Majesty.

To rely on his providence: For amidst that inconceivable number and variety of beings which swarm through the regions of creation, not one is overlooked, not one is neglected by the great Omnipotent cause of all. However inconsiderable in its character, or diminutive in its size, it is still the production of the universal Maker, and belongs to the family of the Almighty Father. What though enthroned archangels enjoy the smiles of his countenance; yet the low inhabitants of earth, the most despicable worms of the ground, are not excluded from his providential care. Though the manifestation of his perfections is vouchsafed to holy and intellectual essences, his ear is open to the cries of the young raven; his eye is attentive to the wants and to the welfare of the very meanest births of nature. How much less, then, are his own people disregarded? those for whom he has delivered his beloved Son to death, and for whom he has prepared habitations of eternal joy. They disregarded! No; they are kept as the apple of an eye. The very hairs of their head are all numbered. The fondest mother may forget the infant that is dandled upon her knees, and sucks at her breast,* much sooner than the Father of everlasting compassion can discontinue or remit his watchful tenderness to his people, his children, his heirs.

Let this teach me also a more lively sense of the divine presence. All the rolling worlds above, all the living atoms below, together with all the beings that intervene betwixt these wide extremes, are vouchers for an ever-present Deity. "God has not left himself without a witness." The marks of his footsteps are evident in every place, and the touches of his finger distinguishable in every creature. "Thy name is so high, O thou all-supporting, all-informing Lord; and that do thy wondrous works declare." (Psalm lxxv. 1.) Thy goodness warms in the morning sun, and refreshes in the evening breeze. Thy glory shines in lamps of midnight, and smiles in the blossoms of spring. We see a trace of thy incomprehensible grandeur in the boundless extent of things; and a sketch of thy exquisite skill, in those almost evanescent sparks of life—the insect race." How stupid is this heart of mine, that, amidst such a multitude of remembrancers thronging on every side, I should forget thee a single moment! Grant me, thou great I am! thou source and support of universal existence; Oh! grant me an enlightened eye to discern thee in every object, and a devout heart to adore thee on every occasion. Instead of living without God in the world, may I be ever with him, and see all things full of him.

—The glittering stars

He nods a calm. The tempest blows his wrath.
The thunder is his voice; and the red flash

The mountains flame. He shakes the solid earth,
And rocks the nations. Nor in these alone—
In ev'ry common instance God is seen.

If the beautiful spangles which a clear night pours on the beholder's eye; if those other fires which beam in remoter skies, and are discoverable only by that revelation to the sight—the telescope; if all those bright millions are so many fountains of day, enriched with native and independent lustre, illuminating planets, and culiving systems of their own;* what pomp, how majestic and splendid! is disclosed in the midnight scene! What riches are disseminated through all those numberless provinces of the great Jehovah's empire! Grandeur beyond expression! Yet there is not the meanest slave but carries greater wealth in his own bosom, possesses superior dignity in his own person. The soul that informs

* Isa. xlix. 15. "Can a woman forget her sucking child, that she should not have compassion on the son of her womb? Yea, they may forget; yet will I not forget thee. How delicate and expressive are the images in this charming scripture! How full of beauty if beheld in a critical, how rich with consolation if considered in a believing view! Can a woman? one of the softer sex, whose nature is most impressible and whose passions are remarkably tender—can such a one, not barely disregard, but entirely forget; not suspend her care for a while, but utterly erase the very memory of her child—her own child, not another's? a child that was formed in her womb, and is a part of herself? Her son, the more important, and therefore more desirable species, to whom it peculiarly belongs to preserve the name, and build up the family; her only son—for the word is singular, and refers to a case where the offspring, not being numerous, but centered in a single birth, must be productive of the fondest endearment: Can she divest herself of all concern for such a child; not when he is grown up to maturity, or gone abroad from her house, but while he continues in an infantile state, and must owe his whole safety to her kind attendance; while he lies in her bosom, rests on her arm, and even sucks at her breast; especially if the poor innocent be racked with pain, or seized by some severe affliction; and so become an object of compassion as well as of love? Can she hear its piercing cries; can she see it all restless, all helpless under its misery, and feel no emotions of parental pity? If one such monster of inhumanity might be found, could all (here the prophet, to give his comparison the utmost energy, changes the singular number into the plural) could all mothers be so degenerate? This, sure, cannot be suspected, need not be feared: much less need the true believer be apprehensive of the failure of my kindness. An universal extinction of these strongest affections of nature is a more supposable case, than that I should ever be unmindful of my people, or regardless of their interests.

* Consult with reason. Reason will reply, his clay: the soul that teaches him to think, and enables him to choose, that qualifies him to relish rational pleasure, and to breathe the sublime desire;* the soul that is endowed with such noble faculties; and, above all, is distinguished with the dreadful, the glorious capacity of being pained or blessed for ever: this soul surpasses in worth whatever the eye can see, whatever of material the fancy can imagine. Before one such intellectual being, all the treasure, and all the magnificence of unintelligent creation, becomes poor and contemptible.† For this soul Omnipotence itself has waked and worked through every age. To convince this soul, the fundamental laws of nature have been controlled, and the most amazing miracles have alarmed all the ends of the earth. To instruct this soul, the wisdom of heaven has been transfused into the sacred page, and missionaries have been sent from the great King, who resides in light unapproachable. To sanctify this soul, the Almighty Comforter takes the wings of a dove, and with a sweet transforming influence, broods on the human heart. And O! to redeem this soul from guilt, to rescue it from hell, the heaven of heavens was bowed, and God himself came down to dwell in dust.

Let me pause a while upon this important subject. What are the schemes which engage the attention of eminent statesmen, and mighty monarchs, compared with the grand interests of an immortal soul? The support of commerce, and the success of armies, though extremely weighty affairs, yet, if laid in the balance against the salvation of a soul, are lighter than the downy feather poised against talents of gold. To save a navy from shipwreck, or a kingdom from slavery, are deliverances of the most momentous nature which the transactions of mortality can admit. But, O! how they shrink into an inconsiderable trifle, if (their aspect upon immortality forgot) they are set in competition with the delivery of a single soul from the anguish and horrors of a distressed eternity!‡

Is such the importance of the soul? what vigilance then can be too much, or rather, what holy solicitude can be sufficient, for

* In this respect, as vested with such capacities, the soul even of fallen man has an unquestionable greatness and dignity—is majestic, though in ruin.

† I beg leave to transcribe a pertinent passage, from that celebrated master of reason, and universal literature, Dr. Bentley, whom no one can be tempted to suspect either tainted with enthusiasm, or warped by bigotry. "If we consider," says he, "the dignity of an intelligent being, and put that in the scale against brute and inanimate matter, we may affirm, without over-valuing human nature, that the soul of one virtuous and religious man is of greater worth and excellency than the sun, and his planets, and all the stars in the world.

the overseers of the Saviour's flock, and the guardians of this great, this venerable, this invaluable charge? Since such is the importance of the soul, wilt thou not, O man, be watchful for the preservation of thy own? Shall every casual incident awaken thy concern, every transitory toy command thy regard? And shall the welfare of thy soul, a work of continual occurrence, a work of endless consequence, sue in vain for thy serious care! Thy soul, thy soul is thy all. If this be secured, thou art greatly rich, and will be unspeakably happy. If this be lost, a whole world acquired will leave thee in poverty, and, all its delights enjoyed, will abandon thee to misery.

I have often been charmed and awed at the sight of the nocturnal heavens, even before I knew how to consider them in their proper circumstances of majesty and beauty. Something like magic has struck my mind, on a transient and unthinking survey of the ethereal vault, tinged throughout with the purest azure, and decorated with innumerable starry lamps. I have felt I know not what powerful and aggrandizing impulse, which seemed to snatch me from the low entanglements of vanity, and prompted an ardent sigh for sublimer objects. Methought I heard, even from the silent spheres, a commanding call to spurn the abject earth, and pant after unseen delights. Henceforward I hope to imbibe more copiously this moral emanation of the skies, when, in some such manner as the preceding, they are rationally seen, and the sight is duly improved. The stars, I trust, will teach as well as shine, and help to dispel both nature's gloom, and my intellectual darkness. To some people they discharge no better service than that of holding a flambeau to their feet and softening the horrors of their night. To me and my friends may they act as ministers of a superior order, as counsellors of wisdom, and guides to happiness! Nor will they fail to execute this nobler office, if they gently light our way into the knowledge of their adored Maker; if they point out with their silver rays our path to his beatific presence.

I gaze, I ponder! I ponder, I gaze! and think ineffable things. I roll an eye of awe and admiration. Again and again I repeat my ravished views, and can never satiate either my curiosity or my inquiry. I spring my thoughts into this immense field, till even fancy tires upon her wing. I find wonders ever new; wonders more and more amazing. Yet, after all my present inquiries, what a mere nothing do I know! by all my future researches, how little shall I be able to learn of those vastly distant suns, and their circling retinue of worlds! Could I pry with Newton's piercing sagacity, or launch into his extensive surveys, even then my apprehensions would be little better than those dim and scanty images which the mole, just emerged from her cavern, receives on her feeble optic. This, sure, should repress all impatient or immoderate ardour to pry into the secrets of the starry structures, and make me more particularly careful to cultivate my heart. To fathom the depths of the divine essence, or to scan universal nature with a critical exactness, is an attempt which sets the acutest philosopher very nearly on a level with the idiot; since it is almost, if not altogether, as impracticable by the former, as by the latter.

Be it then my chief study, not to pursue what is absolutely unattainable, but rather to seek what is obvious to find, easy to be acquired, and of inestimable advantage when possessed. O! let me seek that charity which edifieth,* that faith which purifieth. Love, humble love, not conceited science, keeps the door of heaven. Faith, a child-like faith in Jesus, not the haughty self-sufficient spirit which scorns to be ignorant of any thing, presents a key† to those abodes of bliss. This present state is the scene destined to the exercise of devotion, the invisible world is the place appointed for the enjoyment of knowledge. There, the dawn of our infantile minds will be advanced to the maturity of perfect day; or rather, there our midnight shades will be brightened into all the lustre of noon. There the souls which come from the school of faith, and bring with them the principles of love, will dwell in light itself; will be obscured with no darkness at all; will know, even as they are known. (1 Cor. xiii. 12.) Such an acquaintance, therefore, do I desire to form, and to carry on such a correspondence with the heavenly bodies, as may shed a benign influence on the seeds of grace

* 1 Cor. viii. 1. I need not inform my reader, that in this text in that admirable chapter, 1 Cor. xiii. and in various other passages of scripture, the word charity, should by no means be confined to the particular art of alms-giving, or external beneficence. It is of a much more exalted and extensive nature. It signifies that divinely precious grace which warms the soul with supreme love to God, and enlarges it with disinterested affection for men, which renders it the reigning care of the life, and chief delight of the heart, to promote the happiness of the one, and the glory of the other. This, this is that charity of which so many excellent things are everywhere spoken; which can never be too highly extolled, or too earnestly coveted, since it is the image of God, and the very spirit of heaven.

implanted in my breast. Let the exalted tracts of the firmament sink my soul into deep humiliation. Let those eternal fires kindle in my heart an adoring gratitude to their Almighty Sovereign. Let yonder ponderous and enormous globes, which rest on his supporting arm, teach me an unshaken affiance in their incarnate Maker; then shall I be, if not wise as the astronomical adept, yet wise unto salvation.

Having now walked and worshipped in this universal temple, that is arched with skies, emblazed with stars, and extended even to immensity; having cast an eye, like the enraptured patriarch, (Gen. xv. 5,) an eye of reason and devotion through the magnificent scene; with the former, having discovered an infinitude of worlds, and with the latter, having met the Deity in every view; having beheld, as Moses in the flaming bush, a glimpse of Jehovah's excellencies, reflected from the several planets, and streaming from myriads of celestial luminaries; having read various lessons in that stupendous book of wisdom,* where unmeasurable sheets of azure compose the page; and orbs of radiance write, in everlasting characters, a comment upon our creed. What remains but that I close the midnight solemnity, as our Lord concluded his grand sacramental constitution, with a song of praise? And behold a hymn, suited to the sublime occasion, indited by Inspiration itself, (Psalm xix.) transferred into our language, by one† of the happiest efforts of human ingenuity.

The spacious firmament on high,
With all the blue ethereal sky,
And spangled heav'ns—a shining frame,
Their great original proclaim:
Th' unweari'd sun, from day to day,
Does his Creator's power display;
And publishes to ev'ry land,
The work of an Almighty hand.

Soon as the ev'ning shades prevail,
The moon takes up the wondrous tale;
And nightly, to the list'ning earth,
Repeats the story of her birth:
While all the stars that round her burn,
And all the planets in their turn,
Confirm the tidings as they roll,
And spread the truth from pole to pole.

What though in solemn silence all
Move round the dark terrestrial ball?
What though no real voice nor sound
Amid their radiant orbs be found?
In reason's ear they all rejoice,
And utter forth a glorious voice,
For ever singing as they shine,
"The hand that made us is divine."—Addison.

W I N T E R - P I E C E .

It is true, in the delightful seasons, his tenderness and his love are most eminently displayed. In the vernal months, all is beauty to the eye, and music to the ear: The clouds drop fatness; the air softens into balm; and flowers in rich abundance spring wherever we tread, bloom wherever we look. Amidst the burning heats of summer, he expands the leaves and thickens the shades; he spreads the cooling arbour to receive us, and awakes the gentle breeze to fan us: The moss swells into a couch for the repose of our bodies; while the rivulet softly rolls and sweetly murmurs, to soothe our imagination. In autumn, his bounty covers the fields with a profusion of nutritional treasure, and bends the boughs with loads of delicious fruit; he furnishes his hospitable board with present plenty, and prepares a copious magazine for future wants. But is it only in these smiling periods of the year that God, the all-gracious God, is seen? Has winter, stern winter, no tokens of his presence? Yes, all things are eloquent of his praise: "His way is in the whirlwind;" storms and tempests fulfil his word, and extol his power; even piercing frosts bear witness to his goodness, while they bid the shivering nations tremble at his wrath. Be winter, then, for a while, our theme.* Perhaps those barren scenes may be fruitful in intellectual improvement; perhaps that rigorous cold which binds the earth in icy chains, may serve to enlarge our hearts, and warm them with holy love.

See! how the day is shortened! The sun, detained in fairer climes, or engaged in more agreeable services, rises, like an unwilling visitant, with tardy and reluctant steps. He walks with a shy indifference along the edges of the southern sky; casting an oblique glance, he just looks upon our dejected world, and scarcely scatters light through the thick air. Dim is his appearance, languid are his gleams, while he continues; or, if he chance to wear a brighter aspect, and a cloudless brow, yet, like the young and gay in the house of mourning, he seems uneasy till he is gone, is in haste to depart. And let him depart: Why should we wish for his longer stay, since he can show us nothing but the creation in distress? The flowery families lie dead, and the tuneful tribes are struck dumb; the trees, stript of their verdure, and lashed by storms, spread their naked arms to the enraged and relentless heavens. Fragrance no longer floats in the air, but chilling damps hover, or cutting gales blow. Nature, divested of all her beautiful robes, sits, like a forlorn disconsolate widow in her weeds; while winds in doleful accents howl, and rains in repeated showers weep.

We regret not, therefore, the speedy departure of the day. When the room is hung with funeral black, and dismal objects are all around, who would desire to have the glimmering taper kept alive, which can only discover spectacles of sorrow, can only make the horror visible? And since this mortal life is little better than a continual conflict with sin, or an unremitted struggle with misery, is it not a gracious ordination, which has reduced our age to a span? Fourscore years of trial for the virtuous, are sufficiently long; and more than such a term allowed to the wicked, would render them beyond all measure vile. Our way to the kingdom of heaven lies through tribulations. Shall we then accuse, shall we not rather bless the Providence, which has made the passage short? Soon, soon we cross the vale of tears; and then arrive on the happy hills where light for ever shines, where joy for ever smiles.

* A sketch of this nature, I must acknowledge, is quite different from the subject of the book; and, I cannot but declare, was as far distant from the thoughts of the author. But the desire of several acquaintances, together with an intimation of its usefulness, by a very polite letter from an unknown hand, (which has undesignedly furnished me with the best motto I could recollect,) prevailed with me to add a few descriptive touches and improving hints, on what is so often experienced in these northern regions. I hope the attempt I have made to oblige these gentlemen will obtain the approbation, or at least the excuse of my readers.

Sometimes the day is rendered shorter still; is almost blotted out from the year. The vapours gather, they thicken into an impenetrable gloom, and obscure the face of the sky. At length the rains descend; and the sluices of the firmament are opened, and the low-hung clouds pour their congregated stores. Copious and unintermitted, still they pour, and still are unexhausted. The waters drop incessantly from the caves, and rush in rapid streams from the spouts: They roar along the channelled pavements, and stand in foul shallows on the village streets. Now, if the inattentive eye, or negligent hand, has left the roof but scantily covered, the insinuating element finds its way into every flaw, and oozing through the ceiling, at once upbraids and chastises the careless inhabitant. The ploughman, soaked to the skin, leaves his half-tilled acre; the poor poultry, dripping with wet, crowd into shelter; and the tenants of the bough fold up their wings, afraid to launch into the streaming air; the beasts, joyless and dispirited, ruminant under their shades; the roads swim and the brooks swell. The river, amidst all this watery ferment, long contained itself within its appointed bounds; but swollen by innumerable currents, and roused at last into uncontrollable rage, bursts over its banks, shoots into the plain, bears down all opposition, spreads itself far and wide, and buries the meadow under a brown, sluggish, soaking deluge.

How happy for man, that this inundation comes when there are no flowery crops in the valley to be overwhelmed, no field standing thick with corn to be laid waste! At such a juncture, it would have been ruin to the husbandman and his family: but thus timed, it yields manure for his ground, and promises him riches in reversion. How often, and how long has the divine Majesty borne with the most injurious affronts from sinners! His goodness triumphed over their perverseness, and graciously refused to be exasperated. But, O presumptuous creatures, multiply no longer your provocations; urge not, by repeated iniquities, the almighty arm to strike; lest his long suffering cease, and his fierce anger break forth: break forth like a flood of waters, (Hosea v. 10,) and sweep you away into irrecoverable and everlasting perdition.

How mighty, how majestic, and O! how mysterious are thy works, thou God of heaven, and Lord of nature! When the air is calm, where sleep the stormy winds, in what chambers are they reposed, or in what dungeons confined, till thou art pleased to awaken their rage, and throw open their prison doors? Then, with irresistible impetuosity, they fly forth, scattering dread and manning destruction.

The atmosphere is hurled into the most tumultuous confusion. The aerial torrent bursts its way over mountains, seas, and continents. All things feel the dreadful shock. All things tremble before the furious blast. The forest, vexed and torn, groans under the scourge, her sturdy sons are strained to the very root, and almost sweep the soil they were wont to shade. The stubborn oak, that disdains to bend, is dashed headlong to the ground, and with shattered arms, with prostrate trunk, blocks the road. While the flexible reed, that springs up in the marsh, yielding to the gust (as the meek and pliant temper to injuries, or the resigned and patient spirit to misfortunes) eludes the force of the storm, and survives amidst the wide-spread havoc.

For a moment the turbulent and outrageous sky seems to be assuaged; but it intermits its wrath, only to increase its strength. Soon the sounding squadrons of the air return to the attack, and renew their ravages with redoubled fury. The stately dome rocks amidst the wheeling clouds; the impregnable tower totters on its basis, and threatens to overwhelm whom it was intended to protect: The ragged rock is rent in pieces, (1 Kings xix. 11,) and even the hills, the perpetual hills, on their deep foundations, are scarcely secure. Where, now, is the place of safety, when the city reels, and houses become heaps? Sleep affrighted flies; diversion is turned into horror: all is uproar in the element; all is consternation among mortals; and nothing but one wide scene of rueful devastation through the land. Yet this is only an inferior minister of divine displeasure; the executioner of milder indignation. How then, O! how will the lofty looks of man be humbled, and the haughtiness of men be bowed down,* when the Lord God Omnipotent shall meditate terror, when he shall set all his terrors in array, when he arises to judge the nations, and to shake terribly the earth!

The ocean swells with tremendous commotions. The ponderous waves are heaved from their capacious bed, and almost lay bare the unfathomable deep. Flung into the most rapid agitation, they sweep over

* — Mortalia corda

Per gentis humilis stravit pavor.—Virg.

One would almost imagine, that Virgil had read Isaiah, and borrowed this idea from chap. ii. ver. 11. The humilis and stravit of the one, so exactly correspond with the—humbled—bowed down—of the other. But, in one circumstance, the prophet is very much superior to the poet. The prophet, by giving a striking contrast to his sentiments, represents them with incomparably greater energy. He says, not men in the gross, or the human heart in general; but men of the most elated looks, hearts big with the most arrogant imaginations. Even these shall stoop from their supercilious heights, even these shall grovel in the dust of abasement, and shudder with all the extremes of an abject pusillanimity.

the rocks, they lash the lofty cliffs, and toss themselves into the clouds. Navies are rent from their anchors; and, with all their enormous load, are whirled, swift as the arrow, wild as the winds, along the vast abyss. Now, they climb the rolling mountain, they plough the frightful ridge, and seem to skim the skies; anon, they plunge into the opening gulf, they lose the sight of day, and are lost themselves to every eye. How vain is the pilot's art! how impotent the mariner's strength! They reel to and fro, and stagger in the jarring hold, or cling to the cordage, while bursting seas foam over the deck. Despair is in every face, and death sits threatening on every surge. But why, O ye astonished mariners! why should you abandon yourselves to despair? Is the Lord's hand shortened, because the waves of the sea rage horribly? Is his ear deafened by the roaring thunders, and the bellowing tempest? Cry, cry unto him, who "holdeth the winds in his fist, and the waters in the hollow of his hand." He is all-gracious to hear, and almighty to save. If he command, the storm shall be hushed to silence; the billows shall subside into a calm; the lightnings shall lay their fiery bolts aside; and, instead of sinking in a watery grave, you shall find yourselves brought to the desired haven.

Sometimes, after a joyless day, a more dismal night succeeds. The lazy luring vapours had wove so thick a veil as the meridian sun could scarcely penetrate. What gloom then must overwhelm the nocturnal hours! The moon withdraws her shining; not a single star is able to struggle through the deep arrangement of shades; all is pitchy darkness, without one enlivening ray. How solemn! how awful! It is like the shroud of nature, or the return of chaos! I do not wonder that it is the parent of terrors, and so apt to engender melancholy. Lately the tempest marked its rapid way with mischief; now, the night dresses her silent pavilion with horror.

I have sometimes left the burning tapers, withdrawn from the ruddy fire, and plunged into the thickest of these sooty shades; without regretting the change, rather exulting in it as a welcome deliverance. The very gloom was pleasing, was exhilarating, compared with the conversation I quitted. The speech of my companions (how does it grieve me, that I should even once have occasion to call them by that name!) was the language of darkness—was horror to the soul, and torture to the ear.* Their teeth were spears and arrows, and their tongue a sharp sword, to stab and assassinate their neighbour's character. Their throat was an open sepulchre, gaping to devour the reputation of the innocent, or tainting the air with their virulent and polluted breath. Sometimes their licentious and ungovernable discourse shot arrows of profaneness against heaven itself, and, in proud defiance challenged the resentment of Omnipotence. Sometimes, as if it were the glory of human nature to cherish the grossest appetites of the brute, or the mark of a gentleman to have served an apprenticeship in a brothel, the filthiest jests of the stews (if low obscenity can be a jest) were nauseously obtruded on the company. All the modest part were offended and grieved; while the other besotted creatures laughed aloud, though the leprosy of uncleanness appeared on their lips. Are not these persons prisoners of darkness, though blazing sconces pour artificial day through their rooms. Are not their souls immured in the most baleful shades, though the noontide sun is brightened by flaming on their gilded chariots? They discern not that great and adorable Being, who fills the universe with his infinite and glorious presence; who is all eye to observe their actions, all ear to examine their words. They know not the all-sufficient Redeemer, nor the unspeakable blessedness of his heavenly kingdom. They are groping for the prize of happiness, but will certainly grasp the thorn of anxiety: They are wantonly sporting on the brink of a precipice; and are every moment in danger of falling headlong into irretrievable ruin, and endless despair.

They have forced me out, and are, perhaps, deriding me in my absence; are charging my reverence for the ever-present God, and my concern for the dignity of our rational nature, to the account of humour and singularity; to narrowness of thought, or sourness of temper. Be it so. I will indulge no indignation against them. If any thing like it should arise, I will convert it into prayer: "Pity them, O thou Father of mercies! Show them the madness of their profaneness! show them the baseness of their vile ribaldry! Let their dissolute rant be turned into silent sorrow and confusion, till they open their lips to adore thy insulted majesty, and to implore thy gracious pardon; till they devote to thy service those social hours, and those superior faculties, which they are now abusing to the dishonour of thy name, to the contamination of their own souls, and (unless timely repentance intervene) to their everlasting infamy and perdition.

I ride home amidst the gloomy void. All darkling and solitary, I can scarce discern my horse's head, and only guess out my blind road. No companion but danger, or perhaps destruction ready at my side. (Job xviii. 12.) But why do I fancy myself solitary? Is not the Father of lights, the God of my life, the great and everlasting friend, always at my right hand? Because the day is excluded, is his omnipresence vacated? Though I have no earthly acquaintance near to assist in case of a misfortune, or to beguile the time and divert uneasy suspicions by entertaining conferences; may I not lay my help upon the Almighty, and converse with God by humble supplication? For this exercise, no place is improper, no hour unseasonable, and no posture incommodious. This is society, the best of society, even in solitude: This is a fund of delights, easily portable, and quite inexhaustible. A treasure this of unknown value, liable to no hazard from wrong or robbery; but perfectly secure to the lonely wanderer in the most darksome paths.

And why should I distress myself with apprehensions of peril? This access to God is not only an indefeasible privilege, but a kind of ambulatory garrison. Those who make known their requests unto God, and rely upon his protecting care, he gives his angels charge over their welfare. His angels are commissioned to escort them in their travelling, and to hold up their goings, that they dash not their foot against a stone, (Psalm xci. 11, 12.) Nay, he himself condescends to be their guardian, and "keeps all their bones, so that not one of them is broken." Between these persons, and the most mischievous objects, a treaty of peace is concluded. The articles of this grand alliance are recorded in the book of Revelation; and will, when it is for the real benefit of believers, assuredly be made good in the administrations of Providence. "In that day," saith the Lord, "I will make a covenant for them with the beasts of the field, and with the fowls of heaven, and with the creeping things of the ground; and they shall be in league with the stones of the field." (Job v. 23. Hos. ii. 18.) Though they fall headlong on the flints, even the flints, fitted to fracture the skull, shall receive them as into the arms of friendship, and not offer to hurt whom the Lord is pleased to preserve.

May I then enjoy the presence of this gracious God, and darkness and light shall be both alike. Let Him whisper peace to my conscience, and this dread silence shall be more charming than the voice of eloquence, or the strains of music. Let him reveal his ravishing perfections in my soul, and I shall not want the saffron beauties of the morn, the golden glories of noon, or the empurpled evening sky. I shall sigh only for those most desirable and distinguished realms, where the light of his countenance perpetually shines, and consequently there is no night there. (Rev. xxi. 25.)

How surprising are the alterations of nature! I left her the preceding evening plain and unadorned; but now a thick rime has shed its hoary honours over all: It has shagged the fleeces of the sheep, and crisped the traveller's locks: The hedges are richly fringed, and all the ground is profusely powdered: The downward branches are tasselled with silver, and the upright are feathered with the plummy wave.

The fine are not always the valuable.

The air, amidst all these gaudy decorations, is charged with chilling and unwholesome damps: The raw hazy influence spreads wide, sits deep, hangs heavy and oppressive on the springs of life. A listless languor clogs the animal functions, and the purple stream glides but faintly through its channels. In vain the ruler of the day exerts his beaming powers; in vain he attempts to disperse this insurrection of vapours. The sullen malignant cloud refuses to depart; it envelops the world, and intercepts the prospect. I look abroad for the neighbouring village; I send my eye in quest of the rising turret; but am scarce able to discern the very next house. Where are the blue arches of heaven? where is the radiant countenance of the sun? where the boundless scenes of creation? Lost, lost are their beauties; quenched their glories. The thronged theatre of the universe seems an empty void, and all its elegant pictures an undistinguished bland. Thus would it have been with our intellectual views, if the gospel had not come in to our relief. We should have known neither our true good, nor real evil. We had been a riddle to ourselves; the present state all confusion, and the future impenetrable darkness. But the Sun of Righteousness, arising with potent and triumphant beams, has dissipated the interposing cloud; has opened a prospect more beautiful than the blossoms of spring, more cheering than the treasures of autumn, and far more enlarged than the extent of the visible system; which, having led the eye of the mind through fields of grace, over rivers of righteousness, and hills crowned with knowledge, terminates at length in the heavens, sweetly losing itself in regions of infinite bliss and endless glory.

As I walk along the fog, it seems, at some little distance, to be almost solid gloom; such as would shut out every glimpse of light, and totally imprison me in obscurity. But when I approach and enter it, I find myself agreeably mistaken, and the mist much thinner than it appeared. Such is the case with regard to the sufferings of the present life ; they are not, when experienced, so dreadful as a timorous imagination surmised. Such also is the case with reference to the gratifications of sense ; they prove not, when enjoyed, so substantial as a sanguine expectation represented. In both instances, we are graciously disappointed. The keen edge of the calamity is blunted, that it may not wound us with incurable anguish : the exquisite relish of the prosperity is pallid, that it may not captivate our affections, and enslave them to inferior delights.

Sometimes the face of things wears a more pleasing form, the very reverse of the foregoing. The sober evening advances to close the short-lived day : The firmament, clear and unsullied, puts on its brightest blue : The stars, in thronging multitudes, and with a peculiar brilliancy, glitter through the fair expanse, while the frost pours its subtile and penetrating influence all around. Sharp and intensely severe, all the long night, the rigid ether continues its operations. When, late and slow, the morning opens her pale eye, in what a curious and amusing disguise is nature dressed ! The icicles, jagged and uneven, are pendent on the houses : A whitish film incrusts the windows, where mimic landscapes rise, and fancied figures swell : The fruitful fields are hardened to iron ; the moistened meadows are congealed to marble ; and both resound (an effect unknown before) with the peasant's hasty tread. The stream is arrested in its career, and its everflowing surface chained to the banks : The fluid paths become a solid road : where the finny shoals were wont to rove, the sportive youth slide, or the rattling chariots roll. And (what would seem, to an inhabitant of the southern world, as unaccountable as the deepest mysteries of our religion) that very same breath of heaven, which cements the lakes into a crystal pavement, cleaves the oaks, as it were with invisible wedges ; " breaks in pieces the northern iron and the steel," even while it builds a bridge of icy rock over the seas.*

The air is all serenity. Refined by the nitrous particles, it affords the most distinct views and extensive prospects. The seeds of infection are killed, and the pestilence destroyed, even in embryo. So, the cold of affliction tends to mortify our corruptions, and subdue our vicious habits. The crowded atmosphere constringes our bodies, and braces our nerves. The spirits are buoyant, and sally briskly on the execution of their office. In the summer months, such an unclouded sky, and so bright a sun, would have melted us with heat, and softened us into supineness. We should have been ready to throw our limbs under the spreading beach, and to lie at ease by the murmuring brook. But now none loiters in his path ; none is seen with folded arms : All is in motion, all is activity. Choice, prompted by the weather, supplies the spur of necessity. Thus, the rugged school of misfortune often trains up the mind to a vigorous exertion of its faculties. The bleak climate of adversity often inspires us with a manly resolution ; when a soft and downy affluence, perhaps, would have relaxed all the generous springs of the soul, and have left it enervated with pleasure, or dissolved in indolence.

* Job xxxviii. 30. The waters are hid, locked up from the cattle's lips, and secured from the fisher's net, as wells were wont to be closed with a ponderous and impenetrable stone. And not only lakes and rivers, but the surface of the great deep, with its restless and uncontrollable surges, is taken captive by the frost, and bound in shining fetters.

" Cold cometh out of the north ; (Job xxxvii. 9.) The winds, having swept those deserts of snow, arm themselves with millions of frozen particles, and make a fierce descent upon our isle. Under black and scowling clouds, they drive, dreadfully whizzing, through the darkened air. They growl around our houses, assault our doors, and, eager for entrance, fasten on our windows : walls can scarce restrain them ; bars are unable to exclude them : through every cranny they force their way : Ice is on their wings ; they scatter agues through the land ; and winter, all winter, rages as they go. Their breath is as a searing iron* to the little verdure left on the plains. Vastly more pernicious to the tender plants than the sharpest knife, they kill their branches, and wound the very root. Let not the corn venture to peep too freely from the entrenchment of the furrow ; let not the fruit-bearing blossoms dare to come abroad from their lodgment in the bark ; lest these murderous blasts intercept and seize the unwary strangers, and destroy the hopes of the advancing year.

O, it is severely cold ! Who is so hardy as not to shrink at this excessively pinching weather ? See ! every face is pale. Even the blooming cheeks contract a gelid hue ; and the teeth hardly forbear chattering. Ye that sit easy and joyous amidst your commodious apartments, solacing yourselves in the diffusive warmth of your fire, be mindful of your brethren in the cheerless

* This, I suppose, is the meaning of that figurative expression used by the prophet Habakkuk : who, speaking of the Chaldeans invading Judea, says, their faces, or the incursions they make, shall sup up, shall swallow greedily, shall devour utterly, the inhabitants of the country, and their valuable effects ; as the keen corroding blasts of the east wind destroy every green thing in the field. Hab. i. 9.

terement of poverty. Their shattered panes are open to the piercing winds; a tattered garment scarcely covers their shivering flesh; while a few faint and dying embers on the squalid hearth, rather mock their wishes than warm their limbs. While the generous juices of Oporto sparkle in your glasses; or the streams, beautifully tinged and deliciously flavoured with the Chinese leaf, smoke in the elegant porcelain; O remember, that many of your fellow-creatures, amidst all the rigour of these inclement skies, are emaciated with sickness, benumbed with age, and pining with hunger. Let "their loins bless you," for comfortable clothing. Restore them with medicine; regale them with food; and baffle the raging year. So, may you never know any of their distresses, but only by the hearing of the ear, the seeing of the eye, or the feeling of a tender commiseration! Methinks, the bitter blustering winds plead for the poor indigents. May they breathe pity into your breasts, while they blow hardships into their huts. Observe those blue flames and ruddy coals in your chimney: quickened by the cold, they look more lively, and glow more strongly:—silent but seasonable admonition to the gay circle, that chat and smile around them! Thus may your hearts, at such a juncture of need, kindle into a peculiar benevolence! Detain not your superfluous piles of wood; let them hasten to the relief of the starving family; bid them expire in many a willing blaze, to mitigate the severity of the season, and cheer the bleak abodes of want. So shall they ascend, mingled with thanksgivings to God, and ardent prayers for your welfare; ascend more grateful to heaven, than columns of the most costly incense.

Now the winds cease. Having brought their load, they are dismissed from service. They have wafted an immense cargo of clouds, which empty themselves in snow. At first, a few scattered shreds come wandering down the saddened sky. This slight skirmish is succeeded by a general onset. The flakes, large and numerous, and thick wavering, descend. They dim the air, and hasten the approach of night. Through all the night, in softest silence, and with a continual flow, this fleecy shower falls. In the morning, when we awake, what a surprising change appears! Is this the same world? Here is no diversity of colour: I can hardly distinguish the trees from the hills on which they grow; which are the meadows and which the plains; where are the green pastures, and where the fallow lands. All things lie blended in bright confusion,—so bright, that it heightens the splendour of day, and even dazzles the organs of sight. The lawn is not so fair as the snowy mantle which invests the fields; and even the lily, were the lily to appear, would look tarnished in its presence. I can think of but one thing which excels or equals the glittering robe of winter. Is any person desirous to know my meaning? He may find it explained in that admirable hymn,* composed by the Royal penitent. Is any desirous to possess this matchless ornament? He will find it offered to his acceptance in every page of the gospel.

See! (for the eye cannot satisfy itself without viewing again and again the curious, the delicate scene.) see how the hedges are habited, like spotless vestals. The houses are roofed with uniformity and lustre. The meadows are covered with a carpet of the finest ermine.† The groves bow beneath the lovely burden; and all, all below is one wide, immense, shining waste of white. By deep snows, and heavy rains, God sealeth up the hand of every man, and for this purpose, adds our sacred philosopher, that all men may know his work. (Job xxxvii. 7.) He confines them within their doors, and puts a stop to their secular business, that they may consider the things which belong to their spiritual welfare; that, having a vacation from their ordinary employ, they may observe the works of his power, and become acquainted with the mysteries of his grace.

And worthy, worthy of all observation, are the works of the great Creator. They are prodigiously various, and perfectly amazing. How pliant and ductile is nature under his forming hand! At his command, the self-same substance assumes the most different shapes, and is transformed into an endless multiplicity of figures. If he ordain, the water is moulded into hail, and discharged upon the earth like a volley of shot; or it is consolidated into ice, and defends the rivers, "as it were with a breast-plate." At the bare intimation of his will, the very same element is scattered in hoar-frost, like a sprinkling of the most attenuated ashes; or is spread over the surface of the ground, in these couches of swelling and flaky down.

The snow, however it may carry the appearance of cold, affords a warm garment for the corn; screens it from nipping frosts, and cherishes its infant growth. It will abide for a while, to exert a protecting care, and exercise a fostering influence. Then, touched by the sun, or thawed by a softening gale, the furry vesture melts into genial moisture; sinks deep in the soil, and saturates its pores with the dissolving nitre: replenishing the globe with those principles of vegetative life, which will open into the bloom of Spring, and ripen into the fruits of Autumn. Beautiful emblem this, and comfortable representation of the divine word, both in the successful and advantageous issue of its operation! "As the rain cometh down, and the snow from heaven, and returneth not thither, but watereth the earth, and maketh it bring forth and bud, that it may give seed to the sower, and bread to the eater, so shall my word be, that goeth forth out of my mouth, it shall not return unto me void, but shall accomplish that which I please, and it shall prosper in the thing whereunto I send it." (Isaiah lv. 10, 11.)

* Can any thing be whiter than the snow? Yes, saith David; if God be pleased to wash me from my sins in the blood of Christ, "I shall be even whiter than the snow." Psalm li. 7.

† This animal is milk-white. As for those black spots which we generally see in linings of ermine, they are added by the furrier, in order to diversify the appearance, or heighten the beauty of the native colour.

Nature at length puts off her lucid veil. She drops it in a tricking thaw. The loosened snow rolls in sheets from the houses. Various openings spot the hills, which, even while we look become larger and more numerous. The trees rid themselves by degrees of the hoary incumbrance. Shook from the springing boughs, part falls heavy to the ground, part flies abroad in shining atoms. Our fields and gardens, lately buried beneath the drifted heaps, rise plain and distinct to view. Since we see nature once again, has she no verdant traces, no beautiful features left? They are, like real friends, very rare; and therefore the more particularly to be regarded, the more highly to be valued. Here and there the holly hangs out her glowing berries, the laurustinus spreads her graceful tufts, and both under a covert of unfading foliage. The plain but hardy ivy clothes the decrepit crazy wall, nor shrinks from the friendly office, though the skies frown and the storm roars. The laurel, firm, erect, and bold, expands its leaf of vivid green. In spite of the united, the repeated attacks of wind, and rain, and frost, it preserves an undismayed lively look, and maintains its post, while withering millions fall around. Worthy, by vanquishing the rugged force of winter, worthy to adorn the triumphant conqueror's brow. Nor must I forget the bay-tree, which scorns to be a mean pensioner on a few transient sunny gleams, or, with a servile obsequiousness, to vary its appearance in conformity to the changing seasons; by such indications of sterling worth, and staunch resolution, reading a lecture to the poet's genius, while it weaves the chaplet for his temples. These, and a few other plants, clad with native verdure, retain their comely aspect in the bleakest climes, and in the coldest months.

Such, and so durable, are the accomplishments of a refined understanding, and an amiable temper. The tawdry ornaments of dress, which catch the unthinking vulgar, soon become insipid and despicable. The rubied lip, and the rosy cheek, fade. Even the sparkling wit,* as well as the sparkling eye, please but for a moment. But the virtuous mind has charms, which survive the decay of every inferior embellishment, charms which add to the fragrant of the flower, the permanency of the ever-green.

Such likewise is the happiness of the sincerely religious, like a tree, says the inspired moralist, "whose leaf shall not fall." He borrows not his peace from external circumstances; but has a fund within, and is "satisfied from himself;" (Prov. xiv. 14.) Even though impoverished by calamitous accidents, he is rich in the possession of grace, and richer in the hope of glory. His joys are infinitely superior to, as well as nobly independent of, the transitory glow of sensual delight, or the capricious favours of what the world calls, Fortune.

If the snow composes the light-armed troops of the sky, methinks the hail constitutes its heavy artillery.† When driven by a vehement wind, with what dreadful impetuosity does that stony shower fall! How it rebounds from the frozen ground, and rattles on the resounding dome! It attenuates the rivers into smoke, or scourges them into foam. It crushes the infant flowers, cuts in pieces the gardener's early plants, and batters the feeble fortification

* "How little does God esteem the things that men count great! the endowments of wit and eloquence that men admire in some; alas! how poor are they to him! He respecteth not any who are wise in heart; they are nothing, and less than nothing in his eyes. Even wise men admire how little it is that men know; how small a matter lies under the sound of these popular wonders, a learned man, a great scholar, a great statesman. How much more doth the all-wise God meanly account of these! He often discovers even to the world their meanness: He befools them. So valour, or birth, or worldly greatness, these he gives, and gives as things he makes no great reckoning of, to such as shall never see his face; and calls to the inheritance of glory, poor despised creatures, that are looked on as the offscourings and refuse of the world."

† Thus says an excellent author, who writes with the most amiable spirit of benevolence, with the most unaffected air of humility, and, like the sacred originals, from which he copies, with a majestic simplicity of style; whose select works I may venture to recommend, not only as a treasure, but as a mine of genuine, sterling, evangelical piety. See page 520 of Archbishop Leighton's select works, the Edinburgh edition, 8vo: which it is necessary to specify, because the London edition does not contain that part of his writings which has supplied me with the preceding quotation.

‡ He casteth forth his ice like morsels, Psalm cxlvii. 17. Which in modern language, might be thus expressed: "He poureth his hail like a volley of shot." The word inadequately translated morsels, alludes, I think, to those fragments of the rock, or those smooth stones from the brook, which, in the battle, the warriors hurled from their slings.

of his glasses into shivers. It darts into the traveller's face: he turns with haste from the stroke, or feels on his cheek for the gushing blood. If he would retreat into the house, it follows him even thither, and, like a determined enemy, that pushes the pursuit, dashes through the crackling panes. But the fierce attack is quickly over. The clouds have soon spent their shafts; soon unstrung their bow. Happy for the inhabitants of the earth, that a sally so dreadfully furious should be so remarkably short! What else could endure the shock, or escape destruction?

But, behold a bow, of no hostile intention! a bow painted in variegated colours, on the disburdened cloud. How vast the extent, how delicate the texture of that showery arch! It compasseth the heavens with a glorious circle, and teaches us to forget the horrors of the storm. Elegant its form, and rich its tincture, but more delightful its sacred significancy. While the violet and the rose blush in its beautiful aspect, the olive branch smiles in its gracious import. It writes in radiant dyes, what the angels sung in harmonious strains, "Peace on earth, and good-will towards men." It is the stamp of insurance, for the continuance of seed-time, and harvest; for the preservation and security of the visible world: (Gen. ix. 12, 16.) It is the comfortable token (Rev. iv. 3.) of a better state, and a happier kingdom; a kingdom where sin shall cease, and misery be abolished; where storms shall beat, and winter pierce no more; but holiness, happiness, and joy, like one unbounded spring, for ever, ever bloom.

THERON AND ASPASIO ;

OR, A

SERIES OF DIALOGUES AND LETTERS

ON THE

MOST IMPORTANT SUBJECTS.

CONTENTS.

DIALOGUE I. Character of the speakers—On improving conversation—Elegance, dignity, and singular usefulness of the Scriptures.

DIALOGUE II. Walk through the gardens—The beautiful frame and beneficial ordination of things—Preparatory discourse on the imputation of Christ's righteousness—Meaning of the terms settled.

DIALOGUE III. Walk through a meadow—Doctrine of Christ's satisfaction stated—Considered as a redemption-price, and as a sacrifice for sin—Variously typified under the Mosaic dispensation.

DIALOGUE IV. Park and romantic mount—Christ's death farther considered, as the very punishment which our sins deserved—Objections, ancient and modern, answered—The whole summed up and improved.

DIALOGUE V. Elegant arbour in the flower-garden—Imputation of Christ's righteousness—Objections from reason canvassed.

DIALOGUE VI. Gallery of pictures—Library and its furniture—A sordid taste in painting censured: a more graceful manner displayed—Imputation of Christ's righteousness resumed—Objections from Scripture urged and refuted.

DIALOGUE VII. Hay-making—Pleasures of nature freely enjoyed—Blessings of grace bestowed with equal freeness—Theron's plan of acceptance with God: consists of sincerity, repentance, and good works, recommended by the merits of Christ—This shown to be a false foundation—No such thing as a good work, till we are accepted through the Redeemer.

DIALOGUE VIII. Duelling—Animadversions on the practice—Spirituality and extent of the divine law—Infinite purity of God.

DIALOGUE IX. Citious summer-house—No relaxation of the divine law, as to the precept or the penalty—Its inflexible strictness, and principal ends.

DIALOGUE X. Theron's last effort to demolish the evangelical scheme of justification—Among other objections, more plausible and refined than the preceding, he strenuously insists that faith is our righteousness—Review of the whole.

DIALOGUE XI. Ruins of Babylon—Fine passage from Mr. Howe—Depravity and ruin of human nature, as they are represented in Scripture—Applied, with a view to determine the yet dubious inquiry.

DIALOGUE XII. Extremely hot day—A solemn shady bower—True method of deriving benefit from the classics—The wonderful structure and economy of the human body.

DIALOGUE XIII. Walk upon the terrace—Depravity of human nature laid open, and proved from experience—Uses of the doctrine, and its subserviency to the grand point.

DIALOGUE XIV. Theron alone in the fields—His soliloquy on the charms of rural nature—His reflections on the past conferences—Aspasio reinforces his arguments for the imputation of Christ's righteousness—Recommends self-examination, the keeping of a diary, and prayer for the enlightening Spirit—Departs, under an engagement, to correspond by letter.

LETTER I. Aspasio opens the correspondence with some important articles of duty, designed to facilitate self-examination, and promote conviction of sin.

LETTER II. Theron, convinced of the iniquity of his life, and the evil of his heart, sees the necessity of a better righteousness than his own—Desires a farther explanation, and a fuller proof, of the doctrines under debate.

LETTER III. Aspasio proves the point, from the Liturgy, the Articles, the Homilies of the church of England, and the writings of the fathers.

LETTER IV. Aspasio re-establishes the tenet, from the Scriptures of the Old Testament.

LETTER V. Aspasio relates a remarkable panic—Terrors of the day of judgment—Christ's righteousness, and its imputation, largely demonstrated from the New Testament.

LETTER VI. Theron takes a cursory view of the habitable creation—Traces the perfections of nature through the earth, air, and fire—Admirable construction, and advantageous effects, of these elements.

LETTER VII. Aspasio takes occasion to display the no less admirable perfection of Christ's righteousness—Its principle, extent, perseverance.

LETTER VIII. Aspasio describes a drought—Majesty and beauty of the sun, after a night of rain—The meritorious excellency of Christ's righteousness illustrated, from the magnificence of his works, and the divinity of his person.

LETTER IX. Theron's account of the western cliffs, the wonders of the ocean, and the benefits of navigation.

LETTER X. Aspasio enumerates the much richer benefits resulting from the imputation of Christ's righteousness—Shows their happy influence on holiness of heart, and obedience of life.

LETTER XI. Aspasio exemplifies the last particular in two very memorable instances—Especially in the conduct of Abraham offering up his son Isaac.

LETTER XII. Aspasio touches upon union with Christ—How described in Scripture—Its blessed and glorious effects.

DIALOGUE XV. Aspasio revisits Theron—Theron under anxiety of spirit—Aspasio, partly to entertain, partly to comfort his friend, enlarges upon the bounty of the Creator, visible both in the animal and vegetable world—The new convert is slow of heart to believe—Evangelical motives to faith.

DIALOGUE XVI. Harvest scene—Philenor's gardens—Statues—Grove of Evergreens—Nature of true faith—Its sure foundation, and firm supports.

DIALOGUE XVII. A river-voyage—The diversified prospect—Comparative happiness—Advantages of peace—A celebration of the Gospel, and its blessings, in a kind of rhapsody—Christ's righteousness applied to every case of distress, and every time of need.

THE RIGHT HONOURABLE,

LADY FRANCES SHIRLEY.

MADAM,

IF Christianity was inconsistent with true politeness, or prejudicial to real happiness, I should be extremely injudicious, and inexcusably ungrateful, in presenting these Essays to your Ladyship. But as the religion of Jesus is the grand ornament of our nature, and a source of the sublimest joy, the purport of the following pages cannot be unworthy the countenance and protection of the most accomplished person. Neither can there be a wish more suitable to the obligations or the dictates of a grateful heart, than that you may experience what you read, and be what you patronize.

Did religion consist in a formal round of external observances, or a forced submission to some rigorous austerities, I would not scruple to join with the infidel and the sensualist to dread it in one view, and to despise it in another. You need not be informed, Madam, that it is as much superior to all such low and forbidding singularities, as the heavens are higher than the earth. It is described by an author, who learned its theory in the regions of Paradise, and who displayed its efficacy in his own most exemplary conversation;—it is thus described by that incomparable author:—The kingdom of God is not meat and drink, but righteousness, and peace, and joy in the Holy Ghost.

To be reconciled to the omnipotent God; to be interested in the unsearchable riches of Christ; to be renewed in our hearts, and influenced in our lives, by the sanctifying operations of the divine Spirit—this is evangelical righteousness; this is genuine religion; this, Madam, is the kingdom of God established in the soul. How benign and inviting is such an institution! How honourable and advantageous such a state! And from such privileges, what other effects can flow, but that “peace, which passeth all understanding;” that “joy, which is unspeakable and glorious!”

Is there any thing in the amusements of the gay, and pursuits of the ambitious, of greater, of equal, of comparable value? Is not all that wealth can purchase, all that grandeur can bestow, somewhat like those glittering bubbles, which, when viewed, are emptiness, when grasped, are nothing? Whereas the comforts, the benefits, the hopes of Christianity, are at once supremely excellent, and infinitely durable; a portion suited to the dignity of a rational soul; large as its faculties, and immortal as its being.

All these blessings are centered in Christ; were purchased by Christ; are communicated from Christ. It is for want of knowing those boundless and everlasting treasures of pardoning, justifying, saving merit, which the Lord Jesus Christ possesses, and which he freely dispenses even to sinners, that so many unthinking persons are attached to ignoble objects, and beguiled by delusory pleasures. Unhappy creatures! what can they do but catch at shadows, and stoop to trifles, while they are ignorant of the grand, the substantial, the exalted good? It is for want of duly attending to that fulness of grace, and that plenteousness of redemption, which dwell in our most adorable Saviour, that so many serious persons are strangers to the tranquillity and sweetness of religion, are subject to all its restraints, but enjoy few, if any, of its delights. Mistaken zealots! How can they avoid the gloomy situation, and the uncomfortable circumstance, so long as they withdraw themselves from the Sun of Righteousness, and his all-cheering beams?

May your Ladyship live continually under his heavenly light and healing wings; be more fully assured of his dying love, and have brighter, still brighter manifestations of his immense perfections! By these delightful views, and by that precious faith, may your heart be transformed into his holy, his amiable, his divine image! Your happiness will then be just such as is wished, but far greater than can be expressed, by,

MADAM,

Your most obliged, and

Most obedient humble servant,

JAMES HERVEY.

WESTON FAVEL,
Jan. 6, 1755.

P R E F A C E.

THE Reader will probably expect some account of the ensuing Work; and to gratify him in this particular will be a real pleasure to the Author.

The beauty and excellency of the Scriptures;—the ruin and depravity of human nature,—its happy recovery, founded on the atonement, and effected by the Spirit of Christ;—these are some of the chief points vindicated, illustrated, and applied in the following sheets. But the grand article, that which makes the principal figure, is the imputed righteousness of our Divine Lord; from whence arises our justification before God, and our title to every heavenly blessing; an article which, though eminent for its importance, seems to be little understood, and less regarded; if not much mistaken and almost forgotten.

The importance of this great evangelical doctrine,—how worthy it is of the most attentive consideration, and of universal acceptance,—is hinted in the second dialogue; so that I need, in this place, do nothing more than give the sense of a passage from Witsins, which is there introduced in a note. “The doctrine of justification,” says that excellent author, “spreads itself through the whole system of divinity. As this is either solidly established or superficially touched, fully stated or slightly dismissed; accordingly, the whole structure of religion either rises graceful and magnificent, superior to assault and beyond the power of decay, or else it appears disproportionate and defective, totters on its foundation, and threatens an opprobrious fall.”

The design is executed in the form of dialogue; those parts only excepted in which it was not easy to carry on a conversation, and assign to each person a proper degree of significance. Here, to avoid the common imputation of bringing upon the stage a mute or a shadow,—one who fights without weapons, and submits without a contest,—the scene shifts. Our gentlemen separate, and, instead of conversing, enter upon an epistolary correspondence.

The dialogue form seems, on many considerations, a very eligible way of writing. Hereby the author gives an air both of dignity and of modesty to his sentiments. Of dignity; by delivering them from the mouths of persons in every respect superior to himself. Of modesty; because we no longer consider him in the raised, but invidious capacity of a teacher. Instead of calling us to his feet, and dictating his precepts, he gratifies our curiosity. He turns back a curtain, and admits us to some remarkable interviews, or interesting conferences. We overhear, by a kind of innocent or imaginary stealth, the debates which pass in the recesses of privacy, which are carried on with the most unreserved freedom of speech, and openness of heart; a circumstance which will apologize for some peculiarities that might otherwise be inconsistent with humility, or offensive to delicacy. Particularly it may obviate the disgust which generally, and indeed deservedly, attends the frequent intrusion of that ambitious and usurping little monosyllable, I.

The names of the persons are prefixed, each to his respective share of the discourse, in imitation of Cicero, and for the reasons which he assigns; "Quasi enim ipsos induxi loquentes: ne inquam et inquit sæpius interpone-rentur. Atque id eo feci, ut tanquam presentibus coram haberi sermo videretur."* This method, he very justly intimates, is removed farthest from the narrative, and makes the nearest approaches to life and reality. It quite secretes the author, and, by introducing the persons themselves, renders all that passes entirely their own. It prevents likewise the repetition of those interlocutory words—he said, he replied; which, unless the speeches are very long, must frequently recur, and have no pleasing effect upon the ear. And if the speeches are long, the spirit of conversation is lost. The associates are no longer talking; but one of them, or the author, is lecturing.

Though I have so much to say in behalf of the model, I have very little to say with regard to the execution, unless it be to confess the deficiency. There is not, I am sensible, that peculiar air and distinguishing turn, which should mark and characterise each speaker. This is what the nature of finished dialogue requires, and what the author applauds in some very superior writers. But not having the ability to copy it, he has not the vanity to affect it. Nevertheless, the attentive reader, will, all along, perceive a difference in the sentiment, if not in the language. The materials vary, even when they run into the same mould, and take the same form. In the diction also there must be some diversity; because several of the objections are proposed in the very words of one or two eminent writers who have appeared on the other side of the question. These are not particularized by the mark of quotation; because the man of reading will have no occasion for the assistance of such an index, and the man of taste will probably discern them by the singularity of the style.

Some of the following pieces, it must be acknowledged, are of the controversial kind: a species of writing least susceptible of the graces which embellish composition; or rather, most destitute of the attractives which engage attention and create delight. Yet I have sometimes thought, that it is not absolutely impossible to make even the stern face of controversy wear a smile, and to reap some valuable fruit from the rugged furrows of disputation. Whether this is effected in the present work, the public must judge; that it has been attempted, the author may be permitted to declare.

To soften the asperities of argument, views of nature are interspersed; that if the former should carry the appearance of a rude entangled forest, or of a frowning gloomy recess, there may be some agreeable openings, and lightsome avenues, to admit a prospect of the country; which is always arrayed in charms, and never fails to please.

The author confesses a very peculiar fondness for the amiable scenes of creation. It is therefore not at all improbable but his excursions on this topic may be of the diffusive kind, and his descriptions somewhat luxuriant. It is hoped, however, that the benevolent reader will indulge him in this favourite foible. If any should feel the same prevailing passion for the beauties of nature, it is possible these persons may be inclined not only to excuse, but to approve the fault; and may take part with the lover, even in opposition to the critic.

Further to diversify the piece, sketches of philosophy are introduced; easy to be understood, and calculated to entertain the imagination, as well as to improve the heart; more particularly, to display the wise and beneficent design of Providence, in the various appearances and numberless productions of the material world. Neither are these remarks altogether foreign to the main point; but, as far as the wonders of creation may comport with the riches of free grace, subserve the general end.

As to the choice of my subjects, some people have desired to see an invective against the fashionable and predominant vices of the age. This, I apprehend, would be like picking off the leaves, or clipping away the twigs, from some overgrown and noxious tree. Waving this tedious and ineffectual toil, I would rather lay the axe to the root. Let the knowledge and love of Christ take place in the heart, and not only a few of the branches, but the whole body of sin will fall at once.

Some would have the author insist upon the conscientious observance of the Sabbath, inculcate the daily worship of God in the family, and urge a devout attendance on the public ordinances of religion. But when a person is convinced of sin, and made sensible of misery: when he has "tasted the good word of God," Heb. vi. 5, "and seen by faith the Lord's Christ," Luke ii. 26, he will want no solicitation or incitement to these means of grace and exercises of godliness. He will have just the same disposition to them all, as the hungry appetite has to wholesome food, or the new-born babe* to the milk of the breast.

Others may imagine, that I have neglected the interests of morality; because here is no professed attempt to delineate its duties, or enforce its practice. Let these persons remember, that morality never makes such vigorous shoots, never produces such generous fruit, as when ingrafted on evangelical principles. And if I do not crop the pink, the rose, and the carnation—if I do not gather the peach, the nectarine, and the pineapple—and put them into my reader's hand, for his immediate enjoyment; I am endeavouring to sow the seeds and plant the roots in his garden, which, if cherished by the favourable influence of heaven, will yield him, not an occasional, but a constant supply of all.

As several texts of Scripture come under consideration, criticisms upon the original are frequently subjoined, in order to clear up some difficulties, to rectify some mistranslations, or point out the many delicate and masterly strokes which occur in the Bible. And glad should I be, extremely glad, if I might recommend and endear that invaluable book; if, as the divine Redeemer "rideth on in the word of truth, of meekness, and righteousness," Psalm xlv. 4, this hand might scatter a palm-branch, or this performance might lie as a flowret, to strew his way,* and solemnize his triumph.

In the course of disputation, I dare not suppose that I have discussed all the arguments which sagacity may devise, or sophistry urge. Perhaps, I have not removed all the scruples, which may awaken prejudice or embarrass integrity. This, however, I may venture to affirm, that I myself have met with no considerable objection, which is not either expressly answered, or virtually refuted, in these conferences. And, though I should neither satisfy nor silence the gainsayer, I shall think my endeavours happily employed, if they may throw light upon the dim apprehension, establish the wavering faith, or comfort the afflicted conscience.

If any should burlesque or ridicule these venerable truths, and ex-

* 1 Pet. ii. 2. This comparison is, perhaps, the most exact and expressive that words can form, or fancy conceive. Babes covet nothing but the milk of the breast. They are indifferent about all other things. Give them riches, give them honours, give them whatever you please, without this rich, delicious, balmy nutriment, they will not, they cannot be satisfied. How finely does this illustrate, and how forcibly inculcate, what our Lord styles, "the single eye," and "the one thing needful!" or the salutary doctrines and delightful privileges of the gospel; together with that supreme value for them, and undivided complacency in them, which are the distinguishing character of the Christian?

* Alluding to Matt. xxi. 8.

alted privileges, I shall only say with my divine Master, "O! that thou hadst known, in this thy day, the things that belong to thy peace! but now they are hid," it is evident from such a procedure, "they are hid from thine eyes," Luke xix. 42. Should any, in the spirit of decency and candour, either start new, or revive old objections, I doubt not but they will receive both a due examination and a proper reply. As these doctrines enter into the very essence of the gospel, and constitute the glory of our religion, they can never want a succession of advocates, so long as the sun and moon endure. For my own part, I must beg leave to retire from the lists, and lay down the weapons of controversy. Virgil's language is my resolution;

"Discedam, explebo numerum, reddarque tenebris."

This declaration is made, not from any the least suspicion that my tenets are indefensible, but because I would apprise my friends, and the friends of our common Christianity, that the field is clear and open for them to advance; that I resign to others the glorious combat, and shall content myself with wishing them success in the name of the Lord: Because it becomes a person in my declining state to be more peculiarly intent upon encountering a different adversary, who is sure to overcome, and never allows quarter. Yet by this "word of my testimony, and by the blood of the Lamb," Rev. xii. 11, I hope to triumph even when I fall; and to be more than conqueror, through Jehovah my righteousness.

Should any thing be urged forcible enough to overthrow my arguments, or detect a mistake in my sentiments, the world may depend upon seeing a free and undissembled retraction. I shall look upon it as a duty which I owe to my conscience, to my readers, and to my God, publicly to acknowledge the error.—It is one thing to be silent, another to be obstinate. As I shall inflexibly adhere to the first, I would with equal steadiness renounce the last.

Though I withdraw from the strife of pens and of tongues, I shall take care to preserve a mind ever accessible to truth, ever open to conviction; a mind infinitely more concerned for the purity and prosperity of the everlasting gospel, than for the prevalence of my own opinion, or the credit of my own performance.

As I have the happiness of being a member, and the honour of being a minister of the reformed established church, I cannot but reflect, with a peculiar pleasure, that every doctrine of note maintained in these Dialogues and Letters, is either implied in our Liturgy, asserted in our Articles, or taught in our Homilies. It affords me likewise some degree of satisfaction to observe, that the most material of the sentiments that have been adopted by Milton, are incorporated into his Paradise Lost, and add dignity to the sublimest poem in the world. To have the highest human authority, and the first genius of the nation, on a writer's side, is no contemptible support. This must surely give a sanction, wherever our religious establishment is revered, or polite literature is held in repute. Yet even this sanction, compared with the oracle of revelation, is only like a range of ciphers connected with the initial figure—which, were they detached, would be insignificant, but, in such a subordination, are considerable.

Perhaps it should be farther acknowledged, that I have not always confined myself to the method of our systematic writers, nor followed their train of thoughts with a scrupulous regularity. I would conduct my fellow-creature to the supreme and eternal good, Christ Jesus. I have chosen the path which seemed most agreeable and inviting, rather than most beaten and frequented. If this leads, with equal certainty, to the great and desirable end, I dare promise myself an easy excuse. However, that method and order, in the doctrinal parts of the plan, are not wholly neglected, the preceding summary of contents may show.

THERON AND ASPASIO;

OR, A

SERIES OF DIALOGUES AND LETTERS

ON THE

MOST IMPORTANT SUBJECTS.

DIALOGUE I.

THERON was a gentleman of fine taste, of accurate rather than extensive reading, and particularly charmed with the study of nature. He traced the planets in their courses, and examined the formation of the meanest vegetable, not merely to gratify a refined curiosity, but chiefly to cultivate the nobler principles of religion and morality. Several discoveries he made, and every discovery he improved to this important end—to raise in his mind more exalted apprehensions of the Supreme Being, and to enlarge his affections with a disinterested benevolence, conformable, in some degree, to that boundless liberality which pervades and animates the whole creation.

Aspasio was not without his share of polite literature, and philosophical knowledge. He had taken a tour through the circle of the sciences; and, having transiently surveyed the productions of human learning, devoted his final attention to the inspired writings. These he studied with the unbiassed impartiality of a critic, yet with the reverential simplicity of a Christian. These he regarded as the unerring standard of duty—the authentic charter of salvation—and the brightest mirror of the Deity, affording the most satisfactory and sublime display of all the divine attributes.

Theron was somewhat warm in his temper; and would, upon occasion, make use of a little innocent raillery, not to expose his friend, but to enliven the conversation; sometimes disguising his real sentiments, in order to sift the subject, or discover the opinion of others. Aspasio seldom indulges the humorous or satirical vein, but argues with “meekness of wisdom;”^{*} never puts on the appearance of guile, but always speaks the dictates of his heart.

Aspasio was on a visit at Theron’s seat. One evening, when some neighbouring gentlemen were just gone, and had left them alone, the conversation took the following turn.

Asp. I would always be ready, both to acknowledge and applaud whatever is amiable in the conduct of others. The gentlemen who gave us their company at dinner, seem to be all of a different character; yet each, in his own way, is extremely agreeable.

Lysander has lively parts, and is quick at repartee; but he never abuses his wit to create uneasiness in the honest heart, and flush the modest cheek with confusion. What solidity of judgment, and depth of penetration, appear in Crito! yet how free are his discourses from the magisterial tone or the dictatorial solemnity. Philenor’s taste in the polite arts is remarkably correct; yet without the least tincture of vanity, or any weak fondness for applause. He never interrupts the progress, or wrests the topic of conversation, in order to shine in his particular province. Trebonius, I find, has signalized his valour in several campaigns. Though a warrior and a traveller, he gives himself no overbearing or ostentais a most amiable character, and delicately drawn, but is, I think expressed with greater strength and superior beauty by the sacred penman: “Let him show out of a good conversation his works, with meekness of wisdom,” James, iii. 13.

tious airs. In Trebonius you see the brave officer, regulated by all the decency of the academic, and sweetened with all the affability of the courtier.

No one affects a morose silence, or assumes an immoderate loquacity.* To engross the talk is tyrannical, to seal up the lips is monkish. Every one, therefore, from a fund of good sense, contributes his quota; and each speaks, not with an ambition to set off himself, but from a desire to please the company.

Ther. Indeed, Aspasio, I think myself happy in this accomplished set of acquaintance; who add all the complaisance and politeness of the gentleman, to the benevolence and fidelity of the friend.

Their conversation is as innocent as their taste is refined. They have a noble abhorrence of slander, and detest the low, ungenerous artifices of detraction. No loose jest has either the service of their tongue, or the sanction of their smile. Was you to be with them, even in their freest moments, you would hear nothing that so much as borders upon profaneness, or is in the least injurious to purity of morals.

Asp. There is but one qualification wanting to render your friends completely valuable, and their social interviews a continual blessing.

Ther. Pray, what is that?

Asp. A turn for more serious conferences. Their literary debates are beautiful sketches of whatever is most curious in the sciences, or most delicate in the arts. From their remarks on our national affairs, and on foreign occurrences, a person may almost form a system of politics. But they never touch upon any topic of morality; never celebrate the sublime perfections of the Deity; never illustrate the beauties, nor enforce the truths—

Ther. Fie upon you, Aspasio, for your unpolite hint! Who can forbear interrupting the harangue, which pleads for such an outrageous violation of the mode? would introduce edifying talk into our fashionable assemblies? How is it that you, who, in other instances, are a gentleman of refinement, can be so strangely inelegant in this particular?

Asp. For such a practice, Theron, we have no inconsiderable precedents. Thus Socrates,† the wisest of the Athenian sages; thus Scipio,‡ the most accomplished of the Roman generals, conversed. Thus Cicero,* the prince of orators, improved his elegant retirement, at the Tusculan villa. And Horace,‡ the brightest genius in the court of Augustus, formed the most agreeable hours of his conversation upon this very plan.

Were I to enumerate all the patrons of this, forgive me if I say, more honourable mode, the most illustrious names of antiquity would appear on the list.

Ther. This practice, however extolled by the philosophic gentry of ancient times, would make a very singular figure in the present age.

Asp. And should not the copy, after which the generality of mankind write, be singularly correct? Persons of exalted fortune are the pattern for general imitation; are the copy, in conformity to which the inferior world adjust their manners and regulate their behaviour. They, therefore, are under the strongest obligations not to give a contemptible stamp to the fashion. Benevolence to their fellow-creatures calls loudly upon them—a concern for the public good challenges it at their hands, that they signalize themselves by a pre-eminence in all that is excellent.

Ther. Away, away with these austere notions! such a strain of conversation would damp the gaiety of our spirits, and flatten the relish of society. It would turn the assembly into a conventicle, and make it Lent all the year round.

Asp. Can it then be an austere practice, to cultivate the understanding and improve the heart? Can it damp the gaiety of our spirits, to refine them upon the plan of the highest perfection? or will it flatten the relish of society, to secure and anticipate everlasting delights?

Ther. Everlasting delights, Aspasio! to talk of such a subject, would be termed, in every circle of wit and gallantry, an usurpation of the parson's office; a low method of retailing by scraps, in the parlour, what the man in black vends by wholesale from the pulpit. It would infallibly mark us out for pedants; and, for aught I know, might expose us to the suspicion of enthusiasm.

Asp. Your men of wit must excuse me, if I cannot persuade myself to admire either the delicacy of their language or the justness of their opinion.

The first, be it ever so humane and graceful, I resign to themselves. As for the other, I would beg leave to inquire,

* Zeno being present, where a person of this loquacious disposition played himself off, said, with an air of concern in his countenance, "That poor gentleman is ill, he has a violent flux upon him." The company was alarmed, and the rhetorician stopped in his career. "Yes, (added the philosopher,) the flux is so violent that it has carried his ears into his tongue."

† Vid. Socratis Memorabilia, per Xenoph.

‡ See Cicero's Dialogue, de amicitia; in which we are informed, that it was a customary practice with Scipio, with his polite friend, Laelius, and some of the most distinguished nobility of Rome, to discourse upon the interests of the republic, and the immortality of the soul.

* Vid. Tuscul. Quæst.

‡ Such were the interviews of which he speaks with a kind of rapture, "O noctes, cenaque deum!"

"are the clergy, then, the only persons who should act the becoming part, and converse like rational beings? Is solid wisdom and sacred truth the privilege of their order; while nothing is left for you and me, but the play of fancy, or the luxuries of sense?"

I would next ask the circles of gallantry, "where is the impropriety of interweaving the noble doctrines displayed by the preacher with our common discourse? or what the inconvenience of introducing the amiable graces, recommended by his lectures, into our ordinary practice?" Will such an exercise of our speech rank us among pedants? is this the badge of enthusiasm? A splendid and honourable badge truly! such as must add weight to any cause, and worth to any character.

Ther. This would curb the sprightly sallies of wit, and extinguish that engaging glow of good humour which enlivens our genteel intercourses. Accordingly you may observe, that if any formal creature takes upon him to mention, in polite company, a religious truth or a text of Scripture, the pretty chat, though ever so profusely flowing, stagnates in an instant. Each voluble and facetious tongue seems to be struck with a sudden palsy. Every one wonders at the strange man's face; and they all conclude him either mad or a Methodist.

Asp. Agreeable strokes of wit are by no means incompatible with useful conversation, unless we mistake an insipid vivacity, or fantastic levity, for wit and facetiousness. Neither have I heard, that among all our acts of parliament, any one has passed to divorce good sense and good humour. Why may they not both reside on the same lips, and both circulate through the same assembly? For my own part, I would neither have our discourse soured with austerity, nor evaporate into impertinence; but unite (as a judicious ancient advises) the benefits of improvement, with the blandishments of pleasantry.* And as to your polite people, if they can find more music in the magpie's voice, than in the nightingale's note, I must own myself as much surprised at their ears, as they are at the strange man's face.

Ther. With all your grey-headed authorities, I fancy you will find very few proselytes among the professors of modern refinement. Fashion is, with the world, the standard of morals, as well as of clothes; and he must be of a very peculiar turn indeed, who would choose to be ridiculous in either.

Asp. Rather, Theron, he must be of a very pliant turn, who tamely delivers up his conduct to be moulded by a fashion, which has neither true elegance to dignify it, nor the least usefulness to recommend it. And which, I beseech you, is most ridiculous? He who servilely imitates every idle fashion, and is the very ape of corrupt custom? Or he who asserts his native liberty, and resolutely follows where wisdom and truth lead the way?

Ther. Would you then obtrude religious discourse upon every company? Consider, Aspasio, what a motley figure this would make. A wedding, and a sermon! quadrille, and St. Paul! the last new play, and primitive Christianity!

Asp. You know the rule, Theron, which is given by the great Master of our Assemblies, "Cast not your pearls before swine." (Matt. vii. 6.) Some there are so immersed in sensuality, that they can relish nothing but the coarsest links of conversation. To these, neither offer your pearls, nor prostitute your intimacy. But when persons of a liberal education and elevated sentiments—when these meet together, why should not their discourse be suitable to the eminence of their rank, and the superiority of their genius? raised far above the level of that trite and effeminate strain, "Upon my honour, the actress topt her part. Heavens! how charmingly she sung. how gracefully she trode the stage!"

Ther. Indeed my Aspasio, I am entirely in your way of thinking, however I have hitherto put on the mask. The gift of speech is one great prerogative of our rational nature. And it is a pity that such a superior faculty should be debased to the meanest purposes. Suppose all our stately vessels, that pass and re-pass the ocean, were to carry out nothing but tinsel and theatrical decorations—were to import nothing but glittering baubles, and nicely-fancied toys—would such a method of trading be well-judged in itself, or beneficial in its consequences? Articulate speech is the instrument of a much nobler commerce, intended to transmit and diffuse the treasures of the mind. And will not the practice be altogether as injudicious, must not the issue be infinitely more detrimental, if this vehicle of intellectual wealth is freighted only with pleasing fopperies?

Asp. Such folly and extravagance would be hissed out of the commercial world. Why then are they admitted and cherished in the social?

{Ther. Why indeed? He must be far more acute than your Theron, who can assign a single reason to countenance them. To explode them, ten thousand arguments occur. A continual round of gay and trifling conversation,* of visits quite modish, and entertainments not moral, must give a most indolent turn to the mind; such as will enervate its powers, indispose it for generous action, and gradually sap the very foundation of virtue. Whereas, a frequent conference on the glories of the Godhead, or the wonders of creation, would invigorate and ennoble the soul; would enlarge her faculties, and elevate her desires.

Asp. "Did not our hearts burn within us," said the travellers at Emmaus, "while he talked with us by the way?" (Luke xxiv. 32.) Those discourses, it is true, were conducted with a spirit, and enforced with an energy, absolutely unequalled; yet the same happy effects would in some degree result from our friendly conferences, if they turned upon the same important points. We also should feel our hearts warmed with holy zeal, and glowing with heavenly love.

Ther. Such conferences would not only be productive of present advantage, but yield a renewed pleasure in the retrospect. We might reflect, with real complacency, on hours spent in so rational a manner. And who would not prefer the silent applause of the heart, to all those tumultuous joys which wanton jests create, or the circling glass inspires?

Asp. One† who thoroughly knew mankind, and had tried the merits of the jovial board, very pertinently compares such flashes of mirth to the "crackling of thorns under a pot." (Ecl. vii. 6.) The transient blaze of the one, and the senseless noise of the other, continue but for a moment, and then expire; that in smoke and darkness, this in spleen and melancholy.

I said spleen and melancholy. For however jauntie and alert the various methods of modish trifling may seem, whatever ease or grace they are supposed to give the conversation; sure am I, it will be afflictive to look back upon interviews squandered away in very vanity, and shocking to look forward upon the account which we must all shortly render. What figure will such an article make in the final reckoning, and at the decisive bar! "Our social hours, which might have promoted our mutual edification, and been subservient to our Creator's glory, all lost in merriment and whim; or worse than lost, in flattery and detraction: A blank, or a blot."

Ther. Venus, we find, has her zealous knight-errants, and Bacchus, his professed votaries, in almost every company. And is it not truly deplorable, that the God of nature alone has none to assert his honour, none to celebrate his perfections? though he is the original of all beauty, and the parent of all good.

When I have taken my morning walk amidst dews and flowers, with the sun shedding lustre round him, and unveiling the happy landscape, how has my eye been charmed with the lovely prospect! how has my ear been ravished with the music of the grove! Methought every note was a tribute of harmony; and all nature seemed one grand chorus, swelling with the Creator's praise. But how has the scene been reversed, when leaving my rural elysium, I entered the haunts of men! where I saw faculties divine, meanly engaged in trifles; where I heard the tongue, prompt to utter, and fluent to express, every thing but its Maker's glory.

I assure you, I have often been chagrined on this occasion; and sometimes said within myself, "What! shall trifles be regarded, and the majesty of heaven neglected? Shall every friend, and every visitant, receive his share of respect, and no acknowledgments be paid to that exalted Being, who is worthy, more than worthy, of all our veneration?"

Asp. This will be still more afflictive to an ingenuous mind, if we consider that the infinite and glorious God is present at all our interviews, vouchsafes to express his satisfaction, and acknowledges himself magnified, when, with admiration and love, we talk of his transcendent excellencies. Nay, we are assured that the Lord of all lords not only hearkens, but keeps a book of remembrance; and will distinguish such persons at the day of universal retribution. When the loose train of licentious talkers are driven away as the despicable chaff, these shall be selected for his peculiar treasure, and numbered among the jewels of Jehovah.*

Ther. If the gentlemen who make high pretensions to reason, think themselves discharged from these doctrines of revelation, they should not forget their own Scriptures. A philosopher will tell them the duty of employing their time, as in the awful presence, and under the immediate inspection of the Supreme Being.† An orator will show them the egregious impropriety of

* Mal. iii. 16, 17. This is a passage much to be observed. A most emphatical recommendation of religious discourse, perhaps the most emphatical that ever was used, and the most endearing that can possibly be conceived.

† "Sic certe vivendum est, tanquam in conspectu vivamus: sic cogitandum, tanquam aliquis in pectus intimum inspicere possit; et potest. Quid enim prodest ab homine aliquid esse secretum? Nihil Deo clausum est. Interest animis nostris, et cogitationibus mediis, intere venit." Senec. Epist. 83.

* The significance and importance of such conversation was smartly represented by the philosopher; who being asked, How he left the company employed? made answer, some in milking the ram, others in holding the pail.

† King Solomon.

wasting their friendly interviews in the fumes of drollery, or the froth of impertinence.*

Asp. Who then, that is wise, would not habituate himself to a practice, which comes recommended by the voice of reason, and is enforced by the authority of God?—a practice, which will administer present good, will afford pleasing reviews, and terminate in everlasting honour?

Ther. It is strange, that subjects which deserve to be received as the universal topic, are almost universally banished from our discourse. Was this cabinet enriched with a series of antique medals, or a collection of the finest gems, my friends would naturally expect to be entertained with a sight of those rarities, and an explanation of their meaning. Why should we not as naturally expect, and as constantly agree, to entertain each other with remarks on those admirable curiosities which are deposited in the boundless museum† of the universe?

When a general has won some important victory, or an admiral has destroyed the enemy's fleet, every company resounds with their achievements, every tongue is the trumpet of their fame. And why should we not celebrate, with equal delight and ardour, that Almighty hand which formed the structure, and furnished the regions, of this stupendous system?

Asp. Especially, if to his immensely glorious, we add his supremely amiable perfections. When the victorious commander is our most cordial friend—when he has professed the tenderest love, done us the most signal good, and promised us a perpetual enjoyment of his favours—it will be impossible to neglect such an illustrious and generous person. His name must be engraven upon our hearts, must slide insensibly into our tongues, and be as music to our ears.

Is not all this true, and in the most super-eminent degree, with regard to the blessed God? Can greater kindness be exercised, or greater love be conceived, than to deliver up his own Son to torments and death for the expiation of our sins? Can benefits more desirable be granted, than to adopt us for his children, and sanctify us by his Spirit? Can promises more invaluable be made, than those which ensure to us the preferments of heaven, and the riches of eternity?—All this is attested, concerning the Almighty Majesty, in the Scriptures of truth. What a fund, therefore, for pleasing and delicate conversation are the Scriptures?

Ther. Here also I have the pleasure of concurring with my Aspasio, though I believe he suspects me to be somewhat wavering or defective in my veneration for the Scriptures.

Asp. No, Theron, I have a better opinion of your taste and discernment than to harbour any such suspicion.

Ther. The Scriptures are certainly an inexhaustible fund of materials for the most delightful and ennobling discourse. When we consider the author of those sacred books; that they came originally from heaven, were dictated by divine wisdom, have the same consummate excellence as the works of creation; it is really surprising that we are not always searching, by study, by meditation, or converse, into one or other of these grand volumes.

Asp. When Secker preaches, or Murray pleads, the church is crowded and bar thronged. When Spence produces the refinements of criticism, or Young displays the graces of poetry, the press toils, yet is scarcely able to supply the demands of the public. Are we eager to hear, and impatient to purchase, what proceeds from such eloquent tongues and masterly pens? And can we be coldly indifferent, when, not the most accomplished of mankind, not the most exalted of creatures, but the adorable Author of all wisdom, speaks in his revealed word? Strange! that our attention does not hang* upon the venerable accents, and our talk dwell upon the incomparable truths!

Ther. I admire, I must confess, the very language of the Bible. In this, methinks, I discern a conformity between the book of nature and the book of Scripture.

In the book of nature the divine Teacher speaks, not barely to our ears, but to all our senses. And it is very remarkable how he varies his address! Observe his grand and august works. In these he uses the style of majesty. We may call it the true sublime. It strikes with awe, and transports the mind.—View his ordinary operations. Here he descends to a plainer dialect. This may be termed the familiar style. We comprehend it with ease, and attend to it with pleasure.—In the more ornamented parts of the creation, he clothes his meaning with elegance. All is rich and brilliant. We are delighted, we are charmed. And what is this, but the florid style?

* Cicero says, with an air of graceful indignation, "Quasi vero clamor virorum aut tacitos congressus esse oporteat, aut ludicos sermones, aut rerum colloquia leviorum."—Academ. Quest. lib. 4.

† Museum—alluding to a remarkable coincidence in the city of Oxford, distinguished by this name, and appropriated to the reception of curiosities, both natural and artificial, and to the British Museum in London.

* St. Luke, in his evangelical history, uses this beautiful image, "The people hung upon the lips of their all-wise Teacher." Luke xix. 48. Which implies two very strong ideas, an attention that nothing could interrupt, and an eagerness scarcely ever to be satisfied.

— "Pendetque loquentes ab ore.—Virg."

A variety, somewhat similar, runs through the Scriptures. Would you see history in all her simplicity, and all her force, most beautifully easy, yet irresistibly striking? See her, or rather feel her energy, touching the nicest movements of the soul, and triumphing over our passions, in the inimitable narrative of Joseph's life. The representation of Esau's bitter distress, (Gen. xxvii. 30. &c.) the conversation pieces of Jonathan and his gallant friend, (1 Sam. xviii. xix. xx. ;) the memorable journal of the disciples going to Emmaus, (Luke xxiv. 13. &c. ;) are finished models of the impassioned and affecting. Here is nothing studied; no flights of fancy; no embellishments of oratory. Yet how inferior is the episode of Nisus and Euryalus, though worked up by the most masterly hand in the world, to the undissembled artless fervency of these scriptural sketches!*

Are we pleased with the elevation and dignity of an heroic poem, or the tenderness and perplexity of a dramatic performance? In the book of Job they are both united, and both unequalled. Conformably to the exactest rules of art, as the action advances the incidents are more alarming, and the images more magnificent. The language glows, and the pathos swells; till at last the Deity himself makes his entrance. He speaks from the whirlwind, and summons the creation—summons heaven and all its shining host, the elements and their most wonderful productions—to vouch for the wisdom of his providential dispensations. His word strikes terror, and flashes conviction; decides the momentous controversy, and closes the august drama, with all possible solemnity and grandeur.

If we sometimes choose a plaintive strain, such as softens the mind and soothes an agreeable melancholy; are any of the ancient tragedies superior, in the eloquence of mourning, to David's pathetic elegy on his beloved Jonathan, (2 Sam. i. 19, &c.) to his most passionate and inconsolable moan over the lovely but unhappy Absalom; † or

* Let a person of true taste peruse, in a critical view, the two first chapters of St. Luke. He will there find a series of the most surprising incidents related with the greatest simplicity, yet with the utmost majesty. All which, extremely affecting in themselves, are heightened and illuminated by a judicious intermixture of the sublimest pieces of poetry. For my own part, I know not how to characterise them more properly than by Solomon's elegant comparison: "They are as gold rings set with the beryl, or as bright ivory overlaid with sapphires."—Cant. v. 1. 4.

† "The king was vehemently affected, and went up to the chamber and wept; and as he went he said, O my son Absalom! my son, my son Absalom! would to God I had died for thee! O Absalom, my son, my son!" 2 Sam. xviii. 33. Such a picture, and so much pathos; so artless both, and both so exquisite, I must acknowledge, I never met with, among all the representations of dignity in distress. The king's troops had gained a signal victory. His crown and his life were rescued from the most imminent danger. Yet all the honours and all the joys of this successful day were swallowed up and lost in Abto that melodious woe, which warbles and bleeds in every line of Jeremiah's Lamentations.

Would we be entertained with the daring sublimity of Homer, or the correct majesty of Virgil? with the expressive delicacy of Horace, or the rapid excursions of Pindar? Behold them joined, behold them excelled, in the odes of Moses, and the eucharistic hymn of Deborah; in the exalted devotion of the Psalms, and the glorious enthusiasm of the Prophets.

Asp. Only with this difference, that the former are tuneful triflers, and amuse the fancy with empty fiction; the latter are teachers sent from God, and make the soul wise unto salvation. The Bible is not only the brightest ornament, but the most invaluable depositum. On a right, a practical knowledge of these lively oracles, depends the present comfort and the endless felicity of mankind. Whatever, therefore, in study or conversation, has no connexion with their divine contents, may be reckoned among the toys of literature, or the ciphers of discourse.

Ther. Here again the book of Scripture is somewhat like the magazine of nature. What can we desire for our accommodation and delight, which this storehouse of conveniences does not afford? What can we wish for our edification and improvement, which that fund of knowledge does not supply? Of these we may truly affirm, each in its respective kind is "profitable unto all things."

Are we admirers of antiquity?—Here we are led back beyond the universal deluge, and far beyond the date of any other annals. We are introduced among the earliest inhabitants of the earth. We take a view of mankind in their undisguised primitive plainness, when the days of their life were but little short of a thousand years. We are brought acquainted with the original of nations; with the creation of the world; and with the birth of time itself.

Are we delighted with vast achievements? Where is any thing comparable to the miracles in Egypt, and the wonders in the field of Zoan? to the memoirs of the Issalom's death. The news of Absalom's death struck, like a dagger, the afflicted father. He starts from his seat. He hastens into retirement, there to pour out his soul in copious lamentation. But his anguish is too impetuous to bear a moment's restraint. He bursts immediately into a flood of tears, and cries as he goes, "O Absalom," &c.

What says Mezentius, when his son is slain? when, to sharpen his sorrow, the pale corpse, the miserably spectacle is before his eyes, and within his arms! The most pathetic word he utters is,

"Heu! nunc misero mihi demum Exilium infelix, nunc alte vulnus adactum."

How languid is Virgil, how inexpressive the prince of Latin poetry, compared with the royal mourner in Israel? Most evident from this and many other instances, is the superiority of the Scriptures, in copying nature, and painting the passions.

raclites, passing through the depths of the sea, sojourning amidst the inhospitable deserts, and conquering the kingdoms of Canaan? Where shall we meet with instances of martial bravery equal to the prodigious exploits of the Judges; or the adventurous deeds of Jesse's valiant son, and his matchless band of worthies? (2 Sam. xxiii. 8, &c. 1 Chron. xi. 10, &c.) Here we behold the fundamental laws of the universe, sometimes suspended, sometimes reversed; and not only the current of Jordan, but the course of nature controlled. In short, when we enter the field of Scripture, we tread—on enchanted, shall I say? rather, on consecrated ground; where astonishment and awe are awakened at every turn; where is all, more than all, the marvellous of romance, connected with all the precision and sanctity of truth.

If we want maxims of wisdom, or have a taste for the laconic style, how copiously may our wants be supplied, and how delicately our taste gratified! especially in the book of Proverbs, Ecclesiastes, and some of the minor prophets. Here are the most sage lessons of instruction, adapted to every circumstance of life, formed upon the experience of all preceding ages, and perfected by the unerring spirit of inspiration. These delivered with such remarkable conciseness, that one might venture to say, every word is a sentence; at least, every sentence may be called an apophthegm, sparkling with brightness of thought, or weighty with solidity of sense. The whole, like a profusion of pearls, each containing, in a very small compass, a value almost immense, all heaped up (as an ingenious critic speaks) with a confused magnificence, above the little niceties of order.

If we look for the strength of reasoning, and the warmth of exhortation; the insinuating arts of genteel address, or the manly boldness of impartial reproof; all the thunder of the orator, without any of his ostentation; all the politeness of the courtier, without any of his flattery—let us have recourse to the Acts of the Apostles, and to the Epistles of St. Paul.* These are a specimen, or rather these are the standard, of them all.

I do not wonder, therefore, that a taste so refined, and a judgment so correct as Milton's, should discern higher attractives in the volume of inspiration, than in the most celebrated authors of Greece and Rome.

* Another very remarkable instance of propriety in St. Paul's writings is, that though diffuse in the doctrinal, they are concise in the preceptive parts. On the former, it was absolutely necessary to enlarge; on the latter, it is always judicious to be short. The celebrated rule of Horace, "Quicquid precipis, esto brevis," was never more exactly observed, nor more fully exemplified, than by our Apostolic author.

—"Yet not the more
Cease I to wander where the muses haunt,
Clear spring, or shady grove, or sunny hill,
Smit with the love of sacred song; but chief
Thee, Sion, and the flowery banks beneath,
That wash thy hallowed feet, and warbling flow,
Nightly I visit."—

Asp. Another recommendation of the Scriptures is, that they afford the most awful and most amiable manifestations of the Godhead. His glory shines, and his goodness smiles, in those divine pages, with unparalleled lustre. Here we have a satisfactory explanation of our own state. The origin of evil is traced; the cause of all our misery discovered; and the remedy, the infallible remedy, both clearly shown, and freely offered. The merits of the bleeding Jesus lay a firm foundation for all our hopes; while gratitude for his dying love suggests the most winning incitements to every duty. Morality, Theron, your (and let me add, my) admired morality, is delineated in all its branches, is placed upon its proper basis, and raised to its highest elevation. The spirit of God is promised to enlighten the darkness of our understandings, and strengthen the imbecility of our wills. What an ample—Can you indulge me on this favourite topic?

Ther. It is, I assure you, equally pleasing to myself. Your enlargements, therefore, need no apology.

Asp. What ample provision is made, by these blessed books, for all our spiritual wants! And, in this respect, how indisputable is their superiority to all other compositions!

Is any one convinced of guilt, as provoking heaven and ruining the soul? Let him ask reason to point out a means of reconciliation, and a refuge of safety. Reason hesitates as she replies, "The Deity may, perhaps, accept our supplications, and grant forgiveness." But the Scriptures leave us not to the sad uncertainty of conjecture: They speak the language of clear assurance: "God has set forth a propitiation." (Rom. iii. 25.) "He does forgive our iniquities." (Psalm ciii. 3.) "He will remember our sins no more." (Heb. viii. 12.)

Are we assaulted by temptation, or averse to duty? Philosophy may attempt to parry the thrust, or to stir up the reluctant mind, by disclosing the deformity of vice, and urging the fitness of things. Feeble expedients! Just as well calculated to accomplish the ends proposed, as the flimsy fortification of a cobweb to defend us from the ball of a cannon; or as the gentle vibrations of a lady's fan to make a wind-bound navy sail. The Bible recommends no such incompetent succours. "My grace," says its almighty Author, "is sufficient for thee." (2 Cor. xii. 9.) "Sin shall not have dominion over you." (Rom. vi. 14.) The great Jehovah, in whom is everlasting strength, "he worketh in us both to will, and to do, of his good pleasure." (Phil. ii. 13.)

Should we be visited with sickness, or overtaken by any calamity, the consolation which Plato offers is, that such dispensations coincide with the universal plan of divine government. Virgil will tell us, for our relief, that afflictive visitations are, more or less, the unavoidable lot of all men. Another moralist whispers in the dejected sufferer's ear, "Impatience adds to the load; whereas a calm submission renders it more supportable." Does the word of revelation dispense such spiritless and fugitive cordials? No: Those sacred pages inform us, that tribulations are fatherly chastisements, tokens of our Maker's love, and fruits of his care; that they are intended to work in us the peaceable fruits of righteousness, and to work out for us an eternal weight of glory. (2 Cor. iv. 17.)

Should we, under the summons of death, have recourse to the most celebrated comforters of the heathen world, they would increase our apprehensions rather than mitigate our dread. Death is represented by the great master of their schools, as "the most formidable of all evils." They were not able positively to determine whether the soul survived; and never so much as dreamed of the resurrection of the body. Whereas, the book of God strips the monster of his horrors, or turns him into a messenger of peace; gives him an angel's face, and a deliverer's hand; ascertaining to the souls of the righteous an immediate translation into the regions of bliss, and ensuring to their bodies a most advantageous revival at the restoration of all things.

Inestimable book! It heals the maladies of life, and subdues the fear of death. It strikes a lightsome vista through the gloom of the grave, and opens a charming, a glorious prospect of immortality in the heavens.

These, with many other excellencies peculiar to the Scriptures, one would imagine more than sufficient to engage every sensible heart in their favour, and introduce them with the highest esteem into every improved conversation. They had such an effect upon the finest genius, and most accomplished person, that former or latter ages can boast; insomuch that he made, while living, this public declaration, and left it when he died upon everlasting record: "How sweet are thy words unto my taste! yea, sweeter than honey unto my mouth." (Psalm cxix. 103.) "O how love I thy law! it is my meditation all the day." (Psalm cxix. 97.) "Mine eyes prevent the night-watches, that I may be occupied in thy precepts; and I will speak of thy testimonies even before kings."

(Psalm cxix. 46.) If David tasted so much sweetness in a small, and that the least valuable part of the divine word; how much richer is the feast to us, since the Gospel is added to the Law, and the canon of Scripture completed! since (to borrow the words of a prophet) the Lord God "has sealed up the sum;" has put the last hand to his work; and rendered it "full of wisdom, and perfect in beauty." (Ezek. xxviii. 12.)

Ther. Another very distinguishing peculiarity of the sacred writings just occurs to my mind. The method of communicating advice, or administering reproof, by parables. A method which levels itself to the lowest apprehension, without giving offence to the most supercilious temper; yet it is as much superior to plain unornamented precept, as the enlivened scenes of a well-wrought tragedy are more impressive and affecting than a simple narration of the plot.

Our Lord was asked by a student of the Jewish law, "Who is my neighbour?" which implied another question, "How is he to be loved?" The inquirer was conceited of himself, yet ignorant of the truth, and deficient in his duty. Had the wise instructor of mankind abruptly declared, "You neither know the former, nor fulfil the latter," probably the querist would have reddened with indignation, and departed in a rage. Therefore to teach, and not disgust—to convince the man of his error, and not exasperate his mind—the blessed Jesus frames a reply, as amiable in the manner as it was pertinent to the purpose.

A certain person going down from Jerusalem to Jericho, fell among thieves, (Luke x. 30.) Not content to rob him of his treasure, they strip him of his garments, wound him with great barbarity, and leave him half dead. Soon after this calamitous accident, a traveller happens to come along that very road; and what renders him more likely to administer relief, he is one of the sacred order; one who taught others the lovely lessons of humanity and charity, and was therefore under the strongest obligations to exemplify them in his own practice. He just glances an eye upon the deplorable object; sees him stretched on the cold ground, and weltering in his blood; but takes no further notice; nay, to avoid the trouble of an inquiry, passes by on the other side. Scarcely was he departed, when a Levite approaches. This man comes nearer, and looks on the miserable spectacle; takes a leisurely and attentive survey of the case.* And though every gash in the bleeding flesh cried and pleaded for compassion, this minister of the sanctuary neither speaks a word to comfort, nor moves a hand to help. Last comes a Samaritan,* one of the abhorred nation, whom the Jew hated with the most implacable malignity. Though the Levite had neglected an expiring brother; though the priest had withheld his pity from one of the Lord's peculiar people; the very moment the Samaritan sees the unhappy sufferer, he melts into commiseration. He forgets the embittered foe, and considers only the distressed fellow-creature. He springs from his horse, and resolves to intermit his journey. The oil and wine, intended for his own refreshment, he freely converts into healing unguents. He binds up the wounds; sets the disabled stranger upon his own beast; and, with all the assiduity of a servant, with all the tenderness of a brother, conducts him to an inn. There he deposits money for his present use; charges the host to omit nothing that might conduce to the recovery or comfort of his guest; and promises to defray the whole expense of his lodging, his maintenance, and his cure.

* This seems to be the import of ελεων και ιδων, Luke x. 32. This diversifies the idea, and heightens the description, of Jewish inhumanity.

What a lively picture this of the most disinterested and active benevolence! A benevolence which excludes no persons, not even strangers or enemies, from its tender regards; which disdains no condescension, grudges no cost, in its labours of love. Could any method of conviction have been more forcible, and at the same time more pleasing, than the interrogatory proposed by our Lord, and deduced from the story? "Which now of these three, thinkest thou, was neighbour unto him that fell among the thieves?" Or can there be an advice more suitable to the occasion, more important in its nature, or expressed with a more sententious energy, than "Go thou, and do likewise?" In this case, the learner instructs, the delinquent condemns, himself. Bigotry bears away its prejudice; and pride, (when the moral so sweetly, so imperceptibly insinuates,) even pride itself lends a willing ear to admonition.

Asp. It has been very justly remarked, That this eloquence of similitudes is equally affecting to the wise, and intelligible to the ignorant. It shows, rather than relates, the point to be illustrated. It has been admired by the best judges in all ages; but never was carried to its highest perfection, till our Lord spoke the parable of the prodigal, (Luke xv. 11. &c.) which has a beauty that no paraphrase can heighten, a perspicuity that renders all interpretation needless, and a force which every reader not totally insensible must feel.

Ther. The condescension and goodness of God are everywhere conspicuous. In the productions of nature, he conveys to us the most valuable fruits, by the intervention of the loveliest blossoms. Though the present is in itself extremely acceptable, he has given it an additional endearment, by the beauties which array it, or the perfumes which surround it.—In the pages of revelation likewise, he has communicated to us the most glorious truths, adorned with all the graces of composition; such as may polish the man of genius, and improve the man of worth; such as highly delight our imagination, even while they cultivate and refine our morals. So that they really are, as one of their divine authors very elegantly speaks, "like apples of gold in pictures of silver."*

Asp. Who then would not gladly receive that gracious exhortation, "Let the word of Christ dwell in you richly?" (Col. iii. 16.) Who would not willingly obey that benign command, "Thou shalt talk of it when thou sittest in thine house, and when thou walkest by the way; when thou liest down, and when thou risest up?" (Deut. vi. 7.)

When I consider the language of the Scriptures, and sometimes experience their energy on my soul, I am inclined to say, "Other writings, though polished with the nicest touches of art, only tinkle on the ear, or affect us like the shepherd's reed. But these, even amidst all their noble negligence, strike, alarm, transport us somewhat like the voice of thunder, or the archangel's trumpet."

When I consider the contents of the Scriptures, and believe myself interested in the promises they make, and the privileges they confer, I am induced to cry out, "What are all the other books in the world, compared with these invaluable volumes? No more than an entertaining novel, or a few prudential rules for domestic economy, compared with a parent's will, a royal charter, or an imperial grant of titles and manors."

All these circumstances remind me of an encomium most deservedly given to the Bible; which, though quite artless, is, I think, abundantly more expressive than the most elaborate efforts of rhetoric. It came from the lips of a martyr; who, being condemned to die for his inviolable adherence to the doctrines of Scripture, when he arrived at the stake, and had composed himself for his execution, took his final leave in these affecting words; "Farewell sun and moon!

* Prov. xxv. 11.—Theron follows the received translation. I should prefer the expression of Glassius, who supposes מְשֻׁבֵּיתָ בַּסֶּף to signify, "Retiacula argentea, in quibus oculi sunt minutissimi, penetrabiles tamen visu." According to this interpretation, the passage will present us with apples of gold in net-work, or lattice-work of silver; where the fine fruit receives a new charm, by showing itself through the elegant apertures of the silver.

* If this was a parable, we cannot but admire the accuracy of our Lord, both in laying the scene, and selecting the circumstances.

farewell all the beauties of creation, and comforts of life! farewell my honoured friends! farewell my beloved relations! and farewell, thou precious, precious Book of God!"

Aspasio had scarce uttered the last sentence, when a servant came to let them know "supper was upon the table."—Very opportunely, said Theron, has our repeat waited till our conference is ended. We have showed what a large field of delightful speculation the Scriptures open; and what ample materials for the most refined discourse they afford. As nothing can be more ungraceful, than to neglect in our own conduct what we recommend to the practice of others, let us, this very night, begin to ennoble our interviews with these improving subjects,—let us endeavour to make religious conversation, which is in all respects desirable, in some degree fashionable.

DIALOGUE II.

The next morning, when breakfast was over, Theron and Aspasio took a walk into the garden—their spirits cheered, and their imaginations lively—gratitude glowing in their hearts, and the whole creation smiling around them.

The spot adjoining to the house was appropriated to the cultivation of flowers. In a variety of handsome compartments were assembled the choicest beauties of blooming nature. Here the hyacinth hung her silken bells, or the lilies reared their silver pyramids. There stood the neat narcissus, loosely attired in a mantle of snowy lustre; or the splendid ranunculus wore a full-trimmed suit of radiant scarlet. Pinks were rising to enamel the borders; roses were opening to dress the walls; surrounded on all sides with a profusion of beauteous forms, either latent in the stalk, or bursting the buds, or blown into full expansion.

This was bounded by a slight partition, a sort of verdant parapet, through which they descend by an easy flight of steps, and are presented with the elegant simplicity of the kitchen garden. In one place you might see the marigold flowering, or the beans in blossom. In another, the endive curled her leaves, or the lettuce thickened her tufts; cauliflowers sheltered their fair complexion under a green umbrella; while the burrage dishevelled* her locks, and braided them with blooming jewels, of a finer azure than the finest sapphires. On the sunny slopes, the cucumber and melon lay basking in the collected beams. On the raised beds, the artichoke seemed to be erecting a standard, while the asparagus shot* into ranks of spears. The level ground produced all manner of cooling salads and nourishing esculents. Nothing was wanting to furnish out the wholesome luxury of an antediluvian banquet.

Soon a high wall intervenes, through which a wicket opens, and transmits them into the regular and equidistant rows of an orchard. This plantation is so nicely adjusted, that it looks like an arrangement of rural piazzas, or a collection of diversified vistas. The eye is everywhere entertained with the exactest uniformity, and darts with unobstructed ease from the one end of the branching files to the other. On all the boughs lay a lovely evolution of blossoms, arrayed in milky white, or tinged with the softest red. Crowding into one general cluster, without relinquishing any vacant space for leaves, they formed the fairest, the gayest, the grandest alcove that fancy itself can imagine. It is really like the court of the Graces. None can approach it without finding his ideas brightened, and feeling his temper exhilarated.

Contiguous to this correct disposition of things, nature had thrown a wilderness, hoary, grotesque, and magnificently confused. It stretched itself, with a large circular sweep, to the north; and secured both the olitory and the orchard from incommoding winds. Copses of hazel and flowering shrubs filled the lower spaces, while poplars quivered aloft in air, and pines pierced the clouds with their leafy spears. Here grew clumps of fir, clad in everlasting green; there stood groves of oak, that had weathered for ages the wintry storm. Amidst this woody theatre ran a winding walk, lined with elms of insuperable height, whose branches, uniting at the top, reared a stately arch, and projected a solemn shade. It was impossible to enter this lofty labyrinth without being struck with a pleasing dread. As they proceed, every indelction diffuses a deeper gloom, and awakens a more pensive attention.

Having strolled in this darksome avenue without a speck of sunshine, without a glimpse of the heavens, on a sudden they step into open day.—Surprising! cries Aspasio, what a change is this! what delightful enchantment is here!—One instant whelmed in Trephionius' cave,* where horror frowns, and darkness lowers, and solitude reigns : transported the next into the romantic scenes of Arcadia, where all is populous, all is lightsome, and all is gay.—Quick as thought, the arches of heaven expand their azure ; turrets and spires shoot into the skies ; towns, with their spacious edifices, spread themselves to the admiring view. Those lawns, green with freshest herbage ; those fields, rich with undulating corn ; where were they all a moment ago ? —It brings to my mind that remarkable situation of the Jewish lawgiver, when, elevated on the summit of Pisgah, he surveyed the goodly land of promise ; “ surveyed the rivers, the floods, the brooks of honey and butter ;” surveyed “ the mountains dropping with wine, and the hills flowing with milk,” (Job xx. 17. Joel iii. 18.) surveyed all with those eyes, which, for forty tedious years, had been confined to dry sands, ragged rocks, and the irksome wastes of a desolate howling wilderness.

* Alluding, not only to the shape, but also to the growth of this plant, which is so unusually quick, that it may almost be said to start, rather than to rise out of the earth.

† The reader may find a curious account of this cave, together with a very humorous, and (which should always accompany humour, or else it will be like a sting without the honey) an improving description of its effects, in the Spectator, Vol. viii. No. 508, 509.

* Referring to the loose irregular manner of its foliage.

Here they seated themselves on the first mossy hillock which offered its couch. The rising sun had visited the spot, to dry up the dews, and exhale the damps that might endanger health ; to open the violets, and expand the primroses that decked the green. The whole shade of the wood was collected behind them ; and a beautiful, extensive, diversified landscape spread itself before them.

Theron, according to his usual manner, made many improving remarks on the prospect and its furniture. He traced the footsteps of an all-comprehending contrivance, and pointed out the strokes of imitable skill. He observed the grand exertions of power, and the rich exuberance of goodness, most signally, most charmingly conspicuous through the whole.—Upon one circumstance he enlarged with a particular satisfaction.

Ther. See, Aspasio, how all is calculated to administer the highest delight to mankind. Those trees and hedges, which skirt the extremities of the landscape, stealing away from their real bulk, and lessening by gentle diminutions, appear like elegant pictures in miniature. Those which occupy the nearer situations are a set of noble images, swelling upon the eye, in full proportion, and in a variety of graceful attitudes ; both of them ornamenting the several apartments of our common abode, with a mixture of delicacy and grandeur.

The blossoms that array the branches, the flowers that embroider the mead, address and entertain our eyes with every charm of beauty ;* whereas, to other creatures, they are destitute of all those attractions which result from a combination of the loveliest colours and most alluring forms. Yonder streams, that glide with smooth serenity along the valleys, glittering to the distant view like sheets of polished crystal, or soothing the attentive ear with the softness of aquatic murmurs, are no less exhilarating to the fancy than to the soil through which they pass. The huge enormous mountain, the steep and dizzy precipice, the pendent horrors of the craggy promontory, wild and tremendous as they are, furnish out an agreeable entertainment to the human mind, and please even while they terrify ; whereas the beasts take no other notice of those majestic deformities, than only to avoid the dangers they threaten.

Asp. How wonderfully do such considerations exalt our idea of the Creator's goodness, his very distinguishing goodness to mankind ! And should they not proportionably endear that eternal Benefactor to our affections ? His ever-bountiful hand has scattered blessings, and with profuse liberality, among all the ranks of animated existence. But to us he exercises a beneficence of a very superior kind. We are treated as his peculiar favourites. We are admitted to scenes of delight, which none but ourselves are capable of relishing.

Ther. Another remark, though very obvious, is equally important : The destination of all those external things is no less advantageous, than their formation is beautiful. The bloom, which engages the eye with its delicate hues, is cherishing the embryo fruit, and forming within its silken folds the rudiments of a future desert. Those streams, which shine from afar like fluid silver, are much more valuable in their productions, and beneficial in their services, than they are amiable in their appearance. They distribute, as they roll along their winding banks, cleanliness to our houses, and fruitfulness to our lands. They nourish, and at their own expense, a never-failing supply of the finest fish. They visit our cities, and attend our wharfs, as so many public vehicles, ready to set out at all hours.

Those sheep, which give their udders to be drained by the busy frisking lambs, are fattening their flesh for our support ; and while they fill their own fleeces, are providing for our comfortable clothing. Yonder kine—some of which are browsing upon the tender herb, others, satiated with pasturage, ruminant under the shady covert—though conscious of no such design, are concocting, for our use, one of the —Nay, the very “ wilderness, even the Gentile nations, being converted unto Christ, “ shall blossom as a rose, Isa. xxxv. 1.—“ I will be as the dew unto Israel ; he shall blossom as the lily, and cast forth his roots as Lebanon : Hos. xiv. 5. What an elegant picture ! and what a comfortable promise !

* Therefore, when the prophet describes the Christian church, adorned with all the “ beauties of holiness,” he borrows his imagery from these amiable objects ; “ Israel shall bud and blossom ;” Isa. xxvii. 6.

softest, purest, healthiest liquors in the world. The bees that fly humming about our seat, and pursue their work on the fragrant blossoms, are collecting balm and sweetness, to compose the richest of syrups; which, though the produce of their toil, is intended for our good.

Nature, and her whole family, are our obsequious servants, our ever-active labourers. They bring the fruits of their united industry, and pour them into our lap, or deposit them in our store-rooms.

Asp. Who can ever sufficiently admire this immense benignity?—The supreme Disposer of events has commanded delight and profit to walk hand in hand through his ample creation; making all things so perfectly pleasing, as if beauty was their only end; yet all things so eminently serviceable, as if usefulness had been their sole design. And, as a most winning invitation to our gratitude, he has rendered man the centre, in which all the emanations of his beneficence, diffused through this terrestrial system, finally terminate.

But, my dear Theron, is not this apparent, in a much more wonderful manner, throughout the whole economy of redemption? It were a small thing for this inferior class of unintelligent creatures, to be continually employing themselves for our benefit. Even the Son of the most high God, through all his incarnate state acted the very same part. He took flesh, and bore the infirmities of human nature, not for himself, but for us men, and our salvation. He suffered want, and endured misery in all its forms, that we might possess the fulness of joy, and abound in pleasures for evermore. When he poured out his soul in agonies, under the curse of an avenging law, was it not with a compassionate view to make us partakers of eternal blessedness? When he fulfilled, perfectly fulfilled the whole commanding law, was it not for this gracious purpose that his merits might be imputed to us, that we by his obedience might be made righteous? Yes;

—“For us he liv'd, Toil'd for our ease, and for our safety bled.”

Nothing in the whole course—

Ther. Pardon me for interrupting you, Aspasio. I have no objection to the general drift of your discourse; but that particular notion of imputed righteousness has always appeared to me in a very ridiculous light. And I must say, that such a puritanical nostrum makes a very unbecoming figure amongst your other manly and correct sentiments of religion.

Asp. You know, Theron, I have long ago disavowed that ignoble prejudice, which rejects doctrines, or despises persons, because they happen to be branded with contemptible names. It is true the writers styled Puritans, are remarkable for their attachment to this peculiarity of the gospel. It runs through all their theological works, and very eminently distinguishes them from the generality of our modern treatises. But must it therefore be wrong, because maintained by that particular set of people? Or, are they only advocates for this important truth?

Ther. Ay; it is as I suspected. I have lately conjectured, from several hints in my Aspasio's discourse, that he has been warping to the low ungentleman-like peculiarities of those whimsical fanatics.

Asp. I cannot conceive why you should call them whimsical. To settle faith on its proper basis—the meritorious righteousness of the Redeemer; and to deduce from its true origin—the love of God shed abroad in the heart; to search the conscience, and convince the judgment; to awaken the lethargic, and comfort the afflicted soul; and all from a thorough knowledge, joined to a masterly application, of the divine word;—these, sure, are not whimsical talents, but real excellencies. Yet these, if we may credit history, entered into the preaching; these, if we will examine impartially, are to be found in the writings of the Puritans.—And a pearl, you will please to remember, is a pearl still, though it should hang in the Ethiopian's ear.

Ther. Ethiopian indeed! You have truly characterised that demure and gloomy generation. I hope you do not intend to introduce their affected solemnity and forbidden reserve, into your own easy and engaging conversation. Though, for aught I can judge, this would be no more ungraceful, than to patch such antiquated notions on the refined scheme of Christianity.

Asp. My dear friend, you are too ludicrous; and I begin to catch the infection. We had better return to our first topic. Let us contemplate the wonders of creation, and as we admire the works, learn to adore the Maker.

Ther. None of your evasions, good Aspasio. You must not think to put me off at this rate. I have wanted an opportunity to rally you upon this head, and to argue or laugh you out of these religious oddities.

Asp. If you will not agree to terms of peace, I hope you will allow some cessation of arms. At least till I can muster my forces, and prepare for the vindication of my principles.

Ther. No; upon the spot, and out of hand, you are required to answer for yourself, and these same queer opinions.—I shall serve you as the Roman consul served the procrastinating monarch. When he demurred about his reply to the demands of the senate, and said, “he would consider of the matter ;" the resolute ambassador drew a circle round him with his cane, and insisted upon a positive answer, before he stepped over those limits.

Asp. This, however, you will give me leave to observe, that the affair is of a very serious nature. Upon condition that you will dismiss your flourishes of wit, and strokes of satire, I will acquaint you with the reasons which have made me a thorough convert to this doctrine. Once I held it in the utmost contempt, and pitied the simplicity of (as I then styled them) its deluded admirers. But I am now become such a fool, that I may be truly wise and substantially happy. I have seen my ruined state, and I bless God for this sovereign restorative. It is the source of my strongest consolations, and the very foundation of my eternal hopes.

Ther. Excuse me, Aspasio, if the vivacity of my temper, and he seemingly uncouth tenet, kindled me into a more humorous gaiety than became the occasion. You speak of the point with so much seriousness, and in such weighty terms, as check my levity, and command my respect. Be pleased to execute what you have promised, and the most engaged attention of my mind shall atone for the petulant sallies of my tongue.

Asp. To conceive a dislike of any doctrine, only because persons of a particular denomination have been very officious to promote its reception ; this is hardly consistent with an impartial inquiry after truth.

Ther. I grant it, Aspasio. And I should be ashamed of my opposition, if it was founded on so slight a bottom. But, abstracted from all party considerations, I can see nothing in this supposed article of our faith that may recommend it to the unprejudiced inquirer. What can be more awkward than the term, or more irrational than the sentiment ?

Asp. The word imputed, when used in this connexion, may possibly convey a disagreeable sound to the ears of some people, because they look upon it as the peculiar phraseology of a few super-titious sectarists, and reject it merely on the foot of that unreasonable surmise.—But how can you be disgusted at the expression, Theron, who have so often read it in the most approved and judicious writers ? St. Paul, who might affirm with relation to his epistles, much more truly than the painter concerning his portraits, " I write for eternity,"* scruples not to use this awkward language several times in the same chapter.† Milton, the correctness of whose taste, and the propriety of whose style, no person of genius will ever question, delights to copy, in various parts of his incomparable poem, the Apostle's diction. Authorized by such precedents, it is superior to cavil, and warranted beyond all exception.

As to the sentiment, I take it to be the very fundamental article of the gospel ; and I believe, whoever is acquainted with ecclesiastical history will allow that it bore the principal sway in extricating us from popish darkness, and introducing the Reformation. What says our Lord, with regard to the love of God and the love of our neighbour ? " On these two commandments hang all the law and the prophets." Much the same would I venture to say concerning the imputation of our sins to Christ, and the imputation of Christ's righteousness to us : On these two doctrines hang all the privileges and the whole glory of the gospel.

Ther. In our last conversation, I must own, I saw a strong resemblance between the works and the word of God. But I never observed any thing in nature that bore the least analogy to imputed sin or imputed righteousness. To me your two doctrines seem very unaccountable and irrational.

Asp. That our sins should be charged upon the only begotten Son of God, and that his righteousness should be made over to sinful worms, is strange, exceeding strange. The Psalmist calls it, " marvellous loving kindness," (Psal. xvii. 7.) The Apostle styles it, " love that passeth knowledge," (Eph. iii. 19.) And it has sometimes, I must freely confess, been almost ready to stagger my belief. However, I have found myself relieved in this perplexity, not only by the testimonies of Scripture, but even from the contemplation of nature. All nature is full of strange and mysterious effects, consequently, is a voucher for the mysterious truths of Christianity.

How surprising are the experiments of electricity, and the occult qualities of the loadstone ! How surprising those countless legions of effluvia which transpire from a small odoriferous body ! and those infinite myriads of luminous particles, which issue from a smaller flaming substance !* There is not a blade of grass, but surpasses the comprehension of all mankind : and not a single atom, but is big with wonders ; inso-much, that the intelligent observer can nowhere fix his thoughts, without being astonished, transported, and even lost in admiration.

* Alluding to the painter, who, apologizing for the slow procedure and scrupulously nice touches of his pencil, said, Μετρητάίς πινω, " I paint for eternity."

† See Cor. iv. in which single chapter, some branch of the word λογιζόμεθα, " to be imputed," occurs no less than ten or eleven times.

* Dr. Nieuwentyt has computed, that from a lighted candle, about the size of six to the pound, there issues, in the second of a minute, an effusion of particles, vastly more than the number of sands which the whole globe of the earth contains.

Since the procedure of Providence in this visible system is a continued series of stupendous and unsearchable operations; need we be alarmed, can we reasonably be offended, if the scheme of redemption is equally stupendous, is far more amazing? Yet, though amazing, I hope it will not appear, what you was pleased to insinuate, irrational.

Suppose we state the signification of the terms, and adjust the boundaries of our subject, before we enter upon a survey of its contents?

Ther. Such a caution would have prevented, at least have shortened, many a vehement and tedious controversy.—You see, on yonder heath, the preparations for an approaching race. There stand the posts which are to mark out the limits of the course. Without this previous restrictive care, how irregular would be the excursions of the contending steeds! How difficult, rather how impossible, to declare the conqueror and award the prize!—A clear definition of terms seems equally necessary for candid disputants. Without it, they may wrangle for ages, and never come to a determination.

Asp. Justification is an act of God Almighty's grace; whereby he acquits his people from guilt, and accounts them righteous,* for the sake of Christ's righteousness, which was wrought out for them, and is imputed to them.

Ther. Two of your terms want some further explication. What do you understand by Christ's righteousness? And what is the meaning of imputed?

Asp. By Christ's righteousness, I understand the whole of his active and passive obedience; springing from the perfect holiness of his heart, continued through the whole progress of his life, and extending to the very last pang of his death.—By the word imputed, I would signify, that this righteousness, though performed by our Lord, is placed to our account; is reckoned or adjudged by God as our own. Inasmuch, that we may plead it, and rely on it, for the pardon of our sins, for adoption into his family, and for the enjoyment of life eternal.—Shall I illustrate my meaning by a well-attested fact?

Ther. Nothing gives us so easy a conception of any difficult point, as this method of explaining by parallel facts, or proper similitudes.

Asp. I do not say the case is parallel.—I only produce it, to aid our conceptions.—Onesimus, you know, was Philemon's slave. †

* Should any reader object to the definition, apprehending, that justification implies no more than the pardon of sins, I would desire him to suspend his judgment till he has perused Dialogue X. where this point is more circumstantially considered.

† See the Epistle to Philemon.

He had perfidiously deserted his master's service, and still more perfidiously stole his goods. The fugitive, in his guilty rambles, providentially meets with St. Paul. He is charmed and captivated with that gracious gospel, which proclaims mercy even for the vilest of sinners. He becomes a thorough convert to the religion of Jesus, and is received into the spiritual patronage of the apostle; who, learning his dishonest conduct and obnoxious state, undertakes to bring about a reconciliation with his offended master; dispatches him, for this purpose, with a letter to Philemon; and, amongst other persuasives, writes thus in the poor criminal's behalf: "If he hath wronged thee, or oweth thee ought, put that on mine account; I Paul have written it with mine own hand; I will repay it." That which the zealous preacher of Christianity offered, the adored Author of Christianity executed.—We had revolted from the Lord of all lords, and broke his holy commandments. The Son of God, infinitely compassionate, vouchsafes to become our Mediator. That nothing might be wanting to render his mediation successful, he places himself in our stead. The punishment which we deserved, he endures: The obedience which we owed, he fulfils.—Both which, being imputed to us, and accepted for us, are the foundation of our pardon, are the procuring cause of our justification.

Ther. Is this the exact signification of the original word, which we translate imputed?

Asp. In the book of Numbers we meet with this phrase; and in such a connexion, as clears up its meaning. Jehovah enacts a decree concerning the Levites, who had no vintages to gather, nor any harvests to reap. He directs them to present the tenth part of their tithes, in the form of a heave-offering; adding, "and this your heave-offering" shall be reckoned* unto you, "as though it were the corn of the threshing-floor, and as the fulness of the wine-press;" as satisfactory to me, and as beneficial to you, as if it was the tenth of your own labours, and the tithe of your own increase. So the expiatory sufferings which Christ endured, the complete obedience which he performed, are reckoned to true believers; and are altogether as effectual for obtaining their salvation, as if they were their own personal qualifications.

Ther. The imputation mentioned in your

* Num. xviii. 27. וְנִתְּנָה exactly answers to St. Paul's ελογισθη, Rom. iv. 9. The same phrase is used, and the same doctrine taught, Lev. xvii. 3, 4. Thus also saith the eternal Judge concerning the believers in Christ; "The righteousness of my Son is imputed to them: they are, in the eye of my justice, righteous: they shall be dealt with as righteous persons, and made partakers of the kingdom of heaven.

passage, is the imputation of something done by the Levites themselves, not of something done by another. This, I apprehend, is the true import of the word, when it occurs affirmatively in Scripture.

Asp. This is always the import,—should have been said, in order to make the objection forcible. But you could not so soon forget the instance just now alleged. St. Paul, speaking of the crimes which Onesimus had committed, and of the injuries which Philemon had sustained, says, “Charge them all on me; I will be responsible for the one and for the other, as much as if the whole guilt had been of my own contracting.”—Here is supposed, not the imputation of something done by the apostle himself, but of another’s criminal behaviour.

Under the law, Aaron is commanded to “put the iniquities of Israel upon the scape-goat,” Lev. xv. 21.—The same sentiment is reiterated, when the goat is said to “bear the iniquities of the people,” Lev. xvi. 22. This was plainly an imputation, yet could not possibly be the imputation of any thing done by the devoted animal. The effects which took place upon the execution of this ordinance, indicate a translation of guilt: For the congregation was cleansed, but the goat polluted. The congregation so cleansed, that their iniquities were conveyed away, and to be found no more; the goat so polluted, that it communicated defilement to the person who conducted it into the land not inhabited. All this was God’s own appointment, and designed, like the whole system of Mosaic ceremonies, to instruct his church in the knowledge of the great Mediator; in whose person and office that was done really, which elsewhere could be accomplished no otherwise than typically.

Ther. If this is your meaning, Aspasio, I am apt to think it will be a difficult matter to make me a proselyte. I must be content to pass for one of the stiff-necked generation, since I can see neither wisdom nor equity in ascribing to a person what he has not, or imputing to him what he does not.

Asp. It was not Aspasio, but his friend, who set out with a view of making proselytes. If I can maintain my ground, and vindicate my own belief, it will be no inconsiderable acquisition. However, I shall not despair of seeing the partner of my heart become a sharer of my faith. When we are convinced of our numberless sins, when we feel the depravity of our nature, and begin to discern the inconceivable sanctity of our Judge; then, perhaps, this exploded article may be found worthy of acceptance, its constitution admired as the wisdom of God, and its privilege coveted as the consolation of our souls.

Ther. I shall wave at present an examination of each particular, and only make some remote observations, which seem, nevertheless, pretty nearly to affect your scheme. Some persons, I dare be positive, have not so much as heard of your terms; many persons have no manner of acquaintance with your doctrine: Will you strike off all these from the list of Christians? will you condemn all these as desperate infidels?

Asp. Not heard of them! in a Protestant nation! where the gospel is publicly preached, and the Bible in every one’s hand! This, if true, is much to be lamented.

In answer to your question:—It is not my custom, much less is it my prerogative, to condemn others. Has God committed all judgment unto me, that I should presume to anticipate the decisive sentence, or launch the thunderbolts of eternal vengeance? Neither do I affirm the condition of such persons to be desperate. There may be those who have no explicit knowledge of the doctrine, who are even prejudiced against the expressions, yet live under the belief of the truth, and in the exercise of the duty. “They are never diverted, by the splendour of any thing that is great, or by the conceit of any thing that is good in them, from looking upon themselves as sinful dust and ashes.” Their whole dependence is upon that just One, who expired on the cross, and whom the heavens have received. They seek the sanctifying Spirit, in consequence of their Saviour’s death, and give all diligence to “add to their faith virtue,” (2 Pet. i. 5.)

Ther. If people may be safe, and their eternal interests secure, without any knowledge of these particularities, why should you offer to puzzle their heads about a few unnecessary scholastic terms?

Asp. Scriptural terms you should have said, Theron. However, we are not very solicitous as to the credit, or the use, of any particular set of phrases. Only let men be humbled as repenting criminals, at the Redeemer’s feet; let them rely, as devoted pensioners, on his precious merits; and they are undoubtedly in the way to a blissful immortality. Yet will their way be less clear, and their steps more embarrassed, by not distinctly understanding the benign genius of the gospel. A proper information in this important point would shed light upon their paths, and encourage them in their journey; would further their progress in vital holiness, and increase their joy in the Lord.

Ther. The followers of your opinion, I have observed, are perpetually dwelling upon this one favourite topic, to the exclusion of that grand and truly essential part of Christianity—sanctification.

Asp. If you have ever taken notice of such a conduct, you are unquestionably right in withholding your approbation. It is a manifest incongruity, and deserves your censure. But, assure yourself, it proceeds from a misapprehension in the persons, and has no connexion with the nature of the doctrine.

I am far, very far, from reducing the various parts of Christianity (which when connected make up so well-proportioned a system) to this single, however, distinguished branch. Sanctification is equally necessary, both to our present peace and to our final felicity. Indeed they are as reciprocally necessary for the purposes of intellectual and eternal happiness, as the heart and the lungs are to the subsistence of the animal economy. The former must transmit, the latter must refine, the vital fluid; or else disease will take place, and death will ensue. My intention is, that those fundamental truths of the gospel, like these master organs of the body, may have each its proper office assigned; each concur to support the better health, and to promote the spiritual growth, of the Christian.

Ther. Other of your zealous folks I have known, who are all for the sanctifying influence of the Spirit, and reckon this affiance on the Saviour's merits among the beggarly elements of religion. They scarce ever mention what Christ has done for us, but insist wholly upon what he does in us. When the religious people are so divided among themselves,* how can a stranger act? which opinion shall he choose?

Asp. Which, Theron! Let him discard neither, but associate both. If the all-gracious Redeemer has poured out his blood on the cross, that my guilt may be expiated; and presents his intercession in heaven, that I may be endued with the Spirit; if he will be the meritorious cause of my justification, and the operative principle of my sanctification, why should I scruple to receive him, in either, in both capacities! Who would lop off the right hand, in order to impart the higher dignity, or the greater importance to the left? I would be no partialist in Christianity; neither diminish her dowry, nor mutilate her privileges.

Ther. You seem, if not to mutilate, yet to split the merits of Christ, and parcel out the efficacy of his mediatorial undertaking; ascribing so much to his active, and so much to his passive righteousness; pardon to this, and life to that.

Asp. Some, perhaps, may be pleased with this way of stating the matter. But it is a method which I neither attempt to defend, nor wish to imitate. To distinguish between the active and passive righteousness, I think is not amiss; because this sets the fulness of our Lord's merit in the clearest light, and gives the completest honour to God's holy law. But to divide them into detached portions, independent on each other, seems to be fanciful, rather than judicious. For, had either part of the mediatorial obedience been wanting, I apprehend neither pardon, nor acceptance, nor any spiritual blessing, could have been vouchsafed to fallen man.

The two parts are inseparable; making, in their connexion, a necessary and noble whole for the accomplishment of our salvation; just as the light and the heat of yonder sun blend their operation, to produce this delightful day, and this fruitful weather. However, therefore, I may happen to express myself, I never consider them as acting in the exclusive sense; but would always have them understood as a grand and glorious aggregate; looking upon our Saviour's universal obedience, which commenced at his incarnation, was carried on through his life, and terminated in his death—looking upon all this, in its collective form, as the object of my faith, and the foundation of my hopes.*

Ther. I think, you lay too much stress upon this controverted, and perhaps merely speculative point.

Asp. Merely speculative! Say not thus, my dear friend. "How I may be justified before God, my Maker, my Governor, and my Judge," is an inquiry, of all others, the most interesting and important. It is the main hinge on which every instance of practical religion turns. True comfort, willing obedience, holy communion with the divine Majesty, all depend upon this capital point.

Far from being a merely speculative point, it ascribes the most undivided glory to the ever-blessed God and his free grace: It administers the most serene and substantial satisfactions to frail, but believing men. It cherishes, with the most kindly influence, that pure and undefiled religion, which has its seat in the heart, has its birth from love, and is a real antepast, both of the busi-

* Theron's inquiry concerning these two particulars is sometimes made an objection against all religion. But have those who adopt this objection never seen naturalists divided in their judgment, with relation to the design and use of several appearances in the material, the vegetable, the animal creation, while one decries as a nuisance what another admires as a beauty? Yet no one, I believe, ever took it into his head, from such a diversity of opinions, to doubt whether the frame of nature is a just, a regular, and a finished system; or to deny, that power, goodness, and wisdom, support, pervade, and direct the whole.

* In this opinion Aspasio has Milton's archangel for his precedent, Michael, speaking of his Lord and our Lord, says,

The law of God exact he shall fulfil
Both by obedience and by love: though love
Alone fulfil the law: thy punishment
He shall endure, by coming in the flesh
To a reproachful life and cursed death;
Proclaiming life to all who shall believe

In his redemption.—B. xii. l. 402.
According to the tenor of these very valuable lines, our Lord's fulfilling the law, and enduring the punishment, are the concurring causes, or the one compound cause of life and redemption to sinners.

ness and the bliss of saints in light. Can we, then, lay too much stress upon a doctrine so greatly momentous, upon a privilege so extensively beneficial?

Ther. When all this is proved, then for my reply, Aspasio. Nay, then you shall have more than a reply; I promise you my cordial assent.

Asp. And if all this be incapable of proof, I assure you, Theron, I will not solicit your assent. Nay more, I will revoke and renounce my own.

Ther. At present, I believe, we must go in, and prepare for our visitants. Some other interview will give us an opportunity to canvass this question more minutely.

Asp. Though I have never much inclination, even when there is the most leisure, for controversy, yet, if you insist upon it, I shall not absolutely refuse to engage in a debate with my Theron, because he will come to the amicable rencounter, without bringing angry passions for his second. My reasons will be impartially weighed, not artfully eluded, much less answered with invective. If some inadvertent expression should drop from my lips, he will not rigorously prosecute the slip; nor aggravate an unguarded sentence into the crime of heresy. Candour will form his judgment, and good nature dictate his expressions.

Ther. I thank you, my dear Aspasio, for your genteel admonition. What I am in the language of complaisance, means what I should be. Well; I shall endeavour to take your hint, and check this my impetuosity of spirit. I have admired, O that I could imitate! the beautiful example of St. Paul. When Festus, forgetting the dignity of the governor, and the politeness of the gentleman, uttered that indecent reflection, "Paul, thou art beside thyself; much learning doth make thee mad;" did the great preacher of Christianity kindle into resentment? The charge was unjust and abusive. But the apostle, with the most perfect command of himself, returned the softest, yet the most spirited answer imaginable. "I am not mad, most noble Festus; but speak the words of truth and soberness." Inexpressibly graceful was this calm and obliging reply. Though short, infinitely more convincing than a whole torrent of bitter or recriminating words. It disarmed the judge of his rising displeasure; it conciliated the favour of his royal assessor: and brought honour to the Christian cause.

This amiable self-regimen, and moderation of temper, I shall be sure to see exemplified in my friend's conversation, however I may fail of it myself, or be proof against all his arguments.

Asp. Ah! Theron, we want no monitor to remind us of our supposed excellencies. And if you begin with your compliments, it is time to put an end to our discourse.

Only let me just observe, that divine truths cannot be properly discerned but by the enlightening influences of the divine Spirit. We must address ourselves to this inquiry not only with unprejudiced minds, but likewise with praying hearts. We must bring to this dispute, not barely the quiver of logic, but that "unction from the Holy One which may teach us all things," (1 John ii. 20, 27.) Let us then adopt the poet's aspiration:

—Thou celestial Light,
Shine inward, and the mind through all her powers Irradiate; there plant eyes; all mist from thence Purge and disperse! Milton, B. iii. l. 51.

DIALOGUE III.

Ther. We are now, Aspasio, about two miles distant from my house. The horse-road lies through a narrow, dusty lane. The foot-path leads along a spacious pleasant meadow. Suppose we deliver our horses to the servant, and walk the remainder of the way?

Asp. You could not make a proposal more agreeable to my inclination; especially as the air is become cool, and the walk is so inviting.

What a magnificent and charming scene! hills on either side, gently rising, and widely spreading; their summits crowned with scattered villages, and clustering trees: their slopes divided into a beauteous chequer-work; consisting partly of tillage, with its waving crops, partly of pasturage, with its grazing herds. Before us, the trefoil, the clover, and a variety of grassy plants, differently bladed, and differently branched, weave themselves into a carpet of living green. Can any of the manufactures formed in the looms, or extended in the palaces of Persia, vie with it, in grandeur of size, or delicacy of decoration?

What a profusion of the gayest flowers, fringing the banks, and embroidering the plain!

—Nature here
Wants, as in her prime, and plays at will
Her virgin fancies, pouring forth more sweet,
Wild above rule or art, enormous bliss!
Milton, B. v.

* See Acts xxvi. 24, 25, where we have an apology, the most delicate, and most masterly, perhaps, that ever was made; eminent for fine address, clear reasoning, and important truth. Which, notwithstanding all these very superior recommendations, is deemed madness; and that by a nobleman from Rome; the seat of science, and fountain-head of polite literature. A proof this, no less demonstrative than deplorable, of the apostles' assertion: "The natural man, however ingenious or accomplished, receiveth not the things of the spirit of God; for they are foolishness unto him." 1 Cor. ii. 14.

Nothing can be brighter than the lustre of those silver daisies, nothing deeper than the tinge of those golden crowfoots; yet both seem to acquire additional beauty, by succeeding to the deformity of winter, and flourishing amidst so much surrounding verdure.

Ther. Nature is truly in her prime. The vegetable tribes are putting on their richest attire. Those chesnuts, on our right hand, begin to rear their flowering pyramids; those willows, on our left, are tip with tassels of grey; and yonder poplars, which overlook the river, and seem to command the meadows, are pointed with rolls of silver.

The hawthorn, in every hedge, is partly turgid with silken gems, partly dissolved into a milk-white bloom: Not a straggling furze, nor a solitary thicket, but wears a rural nosegay. All is a delightful display of present fertility, and a joyous pledge of future plenty. Now we experience what the royal poet, in very delicate imagery, describes: "The winter is past; the rain is over and gone. The flowers appear on the earth; the time of the singing of birds is come; and the voice of the turtle is heard in our land. The fig-tree putteth forth her green figs; and the vine, with the tender grapes, give a good smell;" (Cant. ii. 11, 12, 13.)

Asp. Your quotation and the scene remind me of a remark, which should have taken place in our last night's discourse. When we were enumerating the excellencies of the sacred writings, methinks we might have added,—Are you fond of pastoral, in all its flowery graces, and blooming honours? Never have we seen such exquisite touches of rural painting, or such sweet images of endeared affection, as in the "Song of songs, which is Solomon's." All the brilliant and amiable appearances in nature are employed, to delineate the tenderness of his heart, who is love itself; to portray the beauty of his person, who is the chiefest among ten thousand; and describe the happiness of those souls, whose "fellowship is with the Father, and with his Son Jesus Christ;" (1 John i. 3.)

See, Theron, what the cheering warmth and the genial showers of spring have done! Such a change, so pleasing and so ennobling, the gospel of Christ introduces into the soul. Not a day, scarce an hour passes, but this season of universal fecundity produces something new. And is there any state, or any circumstance of life, on which the faith of Christ does not exert a similar efficacy, and bring forth fruit unto God?

This is supposed to be the spiritual meaning of that fine descriptive picture which you have borrowed from the Canticles. It displays the benign agency of grace and its doctrines, especially of our Lord's satisfaction for sin, and of his righteousness imputed to sinners. These operate with much the same favourable and happy energy, both on our morals and our comforts, as the sweet influences of the vernal sun operate on the sprouting herbs and opening flowers.

Ther. If such were the effects of your doctrine, it would stand the fairer chance for general acceptance. But there are several weighty scruples to be removed, before persons of a liberal and enlarged way of thinking can acquiesce in your opinion. Who, for instance, can persuade himself, that what you call the satisfaction of Christ is consistent with the dictates of reason, or with the perfections of the Deity?

Asp. Let gentlemen be candid in their inquiries, and truly liberal in their way of thinking; then, I flatter myself, these scruples may be removed without much difficulty.

God, the almighty Creator and supreme Governor of the world, having made man, gave him a law, with a penalty annexed in case of disobedience. This sacred law our forefather Adam presumptuously broke; and we, his posterity, were involved in his guilt. Or, should that point be controverted, we have undeniably made, by many personal transgressions, his apostacy our own; inasmuch that all have sinned, have forfeited their happiness, and rendered themselves obnoxious to punishment.

Man being thus ruined, none could recover him, except his injured Maker. But shall he be recovered, shall he be restored, without suffering the punishment due to his crime, and threatened by his Creator? What then will become of the justice of the divine Lawgiver? and how shall the honour of his holy law be maintained? At this rate, who would reverence its authority, or fear to violate its precepts?

Sinners might be emboldened to multiply their transgressions, and tempted to think, that the God of immaculate holiness, the God of unchangeable veracity, is "altogether such an one as themselves."*

Does it not appear needful, that some expedient be devised, in order to prevent these dishonourable and horrid consequences?

Ther. Proceed to inform us what the expedient is.

Asp. To ascertain the dignity of the supreme administration, yet rescue mankind from utter destruction, this admirable purpose was formed, and in the fulness of time executed. The second person of the ever-blessed Trinity unites the human nature to the divine, submits himself to the obligations of his people, and becomes responsible for all their guilt. In this capacity he performs a perfect obedience, and undergoes the sentence of death; makes a full expiation of their sins, and establishes their title to life. By which means the law is satisfied, justice is magnified, and the richest grace exercised. Man enjoys a great salvation, not to the discredit of any, but to the unspeakable glory of all, the divine attributes.

* This was actually the case, as we are informed by the Searcher of hearts, when, on a particular occasion, punishment was only retarded. How much more would such impious opinions have prevailed, if on this grand act of disobedience, punishment had been entirely forborne? Psal. l. 21.

This is what we mean by Christ's satisfaction. And this, I should imagine, wants no recommendation to our unprejudiced reason; as I am sure it is most delightfully accommodated to our distressed condition. It is also confirmed by many express passages of Scripture, and illustrated by a variety of very significant images.

Ther. Pray, let me be favoured with some of your scriptural images. After which we may inquire, whether your doctrine will stand the test of reason.

Asp. What is your notion of a ransom? When Priam redeemed the dead body of Hector from the victorious Achilles, how was it done?

Ther. By paying a price. Thus Fabius recovered the captives which were taken by Hamibal. He transmitted the sum required, and they were discharged from their confinement.

Asp. Such is the redemption procured for sinners by our Lord Jesus Christ. Of such a nature, (though incomparably more grand and august in all its circumstances,) and expressed by the very same word, "The Son of man came not to be ministered unto, but to minister; and to give his life a ransom for many."

Christ also paid a price, a real price, a most satisfactory price; in consideration of which, our freedom from every penal evil is granted. "Ye are redeemed,"* says the apostle, "not with corruptible things, as silver and gold, but with the precious blood of Christ." Let me add one text more, which, in the same style of commutative justice, asserts the same truth: "Christ has redeemed us,"† hath bought us off, "from the curse of the law," (Gal. iii. 13.) Yes, my friend,

Ther. Hold a little, good Aspasio. Consider the consequence of what you maintain. If there was a ransom in the case, to whom was it paid? The devil had led sinners captive. They are said to be the slaves of Satan. And shall the blessed Jesus pay his life to that accursed fiend? Shocking to imagine! Yet, shocking as it is, it must follow from your own and your poet's assertion.

Asp. You misapprehend the case, Theron. The ransom was paid to God. "Thou hast redeemed us to God," (Rev. v. 9.) is the confession of the saints in light. Satisfaction was made to the divine law, and to the divine justice; the one of which was offended, the other violated, and both concurred to denounce the transgressor's doom; of which doom Satan was only the destined executioner, whose malignity, and implacable rage, God is pleased to make the instrument of inflicting his vengeance, as he formerly used the idolatrous kings of Assyria and Babylon to chastise the disobedient Israelites.

"When we were without strength," (Rom. v. 6.) utterly ruined, yet absolutely helpless; when none, in heaven or earth, could afford us any succour; then our Lord Jesus Christ most graciously and most seasonably interposed. He said, as it is very emphatically represented by Elihu, "Deliver them from going down into the pit; I have found a ransom," (Job. xxxiii. 24.) He did what is very beautifully described by our English classic:

———Saviour, as is most just,
Shall satisfy for man, be judged and die;
And dying rise, and rising with him raise
His brethren, ransom'd with his own dear life.
MILTON.

Ther. But pray, do not you allow that Christ is truly and properly God?

Asp. We not only allow it, but we insist upon it, and make our boast of it. This is the very foundation of his merit, and the support of our hope.

Ther. This may aggrandize the merit of Christ, but it will increase the difficulty of your task. For, according to this opinion, Christ must make satisfaction to himself. And is not this a practice quite unprecedented? a notion perfectly absurd?

Asp. It is quite unprecedented, you say. On this point I shall not vehemently contend. Only let me mention one instance. Zaleucus, you know, the prince of the Locrians, made a decree, that whoever was convicted of adultery, should be punished with the loss of both his eyes. Soon after this establishment, the legislator's own son was apprehended in the very fact, and brought to a public trial. How could the father acquit himself in so tender and delicate a conjuncture? Should he execute the

The ransom was paid down. The fund of heav'n, Heav'n's inexhaustible exhausted fund,
Amazing and amaz'd, pour'd forth the price,
All price beyond. Though curious to compute,
Archangels fail'd to cast the mighty sum.
Night Thoughts, No. IV.

* 1 Pet. i. 18. We have an equivalent expression, used in the same signification, by one of the correctest writers in the world.

† Gal. iii. 13.—We are said to be bought, 1 Cor. vi. 20, not in a metaphorical sense, but really and properly, for here the price is mentioned, and by St. Peter the price is specified. 1 Pet. i. 13, 19.

law in all its rigour, this would be worse than death to the unhappy youth: Should he pardon so notorious a delinquent, this would defeat the design of his salutary institution. To avoid both these inconveniences, he ordered one of his own eyes to be pulled out, and one of his son's, by which means the rights of justice were preserved inviolate, yet the tenderness of a parent was remarkably indulged: And may we not venture to say, that in this case, Zaleucus both received and made the satisfaction? received it as a magistrate, even while he made it as a father?

Ther. I cannot see, how this suffering of the father was in any degree satisfactory to the law, since the father and the son could not be considered as one and the same person. It may pass for an extraordinary instance of parental indulgence; it may strike the benevolent and compassionate hearer: but, if tried at the bar of equity and reason, it will hardly be admitted as any legal satisfaction, it will probably be condemned, as a breach of nature's first and fundamental law, self-preservation.

Asp. What you observe, Theron, I must confess has weight. It will oblige me to give up my illustration. Nevertheless, what you urge against the propriety of the comparison, tends to establish the certainty of the doctrine. For Christ and his people are actually considered as one and the same person. They are one mystical body; he the head, they the members; so intimately united to him, that they are "bone of his bone, and flesh of his flesh," (Eph. v. 30; Col. i. 20.) by virtue of which union, their sins were punished in him, "and by his stripes they are healed," (Isa. liii. 5,) they obtain impunity and life.

Though there may be nothing in the procedure of men which bears any resemblance to this miracle of heavenly goodness, it receives a sufficient confirmation from the language of Scripture. He who wrote as an amanuensis to the unerring Spirit has declared, that "God was in Christ reconciling the world,"—unto whom? unto some third party? No; but reconciling it by the death and obedience of Christ, "unto himself," (2 Cor. v. 19.) And I can very readily grant that this divine exertion of benignity and wisdom should be without a precedent, and without a parallel.*

Difficulties, I own, may attend the explanation of this article, or be interwoven with its consequences. At the same time I must affirm, that our apprehensions of heavenly things are so obscure, and our ideas of the divine benevolence so scanty, that we may very possibly mistake, and fancy that to be absurd, which is only great, wonderful, and incomprehensible.*—Nor shall I be thought presumptuous in adding, that it will be impossible for all the sagacity in the world to prove this doctrine an absurdity, though it should ever remain an inexplicable mystery. How many phenomena in the constitution of external nature, are confessedly mysterious and inexplicable! They challenge, they command our assent; yet baffle all our researches, and defy our utmost penetration. If, then, we find this truth fully and incontestibly revealed in the Bible, we must renounce the philosopher before we can consistently act the sceptic.

Ther. Let us see, then, whether it be so fully and incontestibly revealed in the Bible. You have given me, as yet, but one of your scriptural images.

Asp. I have another at your service. Christ is called an High Priest. What do you take to be the nature of the priestly office?

Ther. The business of the priest was, I apprehend, to offer sacrifices, and to make intercession for the people.

Asp. Very true; and Christ could not, with any propriety, receive this appellation, if he had been defective in performing either of the sacerdotal functions. Now, that he offered no such victim as slain beasts, is universally acknowledged. We might presume therefore, even though we had not the authority of an apostle to assure us, that "he offered himself through the eternal spirit to God," (Heb. ix. 14.)

The cross, shall I say? † rather his divine nature, was the altar; his soul and body, each immaculately pure, were the holocaust.

* Its unparalleled, nay, its incomprehensible nature, is no objection to its truth and reality. This is rather a circumstance which perfectly agrees with the testimony of the inspired writers, and affords, in my opinion, an unanswerable argument for the divine origin of Christianity.

† Agrees with the testimony of the inspired writers, who called, not only God's wisdom, by way of supereminent distinction, but his wisdom in a mystery, even his hidden wisdom; which could not possibly have been conceived by any finite mind, however enlarged or sagacious. It affords an unanswerable argument for the divine origin of Christianity, since it was infinitely too deep for the contrivance of men, and absolutely undiscoverable by the penetration of angels; how could it be known, but by manifestation from above? Whence could it take its rise, but from an especial revelation.

‡ The cross is, by some authors, styled the altar, but, I think, improperly. This notion seems to have sprung from, or given rise to, the Popish practice of idolizing the crucifix. At least it countenances such a kind of foppish or sacrilegious devotion, more than a Protestant writer could wish. It was the property of the altar to sanctify the gift. This, therefore, when referred to our Lord's sacrifice, is a far more exalted office than we dare ascribe to the instrument of his suffering. This must be the honour and prerogative of his divine nature, which did indeed sanctify the great oblation: gave it a dignity, a merit, an efficacy, unspeakable and everlasting.

* Fancy, in the person of Horace, said of Jupiter and his fabulous exploits,

"Cui nihil viget simile aut secundum."

Much more will reason, in the character of a believer, say the same of Jehovah and his marvellous grace.

These he resigned, the one to deadly wounds, the other to inexpressible anguish, and both to be instead of all whole burnt-offerings. On this invaluable oblation, his intercession at the right hand of his Father is founded; from this it derives that prevailing efficacy, which is the security of his standing, and the recovery of his fallen disciples.

Give me leave to ask farther, what is your idea of a sacrifice? When Iphigenia was slain at the altar, what was the import of that memorable action?

Ther. It was intended, if we may credit Virgil's account,* to appease the indignation of the superior powers, and to obtain a propitious gale for the windbound fleet and confederate forces of Greece. But I hope you would not make that solemn butchery of the royal virgin, a pattern for the supreme goodness; nor the practice of gross idolaters, a model for the religion of the holy Jesus.

Asp. By no means, Theron. Only I would observe, that the custom of offering sacrifices obtained among the most cultivated nations of the heathen world; that these sacrifices were frequently of the vicarious kind, in which the victim was substituted instead of the offerer, and the former being cut off, the latter was discharged from punishment; consequently that the classic authors would (in case there was any need of such auxiliaries) join with the sacred writers to declare the expediency, and explain the nature of sacrifices. This also you will permit me to add, that if the heathens talk sensibly on any part of religious worship, it is on the subject of sacrifices. Their sentiments concerning expiatory oblations seem to be the faint and distant echo of revelation; and I have usually considered them not as the institutions of mere reason, but as the remains of some broken tradition.

However, the truest and most authentic signification of a sacrifice, is to be learned from the Jewish ritual, explained by the gospel comment. Do you remember the Mosaic account of that ordinance.

Ther. You are much better acquainted, Aspasio, with those sacred antiquities, and can give the most satisfactory information with regard to this particular. Only let me remind you, that alms are styled offerings; and praises, both in the prophetic and evangelical writings, come under the denomination of sacrifices.

Asp. Though praises and alms are styled sacrifices, they are not of the propitiatory, but eucharistic kind. They are never said to expiate transgressions, only are represented as acceptable to God through Jesus Christ, that divinely precious victim, whose merits both cancel our guilt, and commend our services! According to—

Ther. Stay a moment, Aspasio. Let me recollect myself. This may be the meaning of sacrifices, as ordained by Moses, and solemnized among the Jews. "Sacrifices were a symbolical address to God; intended to express before him the devotion, affections, dispositions, and desires of the heart, by significative and emblematical actions." Or thus; "The priest made atonement for sin, by sacrificing a beast, only as that was a sign and testimony of the sacrificer's pure and upright heart."

Asp. Sacrifices, I acknowledge, were a symbolical address to God. But would you confine their efficacy only to the death of the animal, and the purity of the offerer? No, Theron: they always had a reference to the great sacrifice, ordained in the eternal counsels of Jehovah; prepared when the co-eternal Son was made flesh, offered when the blessed Jesus surrendered himself to be led as a lamb to the slaughter. They were so far from being independent of this divine oblation, that they acted in perpetual subserviency to it, and derived all their virtue from it. They were the shadow, but the body was Christ.

"They expressed," you say, "the devotion, affections, dispositions, and desires of the heart." But I rather think they expressed the guilt and the faith of the offerer. His guilt: for this seems to be intimated by the very names of the propitiatory sacrifices; the sin and the sacrifice, the offending action and the expiatory rite, being signified by one and the same word.* It is somewhat more than intimated, by the occasion of the offering, and the state of the offerer; since it was only on account of guilt contracted, that peculiar oblations were made, and only from a guilty person that they were required. His faith, or firm belief that ceremonial guilt, which shut him out from the communion of the visible church, and subjected him to the infliction of temporal punishments, was removed by these; but that moral guilt, which defiles the soul, and excludes from heaven, should be purged by some better sacrifice than these.† In the exercise of this faith, Abel offered up a more acceptable sacrifice than Cain; and without this faith exercised in some degree, it was impossible to please God.

* חַטָּאת denotes a sin, and sin-offering, Lev. iv. 3, 24. זָבַח signifies the trespass, and the trespass-offering, Lev. v. 15, 19.

† They "sanctified to the purifying of the flesh," Heb. ix. 13. "but could not make him that did the service perfect, as pertaining to the conscience, Heb. ix. 9.

* Sanguine placasti ventos, et virgine caesa

If sacrifices were intended to bespeak integrity of heart, methinks the state of innocence had been the properest period for their institution and oblation. But we never hear of this awful ceremony till man is fallen, and sin committed. If intended to denote purity of heart, why should they be particularly enjoined on that solemn day when confession was made of all the sins of the whole congregation? (Lev. xvi. 21.) An oddly concerted device this! in which the tongue must contradict what the ceremony would recognise. Or, how could it be proper, after the violation of some law, or the neglect of some ordinance, immediately to go and offer a sacrifice? What would be the language of such a practice? "I have done wickedly, but my heart is pure and upright." Is this consistent with the spirit of humility, of modesty, or of common ingenuity? Is this the way of giving glory to God, or of taking shame to ourselves? Whereas, let the sacrifice be a typical expiation, and this is the significancy of the action, "Lord, I confess myself guilty. Punishment and death are my due. Let them fall, I beseech thee, on my victim; that thy justice being glorified, and thy law satisfied, thy mercy may be honourably displayed in my forgiveness.

Besides, Theron, what likeness, what agreement is there between the profession of integrity and an animal mortally wounded, wallowing in its own blood, and struggling in the agonies of death? Whereas, between these dying pangs and the punishment due to sin, or the sorrows sustained by the crucified Saviour, there is an apparent, a striking, and in various respects an edifying resemblance.

Ther. They declared, perhaps, the sacrificer's readiness and resolution to sly the brute in himself, and to lay down his life in adherence to God.

Asp. I do not remember any assertion of this kind in the Bible, or any hint to countenance such an interpretation. It seems, in some cases, to be incompatible with the very nature of things, and contrary to the express declarations of Scripture. Doves, you know, lambs and sheep, were offered in sacrifice. But shall we slay the lamb, the dove, the sheep in ourselves? So far from it, that Christ's disciples are either described by these creatures, or commanded to imitate their properties. "Be ye harmless as doves," (Matth. x. 16.) "Peter, feed my lambs," (John xxi. 15.) "My sheep hear my voice." (John x. 27.)

Supposing, however, that this might be a subordinate design, or a valuable improvement of the sacrificial acts, yet their primary intention, and ultimate end, were widely different; were much more significant of the divine compassions, and much better adapted to the comfort of mankind. They were an awful indication, that death was the wages of sin; at the same time a cheering declaration, that God was pleased to accept the death of the animal instead of the sinner's; a figurative representation* also of that illustrious Person, who was to bear the sin of many, and pour out his soul for transgressors.

Ther. Since sacrifices were of a religious nature, they should not only be instructive and beneficial in their tendency, but have their due effects with regard to God, to sin, and to the person who brought them.

Asp. They had their effects with regard to God, that his justice might be magnified and his anger appeased—to sin, that its demerit might be displayed, yet its guilt be done away—to the person who brought them, that he might obtain pardon, be exempted from punishment, and exercise his faith on the Lord Jesus Christ.

Ther. There are so many sorts of sacrifice appointed in the Jewish rubric, that I am at a loss for a distinct idea, unless some one be singled out and separately considered.

Asp. Among all the sacrifices instituted by Moses, none more circumstantially typified the blessed Jesus, or more appositely expressed the benefits of his oblation, than the paschal lamb, and the sin-offering, on the day of atonement.

An expositor, who cannot be mistaken, has given us this interpretation of the paschal lamb: "Christ our passover is sacrificed for us;"† declaring hereby, that Christ is a real sacrifice; that he was prefigured, in this capacity, by the paschal lamb; that the circumstances which distinguished it, met in him; and the advantages which resulted from it, were procured by him: those, in their truest import—these, in their largest extent. The words of the apostle speak

* What says Milton upon this subject of sacrifices, and with reference to their principal design? He calls them

—Religious rites
Of sacrifice; informing men by types
And shadows, of that destined seed to bruise
The serpent, by what means he shall achieve
Mankind's deliverance.—B. 12. l. 231.

† 1 Cor. v. 7. Would any one venture to say, Paul our passover is sacrificed for us? Yet this, I think, may be, or rather is in effect said, by the account which some persons give of Christ's satisfaction. The very thought of such a blasphemous absurdity is too painful and offensive for the serious Christian to dwell upon. I would therefore divert his attention to a more pleasing object. Let him observe the exquisite skill, which here and everywhere conducts the zeal of our inspired writer.—The odes of Pindar are celebrated for their fine transitions, which, though bold and surprising, are perfectly natural. We have in this place a very masterly stroke of the same beautiful kind. The apostle, speaking of the incestuous criminal, passes, by a most artful digression, to this darling topic, a crucified Saviour. Who would have expected it on such an occasion? Yet, when thus admitted, who does not see and admire both the propriety of the subject, and the delicacy of its induction?

this sense to the plainest, simplest reader. Whereas, to extort any other signification from them, what subtilty of wit, and what refinement, or rather violence of criticism, must be used!

The paschal lamb was without blemish. Such was the lamb of God; free from all taint of original sin, and from every spot of actual transgression.—A lamb of the first year, in all the sprightliness and floridity of youth. Christ also laid down his life, not when worn with age, or debilitated with sickness; but in the very prime of his days; amidst all the bloom of health, and all the vigour of manhood.—The lamb was to be slain in such a manner as might occasion the most copious effusion of its blood. And was not this very exactly fulfilled in our suffering Saviour? His blood flowed out in vast abundance, by the amazing sweat in the garden; by the rending lashes of the scourge; by the lacerating points of the thorns; by the dreadful nails which cleft his hands and his feet; by the deadly spear which ripped open his side, and cut its way to his heart.—Though the blood was to be so liberally spilt, a bone of the lamb was not to be broken. And you cannot but recollect, you cannot but admire, the wonderful interposition of Providence, to accomplish this emblematical prediction. When the soldiers had received a command to break the legs of the three crucified persons; when they had actually broke the legs of each malefactor, which hung on the right side of our Lord and on the left; their minds were over-ruled (by a divine influence, no doubt) to spare the blessed Jesus, and to leave all his bones unhurt, untouched.

The lamb was to be killed before the whole assembly; in the presence, either of the whole congregation of Israel, or else of that particular society which concurred in eating the flesh. And did not the whole multitude of the Jews conspire against our Redeemer to put him to death? Did they not all cry out, as with one voice, Crucify him! Crucify him! Was he not executed at one of their grand festivals, and in the sight of the whole assembled nation?—The blood was not to be poured heedlessly upon the ground, but received carefully into a bason, and sprinkled, with the utmost punctuality, upon the door-posts. In like manner, the blood of the heavenly Lamb is not to be trampled under foot by a contemptuous disregard. It is the treasure of the church, and the medicine of life; to be received, therefore, by an humble faith, and devoutly applied to our consciences.—The sprinkling of that blood secured every Israelitish family from the destroying angel's sword. So the merits of the slaughtered Saviour* screen every believing sinner from the stroke of offended justice, and from the pains of eternal death.—What must have become of the Israelite, who, trusting to the uprightness of his heart, should neglect to make use of this divinely-appointed safeguard? He must inevitably have been punished with the death of his first-born. Equally certain, but infinitely more dreadful, will be his condemnation, who, before the omniscient Judge, shall presume to plead his own integrity, or confide in his own repentance, and reject the atonement of the dying Jesus.

Ther. Now, if you please, for the sin offering,* which seems to have been the most eminent sacrifice of them all.

Asp. It was the most comprehensive, because it shadowed forth not only the death of Christ, but his resurrection from the dead, and his ascension into heaven. As the various actions of some illustrious personage, which cannot be exhibited by the painter in a single draught, are displayed in several compartments, yet all constitute one and the same grand historical picture; so, these glorious events, incapable of being represented by any single animal, were typified by two kids of the goats, which nevertheless were reputed to as one offering.†

These goats were brought to the door of the tabernacle, and there presented before the Lord. Christ also presented himself before God, when “he went up to Jerusaby this remarkable form of speech, that the death of Christ will be of no advantage to the sinner, unless it be applied to his heart; as the blood of the paschal lamb was no protection to an Israelite, till it had tinged the posts of his door. Isaiah, using the same phrase, and alluding to the same custom, says of our Lord Jesus Christ, “he shall sprinkle many nations;” lii. 15. Not only initiate them into his church by baptism; but also, by the application of his blood shall cleanse them from their guilt, and deliver them from the wrath to come.

* For the circumstances relating to the sin-offering the reader will consult Lev. xvi. For those which concern the paschal lamb, he will have recourse to Exod. xii.

† How runs the divine command? “He (the high priest) shall take of the congregation two kids of the goats for a sin-offering,” Lev. xvi. 5. Are not these two kids styled, in the singular number and collective sense, an offering? That we might not mistake, God is pleased to add, “and one ram for a burnt-offering.” Here he names one, to prevent a misapprehension of his meaning, when he had before said two. To render his meaning still more apparent, and that we may regard this goat as joined in the same offering with the other, the Lord, contrary to his own rule in all other cases, orders the high priest to lay his hands upon the head of the scape-goat, not upon the head of the goat devoted to death. He divides the necessary circumstances of a sacrifice between them both, to intimate, in the clearest manner, that neither the one nor the other separate, but both taken together, were the one sacrificial oblation, appointed for this distinguished solemnity.

If this be true, I think the passage is a pretty considerable proof, that atonement was made by suffering vicarious punishment; notwithstanding what has been urged against it, from the tenth verse of the chapter. Should we require human authority for the support of this interpretation, one of the greatest human authorities may be seen in the celebrated Wit-sius; “Uterque hircus pertinebat ad unum sacrificium pro peccato, hostia unus loco. Uterque erat pecus peculiaris, vicaria Israeli peccatorum, ejusque peccatum ferens.” De Oecon. lib. iv. cap. 6.

* Both St. Peter and St. Paul speak of the blood of sprinkling, I Pet. i. 2; Heb. xii. 24.; intimating, lem, that all things written by the prophets concerning him might be accomplished," (Luke xviii. 31.) The goat on which the Lord's lot fell, was devoted to death. "Christ also being delivered by the determinate counsel and foreknowledge of God," (Acts ii. 23.) "was crucified and slain." The body was burnt without the camp, which pointed at the very place, and pictured out the very nature of our Lord's sufferings: "For he suffered without the gate," (Heb. xiii. 12.) was there exposed to the rage of men and the wrath of God, under the most exquisite pains of body, and the most insupportable agonies of soul; all significantly typified by the flame of a devouring fire, than which nothing is more fierce, more penetrating, or more severely tormenting.

As the animal which was slaughtered showed forth the Redeemer dying for our sins, that which escaped prefigured the same Saviour rising again for our justification. The high priest put his hands upon the head of the scape-goat, and with great solemnity confessed the sins of the whole congregation. The import of this ceremony is expressly declared in the sacred canon: "The goat shall bear upon him their iniquity."* It is charmingly explained by the prophet, "The Lord laid on him the iniquities of us all," (Isa. liii. 6.) and most delightfully confirmed by the apostle, "He himself bore our sins in his own body on the tree," (1 Pet. ii. 24.)

This done, the goat was dismissed into a land not inhabited, a place separated from all resort of men, where he was never likely to be found any more; to teach us, that our offences, having been expiated by the bleeding Jesus, are entirely done away, shall never rise up in judgment against us, but according to the prophecy of Jeremiah, "When the iniquity of Israel shall be sought for, there shall be none; and the sins of Judah, they shall not be found," (Jer. l. 20.) It is further enjoined, "that Aaron shall confess all the iniquities of the children of Israel, and all their transgressions, in all their sins." Iniquities, transgressions, sins are particularized; and to this cluster of expressions, the word all is added, to inform us, that the least sins need the atonement of Christ's death; to assure us, that the greatest sins are not beyond the compass of its efficacy; and that all sins, be they ever so heinous, or ever so numerous, are forgiven to the true believer.

The high-priest carried the blood of the victim into the second tabernacle, even within the veil. So Christ entered with his own blood, not into the holy places made with hands, but into heaven itself. The blood was sprinkled before the mercy-seat, and left in the holy of holies, that it might always remain before the Lord. And does not Christ always appear in the presence of God for us? does he not ever live to make intercession for us? to plead his all-sufficient propitiation in our behalf; that the benefits procured thereby may be communicated, ratified, and perpetuated to his people?

Ther. These benefits, Aspasio, are ascribed, in Scripture, to repentance and reformation of life, qualifications of our own; not to any such cause as a vicarious sacrifice, where the merit must necessarily subsist in another. What says the apostle Peter when he had just received his instructions from the Holy Ghost? "Repent and be converted;" not look unto an atonement, or depend upon a propitiation; "that your sins may be blotted out." (Acts iii. 19.)

Asp. It is true, the benefits of the new covenant are promised to penitents, as their happy portion; but never assigned to their repentance, as the procuring cause: never to their repentance, but to the blood of the great High Priest, called, therefore "the blood of the everlasting covenant," (Heb. xiii. 20.) being the condition stipulated in it, required by it, and in consequence of which all its unspeakable privileges are bestowed.

Besides, the qualifications you suppose are the gift of the Lord. We are not able to exercise them till Christ, who is exalted for this very purpose, gives repentance. (Acts v. 31.) A conversion to God, and a newness of life, are not the effect of human abilities, but the work of the divine Spirit, and the fruit of the Redeemer's death. Indeed, this death is the purchase of every heavenly blessing. This opens the heaven of heavens, and all its inexhaustible stores. By this we have the enjoyment of grace, and by this the hope of glory.

Ther. You begin to be in raptures, Aspasio!

Asp. Excuse me, Theron. It is not easy to repress the sallies of delight and devotion, when we muse upon such amazing loving-kindness, and are touched with a sense of such immensely rich benefits. A great High Priest! who is "higher than the heavens," (Heb. vii. 26,) yet humbled himself to death, even the death of the cross! who is "consecrated for evermore," (Heb. vii. 28,) and pleads all his merit, improves all his influence, for our consummate felicity!

† It is observable, that whereas the scape-goat is said to bear (N^o) the sins of Israel, Lev. xvi. 22; the very same phrase is applied to Christ, Isa. liii. 12.

* "What heart of stone but glows at thoughts like these?"

But I check myself; and will either reply to your objections, or listen to your sentiments; listen as attentively as you yourself attend to the music of that shrill-tongued thrush.

Ther. Its sweetly-modulated lays, eminent even in the symphony of spring, have indeed attracted my ears. But my mind is disengaged and free for your conversation.

Asp. I can repeat a song, sweeter far than this, or all the melody of the woodland choirs.—A song, which has harmony enough to make the brow of melancholy wear a smile, or to sooth away the sorrows of death itself: "Who shall lay any thing to the charge of God's elect? It is God that justifieth; who is he that condemneth? It is Christ that died; yea rather, that is risen again; who is even at the right hand of God; who also maketh intercession for us." (Rom. viii. 33, 34.) According to my friend's principles, the strain of this triumphant exclamation was ill-judged, and should have run in the following manner: "Who shall lay any thing to our charge? We have endeavoured to preserve a rectitude of disposition, and to persist in a laudable course of action. Wherever we failed, we have been sorry for the fault, and have implored pardon from the divine majesty. What then shall dismay us, or who shall condemn us?" Your topics of consolation would be complete, without having recourse to the death of Christ as an atonement for sin; or, to the resurrection of Christ, as an evidence that the atonement is accepted; or to the intercession of Christ, as the cause of our interest in that transcendent blessing.

Ther. Since you so frequently mention, and so earnestly insist upon atonement, I should be glad to know the precise signification of the word. I am told, the original phrase has nothing to do with the idea of making satisfaction.

Asp. We may learn the precise signification of atonement, by considering the means, the effect, and the manner, whereby the means accomplish the effect. The effect of atonement is pardon. The means of obtaining it are the death of Christ. The way or manner whereby the death of Christ becomes efficacious for this blessed purpose, is the sovereign appointment of his Father, the infinite dignity of his person, and especially the vicarious nature of his sufferings, or their being undergone in the stead of sinners.

Ther. It has been supposed, and is affirmed too, that our Saviour's obedience and death were conducive to our redemption, only in virtue of his Father's will and appointment.

Asp. I am glad it is some other, and not my Theron, who espouses this opinion, which is highly injurious to the dignity of our Redeemer's person, and to the merit of his obedience. Neither is it very honourable to the wisdom of the Father, unless we suppose him therefore to have appointed the death of Christ, because he knew it was fully sufficient for the glorious purpose.

And why should we use that weak inadequate expression, conducive to our redemption? Would any one say, of Solomon's elegant and sumptuous temple, that it was conducive to the accomplishment of what Moses foretold? (Exod. xv. 17.) David's provision of stones, of timber, and of gold, was, if you please, conducive to it. But Solomon's act was perfective of it, was the very execution of the thing itself. Such are the obedience and death of Christ, with respect to our redemption.

Ther. But we forget the original word, and neglect to inquire into its genuine import.

Asp. The word, which we translate atonement, implies, in its primary acceptation, the notion of covering. Thus the ark was covered,* "was overlaid with pitch, within and without," that all its chinks might be secured against the insinuating attempts of the water, and all its timber defended from the injuries of the liquid element. When an object, in this or any other manner, is covered over for safety; the covering receives every shock, and sustains all damages, which would otherwise fall upon the thing covered. The image, therefore, is very pertinently used to express the true evangelical nature of atonement; and the word is used, with equal propriety, to describe the mercy-seat,† which was a costly covering for the ark, made of pure gold, and exactly commensurate to that sacred repository. In this were lodged the tables of the law; whose precepts we have violated, and to whose curse we were subject. Consequently the mercy-seat, both by its situation, its extent, and its office, prefigured the Redeemer; who interposes between the law and the offender; fulfils the commands, and sustains the curse of the former; merits pardon, and procures salvation for the latter.

As some fine flower, having entertained our eye with one beautiful colour, suddenly breaks, or gradually softens into another, and gives us a renewed pleasure; such, methinks, is the nature of this delightful

* כִּפֶּרַת Thou shalt "besmear, cover, or overlay," Gen. vi. 14. This is the first place in which our word occurs. It is supposed to give us the genuine and native sense of the phrase. "Perhaps the English expression "cover," may be derived from the participle כִּפֶּר "copher."

† כִּפֶּרַת Exod. xxv. 17.

word. It is expressive of the hoar-frost,* which, in a serene but sharp wintry morning, covers the houses, covers the trees, covers the whole face of nature. So the blood of Jesus, according to the Psalmist's representation, covers all our guilt, and hides every offence. (Psalm xxxii. 1.) Insomuch that, when this blood is applied by the divine Spirit, the Lord "sees no iniquity in Jacob." (Num. xxiii. 21.) He acts, as if he saw none; neither punishes the guilty, nor abhors the polluted sinner.

The same expression is used with reference to a covenant, and signifies the abolition of the contract; † which was done by cancelling the deed, or expunging the articles of stipulation. By the covenant of works, all mankind became obnoxious to condemnation, were bound over to death. By the grace of Christ our obligation to punishment is disannulled, and the handwriting of condemnation is blotted out. Should you ask, how this is effected? By paying a ransom, and offering a sacrifice. Should you farther inquire, of what this ransom and this sacrifice consisted? Of nothing less than the precious blood, ‡ the inestimable life, § the divinely-magnificent person of Christ. ||

Ther. These then are the capital ideas included in the original word—a covering by way of defence, and a covering by way of concealment.

Asp. They are, Theron.—As the brain, in the animal body, is the source of sensation, sends out various detachments of nerves to animate and actuate all the parts of the vital system; so these two capital ideas branch themselves into a variety of subordinate, yet similar significations, which run through the whole economy of the gospel, to enliven and quicken the spirit of a believer. Let me instance in a few particulars. This richly-significant word denotes—the exercise of divine mercy, (Deut. xxxii. 43,) the pardon of sin, (Deut. xxi. 8; 2 Chron. xxx. 18,) a cleansing from guilt, (Numb. xxxv. 33,) purging from transgression, (Psalm lxxv. 3,) reconciliation for iniquity, (Dan. ix. 24,) the pacifying of wrath, (Ezek. xvi. 63.) Do not these passages (which are expressed by some branch of the verb that conveys to us the idea of atoning) plainly intimate, that the atonement of Christ is the meritorious cause of all these desirable effects? is the foundation of every act of divine goodness; and the origin of every blessing vouchsafed to sinners?

Ther. After all, this is the consideration which principally offends and perplexes me: God is a spirit, an absolutely perfect and infinitely pure being; remote, inconceivably remote, from whatever is gross or corporeal. How then can he take pleasure in the effusion of blood, or the burning of flesh? How can any such low carnal inducements make him merciful to sinners, or appease what you call his wrath.

Asp. Rather, what the Scriptures call his wrath. You mistake our doctrine, my dear Theron. We never maintain that any sacrifice whatever, not even the propitiation of Christ's death, was intended to make God merciful; only to make way for his eternal purposes of mercy, without any prejudice either to the demands of his law or the rights of his justice. Our sentiments on this head are exactly consonant to his own declaration, and his own procedure, in the case of Job's friends; (see Job xlii. 7, 8.) Though displeased with their conduct, he was merciful to their persons; nevertheless, he would not exercise that mercy till they had first offered a sacrifice, and acted faith in a dying Saviour.

Neither is it ever supposed, that the infinitely wise and pure God can take pleasure in the effusion of blood, or the burning of flesh, simply considered; only as they had a reference to that noble and inestimable sacrifice, which brings the highest honour to his name, which those slaughtered animals exhibit in a figure, and to which every true Israelite had a believing regard.

I say, had a believing regard. For it is affirmed by the author of the Hebrews, that the gospel was preached to the Israelites in the wilderness, (Heb. iv. 2.) What does he mean by the gospel? The very essence of this benevolent scheme, according to the apostle's own definition, is, that "Christ died for our sins," (1 Cor. xv. 3.) How was this gospel preached to our fathers in the wilderness? By significant emblems; especially by slaughtered animals, and bleeding victims, by which Christ was almost continually, though not so evidently as in these latter times, "set forth crucified for sinners." (Gal. iii. 1.)

In this sense alone, those carnal usages were worthy the wisdom of God to appoint, and the majesty of God to accept. This gave them a peculiar dignity and importance, and set them far above all the similar observances used in the heathen worship. They were also, when thus explained, thus improved, extremely profitable to believers; as they directed their contemplation to the future sufferings of a Saviour, and ratified to their faith the benefits of his ever-operating sacrifice; which, we were assured by an infallible voice, was effectual "for the redemption of the transgressions under the first covenant."*

† Isa. xxviii. 18. כִּפֶּר abolēbitur. "Proprie sonat, oblinetur, obliterabitur, est enim. כִּפֶּר Hebrais proprie quid obducere, atque inde (cum obducta et oblita dispareant) delere, abolere." Thus, I apprehend, the words should be pointed.

Ther. So you apprehend, that in those usages practised by the ancient Jews, the gospel was emblematically preached, and Christ in a figure exhibited?

Asp. Most certainly, Theron. And for this cause, under the law, almost all things were purged with blood, (Heb. ix. 22.) The multiplicity, the variety, the constancy of their sacrifices, were all designed to impress upon their minds, and familiarize to their thoughts, this great evangelical truth. Was any one overtaken by a fault? He must present a victim, and the priest must slay it, by way of trespass-offering; to signify, that the guilt which was contracted could be done away only by the atoning death of Christ. Had any one received a signal blessing? A beast was slain by way of peace-offering; as a public expression of gratitude for the mercy, and also as an emphatical declaration, that all good vouchsafed to fallen man is owing to the Redeemer's ransom. Was any one to be invested with the priestly office, or admitted to minister in the sanctuary? A ram or a bullock must bleed, by way of atonement, and for the purpose of consecrating, (Lev. viii. 22. Numb. viii. 12.) in order to testify, that no man can officiate with acceptance in the worship of God; that no service, though of a religious kind,

* Heb. ix. 15. When I reflect on these words, I wonder how any one can assert, that all the Jews died under the curse of the law. Died under the curse of the law! even though the apostle has warranted it for a truth, that "all these" (meaning Abraham, Sarah, Isaac, Jacob, &c.) "died in faith," Heb. xi. 13. Even though he has elsewhere laid it down as a maxim, "so then they which are of faith," (in whatever period of time they live, or under whatever dispensation of religion they worship,) "are blessed with faithful Abraham," Gal. iii. 9. Even though the Psalmist in one place affirms "blessed are they whose unrighteousnesses are forgiven, and whose sin is covered;" and, in another place, declares concerning himself and his pious cotemporaries, "look how wide the east is from the west! So far hath he set our sins from us." Psalm xxxiii. 1. Psalm ciii. 12.

From these and many other texts, I think it is evident, that the faithful Jews no more died under the curse of the law, than the faithful Christians. The death of Christ procured the pardon and acceptance of believers, even before he came in the flesh. From the beginning, he had covenanted with the Father, as their Mediator; and God, to whom all things are present, saw the certain accomplishment of his undertaking. He was therefore, by virtue of the divine decree, and in point of saving efficacy, "a Lamb slain from the foundation of the world." Though he laid down his life in the reign of Tiberius, he was a real Redeemer in all ages.

can be pleasing in his sight, till the former is interested in the merits, unless the latter is recommended by the death of the great High Priest.

And not only by their solemn sacrificial acts, but even by their ordinary meals, this grand lesson was inculcated. They were forbidden to eat the blood, in order to awaken and preserve in their consciences a reverential and fiducial regard to the precious blood of Christ. The Holy Ghost assigning a reason for this sacred prohibition, says expressly, "Because the blood maketh an atonement for your souls," (Lev. xvii. 11.) the blood of beasts typically, the blood of Christ effectually. O that Christians would, in this particular, learn of Jews; learn, at least, from Jewish ordinances, to have their attention incessantly fixed on that divine High Priest, who, by one offering, hath perfected for ever,—not barely conducted or contributed to the work, but hath fully accomplished it, and obtained complete remission for—them that are sanctified, (Heb. x. 14.)

Ther. Some offerings were made without any effusion of blood. What could those mean? Or how could they typify the sacrifice of Christ?

Asp. Perhaps the apostle might foresee such an objection when he used that guarded expression, almost all things were purged with blood. If, in these cases, there was no effusion of blood, yet there was a destruction of the substance. The meat-offerings were consumed by fire; which is much the same to inanimate things, as shedding of the blood is to living creatures. The same effect is ascribed to these oblations, as to those of the sanguinary kind. It is expressly declared of the poor man's trespass-offering, which consisted of fine flour, and was burnt upon the altar, "It shall make an atonement for him," (Lev. v. 11, 12, 13.) So that here also was what we may truly call a visible prediction of Christ. The offerings which flamed, as well as the victims which bled, showed forth our dying Lord: whose one "oblation of himself once offered," comprized all the qualities, and realized the whole efficacy represented by every other sacrifice.

Ther. Another odd circumstance has often given me disgust, and been apt to prejudice me against the institutions of the Old Testament. Many of them appear mean, contemptible, and perfectly puerile. "Can these," I have said within myself, "be ordained by a God of infinite wisdom, and transcendent glory? Can we reasonably imagine, that a mandate should be issued from the court of heaven, on purpose to forbid the boiling, and enjoin the roasting of some particular piece of meat? (Exod. xii. 9.)

Will the Great Ruler of the skies concern himself about the precise manner of killing one bird, and releasing another? (Lev. xiv. 4, 5, 6, 7.) Will he who claims the worship of the heart, have such an especial regard to a drop or two of despicable blood, put upon the tip of the right ear, or the thumb of the right hand? (Exod. xxix. 20.) Surely, such childish ceremonies are too minute and trivial for the notice, much more for the solemn appointment, of the supreme Majesty!"

Asp. You will please to remember, that when those ceremonies were ordained, it was the infancy,* at least the minority of the church. If we advert to this circumstance, we shall have reason to admire both the all-comprehending wisdom, and the no less condescending goodness, of Jehovah. His all-comprehending wisdom, in conforming so accurately and so minutely the type to the event, though the former was established long, long before the latter existed. Many ages before the Desire of Nations appeared, his picture was drawn, was presented to public view, and is now found to correspond in every feature with the illustrious original. What hand could be equal to such a task, but only the hand of an omniscient limner? His condescending goodness, in adapting the tenor of his revelation to the state of his people; "speaking unto them even as unto babes." (1 Cor. iii. 1.) not by naked precepts, or abstracted truths, but by earthly similitudes,† and (if I may so express myself) by embodied instructions, such as were level to their low capacities, and calculated to affect their dull apprehensions.

The institutions to which you hint were undoubtedly mean and trifling, if considered in themselves. Accordingly, their wise and majestic author cautions his people against such erroneous and unworthy notions. "I spake not unto your fathers, nor commanded them, in the day that I brought them out of the land of Egypt, concerning burnt-offerings or sacrifices," (Jer. vii. 22.) "It was not my design that they should acquiesce in the shadow, and neglect the substance. I never intended that they should rest in the porch, but pass through these ordinances to much sublimer things. Christ and spiritual blessings were principally in my view; to which all the Mosaic usages were relative, subservient, and one continual manuduction." Considered in this light, as bearing a reference to the ever-blessed Mediator, as emblems of his person and pledges of his grace, they acquire a real magnificence, and convey the most salutary lessons.

The blood put upon the tip of the ear, and thumb of the hand, denotes our personal application of the death of Christ; without which all its virtue, though boundless and inconceivable, will profit us nothing. Those particular parts of the body may signify the perceptive and executive faculties; in both which we offend, and for both which we need the great propitiation. Of the two birds you mention, one was to be killed, the other was to fly away, after it had been dipped in the blood of its fellow. Thus the Lord Jesus was crucified for our sins; and we being washed in his blood, being interested in the atonement of our holy victim and elder brother, are acquitted from guilt, and escape condemnation. Concerning the paschal lamb, it was particularly enjoined, That the flesh should not be eaten raw, nor sodden with water, but roasted with fire, and of every offering from the herd or from the flock, the fat and the inwards were, by an express command of God, delivered up to the devouring flame. All this was an emblem of that tremendous indignation, which "is poured out like fire," (Nah. i. 6.) which seized our immaculate Sacrifice, that it might spare polluted sinners; and which must have consumed utterly any mediator, who was less than infinite, or other than divine.

Had you beheld our renowned Newton blowing up with great assiduity and attention, his little watery visicles into the air, you would perhaps, have despised the venerable philosopher, and have thought him little better than a hoary idiot. But when you was told, that in every one of these volatile soapy bubbles he discovered the beauteous colours of the rainbow, and from this seemingly childish experiment he explained the nature of that wonderful arch; you would then entertain a different notion, both of the man and of his employ. So when you discern the blessed Jesus looking forth at these windows, and showing himself through these lattices of the Jewish economy, you will,

† This seems to be our Lord's meaning, when he says to Nicodemus, "if I have told you earthly things," He had been treating of that internal spiritual renovation, which is the root and spring of all holiness. He had been speaking of that Divine Spirit, whose gracious and almighty agency produces this desirable change. The nature of the former was represented, under the similitude of a birth, by which we enter upon a new state, form new ideas, and habituate ourselves to new practices, pleasures, pursuits. The operations of the latter were described, by the common and well known properties of the wind. This he mentions, as a plain and familiar method of teaching: this he opposes to telling him of heavenly things; or delivering refined and exalted truths, not accommodated to the capacity, not brought within the compass of an infantile understanding, by an assimilation to sensible objects. I hope, conceive a higher opinion of them, and derive richer advantage from them.

Ther. There are several persons, as well as ritual observances, of a very singular character, mentioned in the Mosaic law. The leper, for instance, the Nazarite, with others of the same antiquated and grotesque stamp; which seem, to me at least, so many unmeaning narratives, that convey no manner of edification to readers in the present age. I have frequently had an inclination, and now I have a proper opportunity, to ask your opinion upon these points.

Asp. I thank you, Theron, for giving me the hint. What you propose is by no means foreign to the topic of our discourse. Those persons were truly remarkable; neither are the peculiarities of their case recorded in vain. They picture out, in dismal and delightful colours, the sinner and the Saviour. To know ourselves, and to know Christ, is true wisdom; is indeed the consummation of all knowledge. Here we have a lecture of hieroglyphical instruction, on both those important subjects.

The leper was an emblem of a sinner; (see Levit. chap. xiii. xiv.) His disease extremely afflictive to himself, and intolerably loathsome to others. Sin likewise is the sorest of all miseries to the wretch who commits it; and most detestably odious to the God who forbids it. The leper was secluded from the benefits of society, and all communication with his fellow citizens. The sinner also, while impenitent and unpardoned, is an alien from the commonwealth of Israel, (Eph. ii. 12.) without any enjoyment of the comforts, or any interest in the privileges of the gospel. If he dies in this condition, he must be for ever shut out from the kingdom of heaven; for ever cut off from the presence of the Lord.

The contagion was sometimes so pestilential, that it not only tainted the clothes of the diseased, but spread itself over the walls of his house, and infected the timber of the beams. It was sometimes so inveterate, that it could be eradicated no other way but by burning the garment, and demolishing the building. Does not this give us a clear, but melancholy view, of original corruption? which has transfused its poison through all the faculties of the soul, and all the members of the body; nor will ever be entirely expelled, till death releases the former, and consigns the latter to the dust.

What could cure this terrible distemper, even in its mildest state? Not all the balm of Gilead; not all the drugs on a thousand hills; nothing but the consecrated oil, and sacrificial blood duly applied by the High-priest. And what can heal the disorders of our fallen souls? so far heal them as to purge away their guilt, and subdue the prevalence of their iniquities? No acts of mortification, no vigilance, nor any efforts of our own; nothing but the atoning death, and sanctifying spirit of the blessed Jesus. The malignity and virulence of this plague of the heart, are absolutely incorrigible by any other expedient. But, blessed be divine grace, this remedy, provided by our great High-priest, and administered by our great Physician, is sovereign, and never fails.

The case of the Nazarites, (see Numb. chap. vi.) was the very reverse of the state of the lepers. "Her Nazarites," Jeremiah says, "were purer than snow, they were whiter than milk, they were more ruddy in body than rubies, their polishing was of sapphires; (Lam. iv. 7.) A faint representation of the only begotten Son, who is the fairest among ten thousand; the brightness of his Father's glory, and the express image of his person? both God and man in one sacred, wonderful, adorable Saviour. They, during the time of their separation, abstained from wine, withdrew from secular business, avoided every kind of pollution; and dedicated themselves in an especial manner, to the service of God. A type of that glorious Nazarite, who was separated for a season from the fruitions of heaven; who was holy, harmless, and undefiled, both in his nature and all his conversation, who sanctified himself, and devoted his life and labours, his soul and body, to the glory of his Father, and the redemption of his people. The Nazarites, even when they had discharged their vow, and were ceremonially clean, yet were obliged to offer a sin-offering, a burnt-offering, and a peace-offering. So the great Redeemer, though he had perfectly obeyed all the preceptive parts of the divine law, yet was required to offer up a sacrifice—even the incomparably precious sacrifice of himself—in order to consummate the work of our salvation.

Ther. Have you a sufficient warrant for this strain of interpretation? Is it sound, is it rational, or conformable to any authentic standard of scriptural exposition? Methinks it looks more like the child of fancy, than the off-spring of judgment; more like the sally of a sportive imagination, than the result of a sober disquisition.

You cannot be ignorant, Aspasio, how the ruling passion tinctures the whole conduct. Hence it is, I apprehend, that your religious inamoratos find heavenly beauties, where Scripture intended no more than natural truths. Hence it is that they turn plain facts into profound figures, and allegorize common sense into pious absurdity.

colours: yet flourishing through lattices; manifesting himself not completely, but in part; concealing some, while he reveals much, of his mediatorial glory.

Have you never seen the mystic interpretations of some ancient, and, I may add, some modern divines? The honesty of their design is transparent, and the piety of their lives is unquestionable; otherwise we should be tempted to suspect, that they meant to burlesque the Scriptures, and disgrace their Author.

Who can ever persuade himself, that the supremely wise God would send us to search for a body of divinity in a bundle of rods? or set us to spin all the mysteries of Christianity from a few fleeces of wool, ring-streaked, speckled, and spotted? (Gen. xxxi.) Thus to expound the Scriptures, is not to open them clearly, and apply them judiciously, but rather to whip them into froth.*

Asp. We have the authority of our Lord himself, who has informed us, that the brazen serpent lifted up in the wilderness (John iii. 14.) was figurative of his own suspension and death on the cross: that the temple built on mount Zion was typical of his immaculate body, in which dwelt all the fulness of the Godhead, (John ii. 19. 21; Col. ii. 9.) that the prophet Jonah, lodged in the belly of the whale, and discharged from that strange confinement on the third day, (Matth. xii. 39, 40.) was an emblem of his own descending into the grave, and rising again before his flesh saw corruption.

We have also the testimony and the practice of the chiefest of the apostles, for our warrant. He assures us, that the rock smitten by Moses had a reference to Christ, (1 Cor. x. 4;) who was wounded for our sins, and is the foundation of our hopes: that the waters issuing at the stroke, were significative of those spiritual blessings which flow from a crucified Saviour: that as the former followed the sons of Jacob through all the circumvolutions of their tedious journey, the latter accompany the disciples of Jesus in every stage of their earthly pilgrimage. Let the great teacher of the Gentiles be our expositor, and we shall see the veil of the temple dignified with a significance, richer far than its costly materials and curious workmanship. Its silk and embroidery exhibit to the eye of faith the pure and spotless flesh of Christ, (Heb. x. 20.) As, by rending the material veil, the holy of holies became visible and accessible; so, by piercing the body, and spilling the blood of Christ, the God of heaven was manifested, and the way to heaven opened.

Every reader must admire those divided waves, which instead of overwhelming the Israelites with a resistless deluge, stood like a wall of defence on their right hand and on their left, as they marched through the depths of the sea. Every reader must admire that suspended cloud, which spread itself like a spacious canopy over the hosts of Israel, and screened them from the annoying sunbeams as they passed through the sultry desert. Our admiration must be heightened when we find that which was a cloud by day becoming a pillar of fire by night, and illuminating their camp with the most amazing as well as the most cheering splendour. But St. Paul discerned a greater glory, and a deeper design, in those unparalleled events. The people, he says, "were baptized unto Moses, in the cloud and in the sea," (1 Cor. x. 2.) These symbolically represented the baptism of water and of fire; or the application of Christ's blood to our souls, and the efficacy of his spirit on our hearts:—in the former of which consists our justification; from the latter of which proceeds our sanctification.

I fear you will think my discourse somewhat like the journey just now mentioned; but I must not wholly omit the epistle to the Hebrews, which is the most unexceptionable vindication, as well as the faultless model, of allegorical exposition. It is delightful to observe what propriety of address the inspired writer uses. He speaks to the Jews in their own way; alludes to their own usages, ordinances, and ceremonies; proves them to be types of, and guides to, a more clear, a more benign, and in all respects a more excellent economy.* More particularly he displays the transcendent superiority of Christ and his gifts, even to those persons and privileges which they held in the highest esteem. These, like the morning star, were introductory to, yet totally eclipsed by, the rising sun.

They had exalted apprehensions of the angelic excellencies. The apostle therefore celebrates the Redeemer as the Lord whom angels obey, as the God whom angels adore. They always reckoned Moses to be the first favourite of heaven, and chief among the children of men. He lets them know, that Moses, with all his extraordinary endowments, was but a servant in the house of Jesus. It was his greatest honour, to

* He styles the legal oblations, and the whole service of the Jewish sanctuary, "the example and shadow of heavenly things;" or of Christ Jesus; and evangelical worship, and spiritual blessings, Heb. viii. 5.—The original signifies "the pattern;" somewhat like the strokes pencilled out upon a piece of fine linen: which presents you with the figure of sprigs of leaves, and of flowers; but have not yet received their splendid colours, their curious shades, and beautiful enrichments, from the labours of the needle.—The original signifies likewise "a shadowy representation; which gives you some dim and imperfect idea of the body; but not the fine features, not the distinguishing air, none of those living graces which adorn the real person. Yet both the pattern and the shadow lead our minds to something nobler than themselves. The pattern, to that which completes it; the shadow to that which occasions it.

minister unto this Prince of Peace. As the priesthood and sacrifices were some of their distinguishing privileges, he shows the pre-eminence of Christ's office to all the Aaronic orders. He demonstrates the extensive and everlasting efficacy of his one atonement, in preference to every form, and the whole series of Levitical oblations.

Ther. Thus interpreted, I must acknowledge, the book of Levitical ceremonies is significant and edifying; whereas, abstracted from this evangelical improvement, nothing can be more empty and jejune. I once thought, that to peruse those obsolete canons, was like sitting down to an entertainment of dry bones. But, if such be their import, they may yield marrow and fatness to the attentive mind.

Due care, however, should be taken, not to suppose a type where there is no apparent foundation of analogy in the thing itself, or no hint of this nature given us by the unerring Spirit; lest, instead of being guided by truth, we are bewildered by fancy. And, when either or both these handles present themselves, I think we should beware of straining the subject beyond the bounds of a just and reasonable comparison; lest, instead of following the clue, we stretch it till it breaks. If the first caution is not observed, the sense of Scripture will lie so deep, or be removed to such a distance, that none but persons of the most acute discernment can find it, or none but persons of the most excursive imagination can reach it. If the second is not regarded, the meaning of those divine volumes will become so vague and volatile, that there will hardly remain any possibility of ascertaining or fixing it.

Asp. As to the expedience and necessity of these cautionary limitations, I have the pleasure of agreeing entirely with my friend. Let our fancy submit to the reins of judgment, otherwise her excursions will be wild and lawless. Let our zeal borrow the eyes of discretion, otherwise her efforts will be blind and extravagant. And let all, thus tempered, thus regulated, be under the influence of enlightening grace. Then to spiritualize the ancient Scriptures, will be to convert the stones of the sanctuary into the jewels of a crown; and to fetch, not water only, but milk and honey, from the flinty rock.

Then, how pleasing must it be, as well as instructive, to discover the blessed Jesus, in all the institutions of the Mosaic law! To see his incarnation prefigured by the feast of tabernacles, when the Israelites were to relinquish their houses, and lodge in booths. (Lev. xxiii. 34. 40. 42.) Even as the son of God left the bosom of his Father, and the seats of bliss, to inhabit a cottage of clay, and sojourn in a vale of tears. To see our spotless and divine victim, typically slain at the joyful solemnity of the passover, and the anniversary fast of expiation. To see his death, that inestimable ransom for our souls, presented to our faith, in every morning and evening sacrifice, (Exod. xxix. 38, 39.) his intercession, that prevailing recommendation of our prayers, most sweetly expressed by the rich incense which attended the sacred rite. To see the various methods of purification; some pointing at the fountain for sin and for uncleanness, opened in our Redeemer's bleeding heart, (Exod. xxix. 4; Psal. li. 7.) others referring to those sanctifying operations of the Spirit, which act as a refiner's fire, or as a fuller's soap, (Numb. xxxi. 23; Isa. iv. 4.) To see, in the city of refuge, that perfect security which Christ's meritorious sufferings in our stead, afford to every penitent and believing sinner, (Numb. xxxv. 11, 12.)

Was it so very affecting and so very encouraging to Æneas, when he beheld the story of the Trojan heroes pictured upon the walls of the Carthaginian temple? * How much greater encouragement and joy must arise in the Christian's breast, when he perceives the amiable lineaments of his everlasting friend pourtrayed in all the peculiarities of the Jewish worship, and in the most distinguishing events of the Jewish history! This must highly enoble the Bible, and inexpressibly endear it to our affections. This spreads lustre, life, and glory, through every page of that blessed book. And though I would forbear indulging what might be called a pious wantonness of imagination; yet I should much rather choose, in expounding the Scriptures, to ramble with Augustine, than err with Grotius, see, or think I see, my Saviour, even where it may not perhaps be easy to make out the traces of his dignity to the satisfaction of a rigorous inquirer; rather than shut my eyes upon the display of his perfections when they beam forth with the most inviting beauty.

Ther. How soon is this walk finished! How imperceptibly has the time stole away! These garden-gates I always used to approach with a particular complacency. They seemed to afford me a welcome retreat from the impertinence and vanity of the world. Now, methinks, I enter them with reluctance, because they are likely to put a period to this agreeable conversation. However, as my Aspasio enters with me, I am reconciled, I am satisfied. It will be in his power to restore the pleasure which must now be interrupted. And this is what I shall ere long request; because I have not spoke my whole mind upon the present subject.

Asp. Whenever you think proper, Theron. This is to me a favourite subject; and not to me only, but to incomparably better judges. The man who had been caught up into the third heavens, and seen the visions of God, "determined to know nothing but Jesus Christ, and him crucified," (1 Cor. ii. 2.) At the grandest assembly that ever was convened on earth, this furnished the principal, if not the only topic of conversation. And in that world where the voice of joy and thanksgiving is perpetually heard, this constitutes the burden of the song, "Thou wast slain, and hast redeemed us to God by thy blood," (Rev. v. 9.)

DIALOGUE IV.

Ther. I must now desire my Aspasio to inform me, what that grand assembly was, (which he mentioned in the close of our last discourse), and where convened?

Asp. Can you not guess, Theron?—Was it in the plains of Thessaly, when Xerxes drew together the forces of more than half the known world, and appeared at the head of all the potentates of the east? Was it in the Roman forum, when the Senators were assembled in their robes, and the barbarians took them for a synod of gods? No: it was on the mount of transfiguration, where the Son of the true God, the Lord of eternal glory, shone forth in some of his celestial and native splendour; with garments white as the snow,* and a countenance bright as the sun: where he conversed with two of his most distinguished saints, just come down from the regions of bliss and immortality; with Moses the great deliverer of the law, and with Elijah the resolute restorer of its honours: where he was attended by three of his principal ambassadors, who were to be the reformers of mankind, and the lights of the world.

This, I think, is the most venerable and august assembly that the annals of history have recorded. And what was the topic of conversation among these illustrious personages? Not the affairs of state, nor the revolutions of empires; not the curious refinements of literature, nor the wonderful discoveries of philosophy; but the ignominious and bloody exit† which the divine Jesus was soon to make at Jerusalem. This circumstance, methinks, should strongly recommend the subject to our frequent discourse, even though it was less eminent for intrinsic dignity, and comfortable import.

Talking in this manner, they arrive at the park; which the moment you enter, fills the view with its bold, enlarged, and magnificent sweep. It was diversified with level and rising ground. Here scooped into mimic amphitheatres, with the deer pendent on the little summit, or shooting down the easy precipice; there raised into gentle hillocks, some of which were canopied with a large spreading, solitary oak, others were tufted with a cluster of tapering and verdant elms. Two or three cascades, gleaming from afar, as they poured along the slanting rock or the grassy slope, gave a pleasing variation to the prospect; while they startled the timorous inexperienced fawns with their foaming current and watery roar. Grandeur and simplicity seemed to be the genius of the place. Every thing breathed an air of noble negligence, and artless majesty.

In the centre of all rose a curious romantic mount. Its form was exactly round, somewhat like a sugar-loaf, lopt off a little below the point. Not coeval with nature, but the work of human industry. Thrown up, it is supposed, in those perilous times, when Britain was alarmed by foreign invasions, or bled with intestine wounds. It was covered, all around, with alder shrubs; whose ranks, gradually arising, and spreading, shade above shade, composed a kind of woody theatre, through which were struck two or three spiral walks, leading, by a gentle ascent, and under embowering verdure to the summit. At proper intervals, and on every side of the hill, were formed little arborets with apertures cut through boughs to admit a prospect of the country. In one or other of these leafy boxes you command, at every hour of the day, either the enlivening sun, or the refreshing shade. All along the circling avenues, and all around the beauteous rests, sprung daffodils, primroses, and violets; which, mingling with hyacinths and cowslips, composed many a charming piece of natural mosaic.

How agreeable, as they climb and wind themselves round the hill, to reflect on the happy change which has now taken place! Where steely helmets gleamed, or brazen shields clashed, the goldfinches twitter their loves, and display their painted plumes. The dens of rapine, or the horrid haunts of bloodshed, are become the retreats of calm contemplation, and friendly converse. In yonder lower spaces, where the armed troops were wont to patrol, from whence they made excursions to ravage the villages

* Mark ix. 3. The evangelist's description is, like the scene, remarkably bright, and the gradation of his images is almost as worthy of observation as the memorable fact. The garments were white—exceeding white—white as the snow—whiter than any fuller on earth could make them: surpassing all the works of art, equalling the first and finest productions of nature. Nay, so great was the lustre, that it glittered like the lightning, and even dazzled the sight.

† Does not this very delicately, yet very strongly intimate, that the sufferings and death of Christ were the principal end of the Mosaic institutions, and the principal subject of the prophetic teachings? For is it not natural to suppose, that Moses and Elijah intended, when ministering on earth, that very thing, which their conversation dwelt upon, when they descended from heaven?

or terrify the swains, the fallow-deer trip lightly or the full-headed stags stand at bay.

From a small eminence, but at a considerable distance, gushed a couple of springs, which, rambling through a grove, lost one another in the shady labyrinth. Emerging at length from the gloom, they approached nearer and nearer, and fell into embraces at the foot of this hill. They rolled, in amicable conjunction along the pebbly channel which encircles its basis, and added their sober melody to the sprightly warbling of the birds. Flowing off in one common stream, they formed the fine pieces of water which beautified the park. From thence they stole into the meadow, and widened into a river. There, enamoured, as it were with each other, they glide by wealthy towns, and sweep through flowery vales; regardless of the blooming toys which deck the one, and of the noisy crowds which throng the other.

So, said Aspasio, may Theron and his Selina, pleasing and pleased with each other, pass through the busy and the amusing scenes of life; neither captivated by the one, nor anxious for the other. With such harmonious agreement, and indissoluble union, may they pursue the course marked out by Providence, their happiness increasing, and their usefulness enlarging, as they draw nearer the Ocean of all good! Then, parted by a gentle stroke of fate, like the waters of some ample stream severed by the piers of an intervening bridge, may they speedily reunite! reunite in consummate bliss, and never be separated more!

Ther. I thank you, Aspasio, for your affectionate compliment. Nor can I wish you, by way of return, a greater recompence, than the continual exercise of such a benovolent temper. For to exercise benevolence, is to enjoy the most refined and exalted pleasure; such as makes the nearest approaches to the felicity of the Eternal Mind, who, as the Scripture most beautifully speaks, "has pleasure in the prosperity of his servants."

But while we are seated on this mount, our situation reminds us of (what you just now mentioned) the grand conference relating to the death of Christ—a business for which you have indeed accounted, but in a manner that may be thought not the most honourable to the divine attributes.

Asp. I have represented it as a ransom for our souls, and a sacrifice for our sins. If you disapprove my account, be pleased to favour me with your own. For what purpose, according to your opinion, did that ever-blessed person die?

Ther. To confirm the truth of his doctrine, and leave us a pattern of the most perfect resignation.

Asp. And is this all? Shall we thus impoverish the riches of grace? Was this notion defensible, it could never be desirable. But it has as little to support it as it has to recommend it. For, upon such a supposition, where is the difference between the death of Christ and the death of the martyrs? They confirmed the truth of the gospel: In their sufferings was obedience and resignation, the same in quality, though not in degree. Upon such a supposition, what benefit could the ancient patriarchs receive from the Redeemer; since none could be improved by the example of his patience, or the pattern of his obedience, till they were actually exhibited, or how could Christ be styled "the Lamb slain from the foundation of the world?" (Rev. xiii. 8.) the advantages of whose death commenced from the very beginning, as they will be prolonged even to the end of time.

Not to depend on consequential arguments, let us hear the express declaration of our divine Master himself: "This is my blood, which is shed,"—for what? To give credibility to my gospel, or yield an example of entire resignation! Rather—"for the remission of sins," (Matth. xxvi. 28.) Will any one attempt to make the remission of sins, and the proposal of a pattern, or the ratification of a doctrine, synonymous terms? They who can torture and transmute the genuine sense of words at this extraordinary rate, may metamorphose any expression into any meaning.

If, then, we would consider our Lord's death in its due amplitude, we must consider it both as a pattern of piety and as a ransom for sinners: we must neither separate nor confound these very distinct, yet very consistent effects.

Ther. Is it not inconsistent with the acknowledged principles of justice, that the innocent should be punished instead of the offender?

Asp. If the innocent person has an absolute power over his own life, willingly substitutes himself in the place of the guilty, and by his vicarious sufferings fully answers all the purposes of a righteous government;—in this case, which was the case with our Lord, I see not the least repugnancy to the rules of justice.

The Bible, that authentic transcript of the counsels of heaven, avows, and by avowing, vindicates the practice, "The Lord hath laid on him the iniquity of us all.* When all we like sheep had gone astray, and were exposed to the stroke of vengeance, as those wandering creatures to the ravenous beasts ; the good shepherd interposed, and the just God made that vengeance to fall upon him, which must otherwise have been executed upon us. "He suffered," says another inspired writer, "the just for the unjust," (1 Pet. iii. 18.) that, by expiating our guilt, "he might bring us to God ;" now to his gracious favour, hereafter to his blissful presence.

* Isa liii. 6. תפכיעו בו made to meet, or fall upon, in a hostile vindictive manner; with a design to take vengeance, or inflict death: as an armed man falls upon his enemy, or a fierce lion on the helpless lamb.

You will permit me to add a passage from our common favourite, Milton. Because it is no less beautiful in itself, than it is pertinent to the occasion ; must please the critic, and may expound the apostle. Messiah, pleading in behalf of fallen man, thus addresses his Almighty Father :

—" Man dead in sins and lost,
Atonement for himself, or offering meet,
(Indebted and undone !) hath none to bring.
Behold me then ! me for him ! life for life
I offer. On me let thine anger fall.
Account me man : I for his sake will leave
Thy bosom, and this glory next to thee
Freely put off ; and for him lastly die
Well-pleas'd : on me let death wreak all his rage."
Milton, b. iii. l. 233.

Ther. The fine imagination of a poet will hardly pass for a decisive argument. When we are searching after truth, we must attend to the dictates of reason, not follow the vagaries of fancy. And reason, Aspasio, remonstrates against your notion of a vicarious sacrifice ; Reason, that primary guide, and final test, both in discovering and determining the sense of Scripture.

Asp. Suppose you, then, my dear Theron, that none are in possession of reason but the pupils of Socinus, and the zealots for Deism ? or that none make use of reason in their religious inquiries, but men of this mould ?

Wrong not the Christian, think not reason your's ;
'Tis reason our great Master holds so dear :
'Tis reason's injured rights his wrath resents ;
'Tis reason's voice obeyed his glorious crown,
Through reason's wounds alone thy faith can die.
Night Thoughts, No. IV.

Poets, you see, are far from disclaiming reason. Equally far is Christianity from discarding the sober, the sanctified use of this noble faculty. When reason is under the influence and direction of the divine Spirit, we have the same high opinion of her excellence as yourself. And, when thus regulated, we have, I am persuaded, the sanction of her authority for all our sentiments.

Reason, as she operated in the sagest of the heathen world, instead of rejecting, approved and adopted this very scheme ; approved it even under the disadvantage of a mutilated and defective, or rather of a perverted and dead form. The current language of the classic authors, and almost every historian of Greece and Rome, are vouchers for the truth of this observation. As the Gentiles were unanimous in the custom of offering sacrifices, and equally unanimous in supposing their vicarious nature, so also are the Jewish writers.

Ther. What man of sense pays any regard to the Jewish writers ? Legendary they are, and extravagant to the last degree. Dotards I might call them, rather than writers.

Asp. They are, I believe, extravagant enough in their comments upon Scripture ; but they relate, with sufficient exactness and fidelity, the prevailing belief of their nation. In this case, their testimony is as unexceptionable, as, in the other, their notions are chimerical. Now, had it been a mistaken belief, surely our blessed Lord, that infallible judge, and impartial reprover, would have testified his disapprobation of it. Surely his disciples, who were actuated by the unerring and undaunted spirit of their Master, would have entered their protest against it. Surely St. Paul, in his epistle to that very people, and in his treatise on that very subject, would have set himself to rectify such an error, and have weeded out the tares before he sowed the good seed. But there is not the least hint of this kind in all the discourses of our Saviour, or in all the writings of his apostles.

They speak to a people who were accustomed to look upon their sacrifices as peculiar oblations,* and a typical expiation of guilt. They speak of our Redeemer's crucifixion, and the benefits of his death, in the sacrificial terms, that were of current use and established signification. If, therefore, the popular opinion was improper, their manner of expression and address must be calculated rather to authenticate error, than to propagate truth. So that, I think, even the silence of the inspired penmen on this occasion, is but little inferior to a loud attestation. Did they only say nothing against the doctrine of satisfaction by sacrifice, it would in effect, and circumstances considered, be saying abundance for it. But they are very copious and explicit upon the point.

Ther. Where are they so copious ? If you have such a heap of their allegations, it will be easy to pick out a few, and give us a specimen.

Asp. It is as easy, Theron, as it is delightful. "Messiah shall be cut off," says the Prophet Daniel, "but not for himself." (Dan. ix. 26.) For whom then, and for what ? Isaiah informs us concerning both. "For the transgression of my people was he stricken," (Isaiah liii. 8.) Because this is an article of the last importance, it is repeated, it is confirmed, it is explained, with the most remarkable particularity : "He was wounded for our transgressions ; he was bruised for our iniquities ; the chastisement of our peace was upon him, and with his stripes we are healed." (Isaiah liii. 5.) Our Lord himself asserts the same truth in the very same style : " I am the good shepherd, and lay down my life for the sheep," (John x. 15.) St. Paul, in a multitude of passages, sets his seal to this momentous doctrine. St. Peter maintains it in very forcible words : " Who his own self bare our sins in his own body on the tree.*"

The sacred writers not only assert this capital article, but use every diversity of speech, in order to give it the fullest evidence, and the strongest establishment. " He made reconciliation for the sins of the people." (Heb. ii. 17.) " Jesus Christ the righteous is the propitiation for our sins." (1 John ii. 2.) " He loved us, and washed us from our sins in his own blood." (Rev. i. 5.) " He was made sin for us, though he knew no sin." (2 Cor. v. 21.)

Ther. Nobody makes any objection to these texts ; but the sense, the true sense of such phrases, is the thing in question.

Asp. What you call the question, to me appears so plain, as not to want a decision, or admit of a doubt. However, since you seem to demand a critical scrutiny, it will not be thought pedantic if I make an observation or two upon the original languages ; or rather, as you are not acquainted with the Hebrew, on that language of which you yourself are a judge and a master.

If one died for all, then were all dead. The preposition ὅτι in this connexion, must necessarily signify more than " on our account, or for our advantage." Because, if it be taken in this unsettled rambling sense, the apostle's argument is vague and inconclusive. In case our Lord had suffered, only " to free us from some evil, and procure us some benefit," this would by no means imply that all were dead, under the sentence of condemnation, obnoxious, and doomed to death. (2 Cor. v. 14.) The utmost you can infer from such premises is, that all stood in need of a deliverance from some evil, or wanted the procurement of some good. Whereas, suppose the sacred writer to intend that our Lord's death was truly vicarious, and undergone in our stead ; that he suffered what was our due and our doom ; then the reasoning is just, and the inference undeniable.

He gave himself ἀντιλυτρον ἡμῶν, a ransom for all. (1 Tim. ii. 6.) If this does not imply the notion of vicarious, I very much question whether language itself can express it. Δυτρον is a ransom, which conveys a vicarious sense, in its most common and authorized acceptation. Ἀντι, which is equivalent to instead,* still more fully ascertains and strengthens the idea. Ῥυτρον, which is translated for, and denotes a substitution of one in the place of another; † this added to all, renders the expression as determinate and emphatical for the purpose, as words can possibly be.

Shall I argue from a more obvious topic, which has no such dependence on the precise significancy of the original ? " Surely," says the prophet; he speaks with vehemence, as of an affair which is very weighty ; he speaks with confidence, as of a fact which is very certain : " He hath borne our griefs, and carried our sorrows, (Isa. liii. 4.) What can this mean, but he hath taken upon himself that affliction and those miseries which properly belong to us ? Let us read on, and this meaning will present itself in the clearest view. " We did esteem him stricken, smitten of God, and afflicted;" we took him for a real malefactor, and thought that he was punished for his own misconduct. In opposition to which injurious and false surmise it is added, " but he was wounded for our transgressions, he was bruised for our iniquities." May I not here borrow the prophet's language, and say, with an air of certainty, Surely this is the plainest proof in the world, that our sins were the meritorious cause of Christ's sufferings; and if our sins were the meritorious cause of his sufferings, our guilt must be charged upon him, and punished in him.

St. Paul affirms that " Christ hath delivered us from the curse of the law," (Gal. iii. 13.) How ? By taking our place, and enduring what we deserved; or, as the apostle himself speaks, to the same effect, but in a much more emphatical manner, " by being made a curse for us." Does not this evidently denote both a commutation of persons, and a translation of punishment ? He suffered, who was innocent; not we, who were guilty. He also suffered that very sentence which the law denounced on us, for it is written, " Cursed is every one that continueth not in all things," (Deut. xxvii. 26.) to this we were obnoxious. It is written again, " Cursed is every one that hangeth on a tree," Gal. iii. 13.) to this Christ submitted. And if Christ endured that very curse which we deserved—if, by this means, he delivered us from all malediction—either this must be suffering in our stead, or else nothing can be called by that name.

* Ἀντι, Matt. ii. 22. By this word, the septuagint translate the Hebrew, תחת. And that תחת denotes the substitution of one instead of another, no student of the sacred language will venture to deny. See Gen. xxii. 13; 2 Sam. xviii. 33; 2 Kings x. 24.

† Δεσμεῖσθαι ὑπὲρ Χριστοῦ " We beseech you in Christ's stead," 2 Cor. v. 20. Ἰνὲ ὑπὲρ σου διακονῆσαι, that in thy stead he might have ministered unto me. Philem ver. 13.

* 1 Pet. ii. 24. Very forcible words indeed. He bare—himself bare—our sins—in his own body; intended, one would imagine, to make the article of our Lord's vicarious sufferings clear beyond all misapprehension, and sure beyond all doubt.

Shall I descend lower still, and refer our point to the determination of illiterate men? Ask any of your serious tenants, what ideas arise in their minds, upon the perusal of the aforementioned texts? I dare venture to foretell, that artless and unimproved as their understandings are, they will not hesitate for an answer. They will neither complain of obscurity, nor ask the assistance of learning; but will immediately discern, in all these passages, a gracious Redeemer suffering in their stead, and by his bitter, but expiatory passion, procuring the pardon of their sins. Nay farther, as they are not accustomed to the finesses of criticism, I apprehend they will be at a loss to conceive how it is possible to understand such passages in any other sense.

Say not this is an improper appeal, or these are incompetent judges. The Scriptures were written for their edification; not to exercise the ingenuity of subtle disputants, but to instruct the meanest of mankind in the way of salvation. Therefore, on fundamental articles, we may assuredly conclude the expression will be easy, and the doctrine perspicuous; so that "he who runs may read, and the wayfaring men, though fools, shall not err therein."* And though I am far from undervaluing the aids of literature, yet, upon those momentous subjects which are inseparably connected with our eternal felicity, I cannot but regard the common sense of plain, honest, humble Christians, as the very best of critics.

Ther. It has been said by a learned critic, "That a vicarious punishment or suffering gives us too low ideas of the Son of God, as it sinks them to the pain and suffering of a malefactor, the very meanest idea we can have of them.

Asp. The idea is plainly suggested by the word of prophecy, and supported by the attestation of sacred history. In that it was foretold, and in this it is recorded "that he was numbered with transgressors," (Isa. liii. 12; Luke xxii. 37.) To this purpose speaks St. Paul, though somewhat more cautiously than your critic. He was made, not indeed sinful flesh, but in the likeness of sinful flesh; and though perfectly innocent, was left to endure the vengeance due to the vilest miscreants.

Yes, my dear Theron, that glorious person, whom the highest angel adores, "suffered, as if he had been the criminal, the pain and punishment which we, or equivalent to that which we, the real criminals, should have suffered." If to consider this, gives us a low idea—if to suffer this, was a deep abasement—how exceedingly high, and how immensely grand is the goodness and the grace manifested therein! the lower you draw the arrow on the string, the loftier flight it makes in the sky, and the greater our Lord's humiliation for us, the more wonderful and adorable his love to us.

Ther. As there cannot be a vicarious guilt, or as no one can be guilty in the stead of another, so there cannot be a vicarious punishment, or no one can be punished instead of another; because punishment, in its very nature, connotes guilt in the person who bears it.

Asp. If you mean by guilt the consciousness of having committed a sin, and the internal defilement consequent upon it, we never suppose such a vicarious guilt. It is not so much as intimated, that Christ was stung with the remorse, or stained with the pollution of the adulterous David, the perfidious Peter, and the persecuting Saul; but that he was treated by the righteous God as if he had perpetrated these, and all the crimes of all believers, either in the past or succeeding ages.

If by guilt you mean the charge of a criminal action, and the obligation to suffer the penalty, your assertion is nothing more than begging the question. It nakedly affirms the very thing in debate: and bare affirmations, unsupported by evidence, are seldom admitted as decisive proofs. We, on the other hand, are inclined to believe, that all our criminal actions were charged upon Christ, and that he suffered the punishment which they deserved. The former of these is not so properly called vicarious guilt, as real guilt—contracted by one, imputed to another. The latter we readily allow to be vicarious punishment, sustained in their stead whose guilt was imputed. For both these points we have the authority of truth itself, speaking in the Scriptures, "The Lord laid on him the iniquities of us all:" here is the imputation, "Christ has redeemed us from the curse of the law, being made a curse for us;" here is the vicarious punishment. And you know to what casuists we submit the interpretation of these texts—common sense, and an honest heart.

Ther. Is not this shocking to suppose? horrid to affirm? If guilt was really imputed to Christ, then punishment was his due. Justice might insist upon it, and he could not escape it.

Asp. To suppose this, is so far from shocking my apprehension, that it appears, even on your own principles, right and necessary. Right, because punishment, as you yourself have declared, always connotes guilt; I would add either contracted, or at least imputed. And indeed the sufferings of Christ could not be of a penal nature, unless he endured them as under a charge of guilt. It is necessary to suppose this, otherwise how will you vindicate the justice of God? He bid his sword awake, and smite the blessed Jesus, (Zech. xiii. 7.) But shall the Judge of all the earth do wrong? Shall he smite, where there is nothing but innocence? no guilt, either personal or imputed? That be far from him! The thought be far from us!

* Isa. xxxv. 8. The word fools seems to denote persons of slow understanding and dull apprehensions, as Luke xxiv. 25: or else it signifies those who, for want of a cultivated education and the improvements of literature, are accounted fools by the sons of science, as 1 Cor. i. 27.

Whereas, upon this supposition, it becomes a just and righteous thing, that God should inflict, and that Christ should sustain, the most rigorous punishment. And I do not know but this might be the cause of our Lord's silence, when he was accused at Pilate's bar and at Herod's judgment-seat. It is probable he considered himself as standing before a higher tribunal, and responsible to eternal justice for the criminal actions of all his people. In this situation, and in this capacity, clear himself of personal demerit he could, clear himself of imputed guilt he could not. Therefore he was dumb, he opened not his mouth. For though, as the Son of the most high God, glory and immortality were his undoubted right; yet, as the Surety for sinful men, tribulation and death were his condign portion.

And why should this be thought shocking? It is not the least derogation to the transcendent excellency of Christ. It casts not the least stain on the unspotted sanctity either of his nature or his life. To bear sin as a voluntary surety, is infinitely different from committing it as an actual transgressor. To say that Christ was punished for any irregularity of his own, would be false, impious, and horrid. To say that he was charged with our guilt, and endured the punishment due—in the plain and full sense of the word—due to our sins, is so far from being injurious to his dignity, that it pays the proper honour to his mediatorial undertaking. It pays him the honour of the highest obedience to his Father's will, the deepest humiliation of his own illustrious person, and the most boundless benevolence to mankind.

Ther. God is love, Aspasio, all love. Whereas you would—

Asp. Not often interrupt a friend's discourse. But I cannot forbear interposing a query, on this occasion. Is there, then, no just displeasure in the Deity? What meaneth that solemn denunciation of the supreme Lawgiver? "The anger of the Lord shall smoke against that man?" (Deut. xxix. 20.) What meaneth that awful declaration of the Apostle; "The wrath of God is revealed from heaven, upon all ungodliness and unrighteousness of men?" (Rom. i. 18.) Or in what sense are we to explain that alarming interrogatory of the prophet, "Who can stand before his indignation? and who can abide in the fierceness of his anger?" (Nah. i. 6.) Whence could those avenging visitations proceed, which destroyed Sodom and Gomorrah with a tempest of fire? (Gen. xix. 24.) which swept away so many thousands of the polluted Israelites with a raging pestilence? (Numb. xxv. 9.) and consigned over so many legions* of rebellious angels to chains of darkness?

Surely, Theron, if there be any determinate signification in language, if any lesson to be learned from the most tremendous judgments, it is, that the Lord, though free from all the discomposure of passion, is nevertheless angry with the wicked, (Psal. vii. 11. Deut. ix. 8.) and will make impenitent offenders feel the effects of his wise and holy indignation.

Ther. Does not your doctrine represent the all-merciful God as a rigorous being, who, when once displeased, will hardly be pacified? Whereas, the Lord himself declares by his prophet, "Fury is not in me." Men of satirical wit would be apt to insinuate, that you had mistaken Jehovah for Moloch, and was erecting a Christian church in the valley of the Son of Hinnom.

Asp. We take our representations of God, not from the vain conjectures of men, but from the records of infallible truth. There he is described as a righteous God, a jealous God, (Exod. xx. 5.) and, to incorrigible sinners, a consuming fire, (Heb. xii. 29.) though wonderfully condescending, yet transcendently majestic, insomuch that none of the fallen race are permitted to approach his throne, but only through the intervention of a great Mediator, (John. xiv. 6.) and without shedding of blood, even the blood of a person higher than the heavens, there is no remission of any offences, (Heb. ix. 22; vii. 26.)

When the Lord says, "Fury is not in me," (Isa. xxvii. 4.) the words have a peculiar reference to his church, which, in the preceding verse, he had styled, "a vineyard of red wine." The connexion seems to denote, that his fierce anger was turned away from his people, on account of the satisfaction made by their Saviour. Though his own people are the objects, not of his indignation, but of his love, let no ungodly wretches audaciously presume: It is not so with them. They are "the briars and thorns"* mentioned in the next clause; cumberers of the ground, unprofitable and noxious. Then he warns, then he challenges: "Who will set them in battle against me?" Let them come on; they shall find it a fearful thing to fall into the hands of the living God.

* Millions.—The name of the fallen angels is nowhere specified, and the veil sits deep upon the spiritual world; so that we can see no farther than revelation has discovered. Yet, I think, there is sufficient room to ground a conjecture upon the reply which one of those execrable apostates made to our Lord. "My name is legion," (a word signifying a great multitude, five or six thousand;) "for we are many." If so many were employed in tempting and tormenting a single person, what armies, what myriads of those invisible enemies, must exist through universal nature? It is an alarming thought! should make us fly to our divine Protector, and almighty Deliverer. See Mark v. 9, and 2 Pet. ii. 4.

Nay, he will not stay for their approach: "I will march against them," in his threatening: "I will pass through them; I will burn them together." This will certainly be the case, if not in the present yet in a future world. When once the master of the house is risen up, and has shut to the door, mercy is gone for ever. Then nothing must be expected, nothing will then be experienced, but "vengeance and fiery indignation, to devour the adversaries of the gospel." God will then "execute judgments in anger, and in fury, and in furious rebukes," (Ezek. v. 15.) with such awful severity and immense glory, as will cause heaven to adore, and hell to tremble.

Yet in all this there is not the least tincture of that outrageous temper, which in man we properly call fury. In man, fury implies an immoderate degree of resentment, which will hearken to no reasoning, and accede to no terms. The gospel account proves, even to a demonstration, that this has no place in the divine nature. So far from it, that God, though highly provoked, has provided an atonement, has made overtures of reconciliation to his disobedient creatures, has even besought† a guilty world, to accept of forgiveness, (2 Cor. v. 20.) This is the purport of that gracious invitation which follows in the prophet: "Let him," let the wicked man forsake his way, "and take hold of my strength;" let him fly to my crucified Son, who is the power of God for the salvation of sinners; cleaving to his merits by faith, as some poor delinquent to the horns of the altar.‡ Thus he shall make peace;

* There is a fine contrast between the vineyard and the thorns, at the same time a regular continuation of the metaphor. As nothing is more common than to see the latter shooting up amidst the former; so nothing is more common than to have hypocrites intermingle themselves with believers.

† 2 Cor. v. 20. It was an instance of singular compassion in the blessed God, that though offended with Job's friends, he admitted of a sacrifice, and directed them to an intercessor; both typical of Christ Jesus. But what unparalleled condescension, and divinely tender mercies, are displayed in this verse! "As though God did beseech you by us; we pray you in Christ's stead, be ye reconciled to God." Did the judge ever beseech a condemned criminal to accept of pardon? Does the creditor beseech a ruined debtor to receive an acquittance in full; yet our almighty Lord, and our eternal Judge, not only vouchsafes to offer these blessings, but invites us—entreats us—with the most tender and repeated importunity solicits us—not to reject them?

‡ This is the precise idea included in the original וְיָשׁוּב and the idea is as charming, as the image is expressive. Isa. xxvii. 5. 1 Kings i. 50.

all his iniquities shall be forgiven, and all my displeasure shall be pacified. So that the insinuations of our satirical gentlemen are as egregiously mistaken, as they are shockingly worded.

You are a man of sense, Theron, and esteem that character far above the idle reputation of a wit. As such, let me ask you seriously, is it not for the honour of the divine majesty to exercise justice as well as mercy? Always to pardon, and never to punish, would be tameness, rather than benignity; a renunciation of holiness, rather than a display of goodness. Or can it be right in us so extravagantly to magnify the amiable, as depreciate, nay even annihilate, the awful attributes of Deity: This, says a poet, is the theology, not of Christians, but of infidels;

Who set at odds heaven's jarring attributes,
And with one excellence another wound;
Maim heaven's perfection, break its equal beams,
Bid mercy triumph over—God himself,
Undeified by their opprobrious praise:
A God all mercy is a God unjust.

Night Thoughts, No. IV.

Ther. But we have lately been told, that the pardoning grace of the Lawgiver is not obstructed by any demands of law and justice; for he can set them aside.

Asp. What! Set aside a law, which is holy, righteous and good! set aside a justice, which is eternal, inflexible, and infinite!—St. Paul gives a very different solution of this difficulty. He tells us, not that God set aside his law and his justice; "but that he set forth the blessed Jesus for a propitiation, through faith in his blood," with this express design, "that he might declare his righteousness," (Rom. iii. 25.) might demonstrate, not only his clemency, but his justice, even that vindictive justice whose essential character and principal office is to punish sin.

This seems to be the import of the word righteousness in the present connexion, and, I think, more than seems, if we consult the following verse, "to declare, I say, at this time his righteousness, that he might be just,"* evidence himself to be strictly and inviolably righteous, in the administration of his government; even while he is the all-forgiving, gracious justifier of the sinner that believeth in Jesus. According to this plan, mercy and truth meet together; righteousness and peace kiss each other," (Psalm lxxxv. 10.) all the attributes harmonize; every attribute is glorified; and not one superseded; no, nor so much as clouded.

Ther. If some are verging to one extreme, are not you inclining to the other? Our ears tingle, and our blood runs chill, at the very thoughts of so severe a vengeance, executed on an object so worthy and illustrious. Besides, how can we suppose that the beneficent Creator and preserver of men should take pleasure in the sufferings of the most unblamable person that ever existed? Especially since he himself has made this tender declaration, "I will have mercy and not sacrifice." (Matt. ix. 13.)

Asp. A tender declaration indeed it is; signifying, that God is better pleased with the duties of humanity and charity, than with the most costly and pompous train of sacrifices; nay, that he will even dispense with the observance of his own ceremonial institutions, when they interfere with our exercise of beneficence one to another: thus resigning (so admirable is his goodness!) the services due to himself, for the benefit and comfort of his creatures. But all this has no sort of relation to the sacrifice of Christ, which was the most noble, and the most acceptable oblation ever made to the King of heaven.

We are assured by a prophet, that "it pleased the Lord to bruise his holy child Jesus." God not only gave up his Son to sufferings, but gave him up with a divine complacency.* In like manner, the blessed Jesus addressed himself to the dreadful task, not only without reluctance, but with the utmost alacrity.† "I delight to do thy will," was the language of his soul. Should you ask, how could the Son take pleasure in undergoing, or the Father in inflicting, such amazing sorrows? No otherwise, than upon account of those grand and everlasting advantages which were to result from them.

"A severe vengeance," you say, "such as makes our ears to tingle." This is the very thing intended, to awaken and alarm presumptuous offenders; that they "may hear and fear and do no more wickedly." It is such a method of dispensing grace, as is calculated to strike the deepest terror, even while it cherishes the brightest hope; strike the deepest terror on every persevering sinner—while it cherishes the brightest hope on every penitent transgressor.

Ther. If one of my servants had affronted or injured me, I should upon his submissive acknowledgment, forgive his fault, and not insist upon satisfaction for the wrong. Will you make the father of compassions more inexorable in his nature, more rigid in his demands than a human master?

Asp. When you have a servant that owes his being to your power, that has received innumerable benefits from your bounty, yet has offered you innumerable affronts, all attended with the most aggravating circumstances, and all in defiance of the most righteous threatenings; when you are possessed of infinite majesty, and unblemished sanctity; when truth inviolable, and justice inflexible, are essential to your character; then, Theron, the parallel will hold good, and your conduct shall be a pattern for the procedure of Jehovah.

Till then, you and I must be willing to forgive, because God has made it our own bounden duty; and because we have incomparably more to be forgiven by the Judge of the world, than we can possibly remit to our fellow-creatures. In the mean time, you will allow the great God, who is glorious in holiness, to communicate his heavenly favours in a manner becoming himself; on such august and honourable terms, as shall maintain the rights of his universal government, and manifest the glory of his adorable attributes.

Ther. Might not God have cancelled our transgressions, and received fallen men into his favour, without any propitiation? To deny this, would be to limit the Holy One of Israel, and impose conditions on that uncontrollable Sovereign, "who giveth no account of any of his matters."

Asp. We need not embarrass ourselves by entering upon inquiries, which may seem to lie beyond the limits of human understanding;—enough for us to know, that this propitiation was absolutely necessary with regard to the first covenant. For as God had solemnly declared, "In the day thou eatest thereof, dying thou shalt die," his truth and justice stood engaged to execute the threatening. And no second Adam could restore the first, but by taking this curse upon himself.

"Die man, or justice must; unless for him, Some other able, and as willing, pay
The rigid satisfaction, death for death."
Milton, b. 3. l. 210.

Therefore the divine Jesus, who lay in the bosom of the Father, and knew the counsels of heaven, says, "The Son of man must be lifted up,"* on the cross. There was a necessity for his crucifixion; because this was stipulated in the covenant of peace made between the Father and the Son: because it was expressly foretold by the ancient prophets, (and the scripture cannot be broken), that the Messiah should be cut off out of the land of the living; because a variety of types, and a multitude of sacrifices, prefigured his death: one of the types pointed out the very manner of his suffering; and all the sacrifices, detached from their dependency on this great oblation, would have been beggarly elements—mere unavailing empty ceremonies.

* This is the idea included in the original word הָפַח. Isa. liii. 10. Which is but poorly and faintly represented by the Ἐπέσται of the Septuagint.

† Utmost alacrity—There is no inconsistency between this assertion and our Lord's supplication; "Father, if it be possible, let this cup pass from me; nevertheless, not my will but thine be done." Such a deprecatory request, put up with so much earnestness, yet with so much submission, only shows the extreme severity of our Redeemer's anguish, and the prodigious weight of his woes. And this indeed it shows beyond the power of description. His ardent love to mankind, and his fervent zeal for his Father's glory, prompted him to desire these sufferings. His invincible resolution, and unequalled magnanimity, emboldened him not to decline, but to meet them. Yet they were so great, so terrible, that his nature being human, could not but recoil a little, and he started at their approach, and had it not been divine also, must inevitably have sunk under the load.

* John. iii. 14. ἵνα ἴσθαι, &c. The same expression is used, 1. John. xiv. 26.

I apprehend, it is no limitation of the great God to suppose him incapable of acting otherwise than in perfect and perpetual consistency with himself. Neither is it any infringement on his absolute sovereignty, that he cannot but order all affairs for the honour of his justice, his fidelity, and each of his exalted perfections. This is the very thing which the sacred writers express in their plain but strong language, "God who cannot lie," (Tit. i. 2.) "He cannot deny himself," (2 Tim. ii. 13.)

Ther. God is often said to forgive our sins; particularly in that sublime passage, where he proclaims his name to Moses: "The Lord, the Lord God, merciful and gracious, long-suffering, abundant in goodness and truth; keeping mercy for thousands, forgiving iniquity, transgression, and sin." Now, pardon is a free thing. Freeness is implied in the very nature of forgiveness. Take away the former, and you destroy the latter. If an equivalent be given, pardon is no longer pardon, but a purchase. Forgiveness ceases to be an act of grace, and becomes the payment of a debt.

Asp. The text you quote is truly sublime and equally comfortable. But you forget to mention one article of very great moment, which closes and completes the glorious character; which seems added on purpose to prevent any wrong apprehensions of the Deity, and to guard against all abuse of the doctrine: "He will in no wise clear the guilty."*—God will not, on any consideration whatever, absolve the obstinate, persevering, irreclaimable offender; neither will he acquit any of the guilty race, absolutely, unconditionally, or without such a satisfaction as may repair the honour of his injured law.

* Exod. xxxiv. 7. This text is not without its difficulty, especially in the original. Steuchus interprets the words, Et innocens non erit sine piaculo, "He shall not be acquitted without a piacular sacrifice." I think they may be translated, with a little more propriety and exactness, thus: "Pardoning iniquity, transgression, and sin," וְנָקָה לֹא וְנָקָה though not with impunity: or rather, "though he will by no means let it go unpunished," meaning sin; which is the immediate antecedent, is expressed in the three preceding words, and may very properly be referred to in this clause.

"We have redemption through his blood," says the apostle, "even the forgiveness of our sins," (Eph. i. 7.) It is forgiveness, you see, though bought with a price. It is remission, though procured by blood. It is free with regard to that Sovereign Being who pardons; for he was under no obligation to admit of a propitiatory sacrifice, but might, without any diminution of his dignity, have left all mankind to perish in their sins. It is free with regard to the obnoxious creatures who are pardoned; for it is vouchsafed without any satisfaction demanded at their hands, or any penalty inflicted on their persons. It is in this respect also free, that an interest in the great atonement is granted to us, without the least merit, or any deserving qualifications of our own.

In all this God is not only merciful but most tenderly and immensely merciful. And will any one calumniate this adorable method of exercising mercy, because provision is also made for the glory of God's truth, God's holiness, and supreme authority?

Ther. Does not your notion of a propitiatory sacrifice derogate from the goodness of the Almighty Father, and transfer all our obligations to the incarnate Son?

Asp. Is there not goodness in allowing a substitute to suffer in our stead? Is there not still greater goodness in providing a substitute for us, without any solicitation on our part? Is there not the very highest exertion of goodness, in appointing a dear, an only, an incomparably excellent Son for the purpose? This marvellous scheme, far, very far from obscuring, most illustriously displays the superabundant loving-kindness of the Father.

"God so loved the world," apostate and polluted as it was—How did he love it? To a degree unutterable by any tongue, inconceivable by any imagination, and only to be expressed by the infinitely-precious effects: Loved it so, "that he gave his only begotten Son, that whosoever believeth on him should not perish, but have everlasting life;" (John iii. 16.) And does this derogate from the goodness of the Almighty Father, to give not barely pardon and life, but give them through the hands, nay, through the wounds, the agonies, the death, of his divinest, dearest Son?

Such privileges, vouchsafed on any terms, must challenge the devoutest acknowledgments. But when attended with this additional demonstration of favour, they are enough to inflame us with gratitude, and transport us with admiration. They not only manifest, but commend* the divine love ; show it to the greatest advantage, in the highest perfection, with every circumstance of recommendation and endearment. By this means, blessed God! thou hast unspeakably enhanced thy benefits! thou hast rendered them, though invaluable in themselves, exceedingly more so by the manner of conferring them!

Ther. Again in your elevations, Aspasio? The world, you know, is grown very rational and inquisitive; will admit nothing but upon clear evidence and full conviction. We expect, in all religious inquiries, not the flights of fancy, or the sallies of zeal, but a sobriety of reason and solidity of argument.

Asp. The world, rational as it is, seems, by the taste of the present age, no enemy to works of fancy. The world therefore may not be displeas'd with an affecting story. And a story, suitable to the occasion, just occurs to my mind; such as may serve to shadow forth, though very faintly, the surpassing benignity and grace of our crucified Lord.

An Asiatic queen, departing this life, left behind her three accomplished sons, all arrived to years of maturity. The young princes were at strife who should pay the highest respect to their royal mother's memory. To give scope for their generous contention, they agreed to meet at the place of her interment, and there present the most honourable gift they knew how to devise, or were able to procure.—The eldest came and exhibited a sumptuous monument, consisting of the richest materials, and ornamented with the most exquisite workmanship. The second ransacked all the beauties of the blooming creation; and offered a garland of such admirable colours, and delightful odours, as had never been seen before. The youngest appeared, without any pompous preparation, having only a crystal bason in one hand, and a silver bodkin in the other. As soon as he approached the tomb, he threw open his breast; pierced a vein, that lay opposite to his heart; received the blood in the transparent vase; and, with an air of affectionate reverence, placed it on the beloved parent's monument. The spectators, struck with the sight, burst into a shout of general applause, and immediately gave the preference to this last oblation.

If it was reckoned such a singular expression of love, to expend a few of those precious drops, for the honour of a parent; O how matchless, how ineffable, was the love of Jesus, in pouring out all his vital blood, for the salvation of enemies!

Ther. My greatest objection is still to come. If Christ suffered in our stead, he must suffer that very punishment which was due to our iniquities. This your orthodox divines affirm to be incomparably worse than bodily death; to be nothing else than the everlasting displeasure of God.

Asp. The punishment due to our iniquities, was shame, death, and the divine wrath.

As for shame—Was ever shame like that shame which our despised Redeemer bore? Though prince of the kings of the earth, yet born in a stable, and laid in a manger. When an infant, exiled from his own country, and a vagabond in a foreign land. When engaged in the discharge of his ministry, accused of the most flagitious crimes, and branded with the blackest names. When brought to his exit, apprehended as a thief; condemned as a malefactor, nay, the vilest of malefactors, a robber and a murderer is preferred before him. His executioners poured contempt upon all his venerable offices. As a king, they ridiculed him, by putting a mock sceptre into his hand, and crowning him with ragged thorns* instead of a royal diadem. They vilified his prophetic character by hoodwinking his eyes, striking his blessed head, and then asking, in cruel derision, "who it was that smote him?"† They cast reproach on his priestly undertaking, when they sharpened their tongues with malicious irony, and shot out those bitter words, "He saved others, himself he cannot save," (Matt. xxvii. 42.) To render his infamy as public as it was shocking, they hung him on a tree; and exposed him, defiled as he was with spitting, and disfigured with wounds, to the gazing eyes and contumelious scoffs of numberless spectators.

If you doubt whether Christ sustained the wrath of God, let us follow him to the garden of Gethsemane—a scene, which I would always recollect when I walk along the fertile vale, or expatiate amidst the flowery garden, or enjoy the delights of any rural retirement.—He had no remorse to alarm his spotless conscience; yet fearfulness and trembling came upon him. No violence was offered to his sacred person; yet a horrible dread overwhelmed him. It was night, cold night; and though our divine Master lay prostrate upon the earth, amidst the fall of chilling dews, he sweat—sweat blood—sweat great drops of blood, running down in reeking streams to the ground!—"He was anointed with the oil of gladness above his fellows," (Psal. xlv. 7.) yet so insupportable was his affliction, that he could not forbear crying out, "My soul is sorrowful—exceeding sorrowful—

* To have crowned the blessed Jesus with straw, would have been a vile insult, and treating him like an ambitious madman. But to crown him with keen, pungent, lacerating thorns, was adding cruelty to their insults; unheard-of barbarity to the most contemptuous mockery, Matt. xxvii. 29.

† Scornfully insinuating, that his sacred prophetic office was fit for nothing, but to serve such despicable purposes, Matt. xxvi. 68.

sorrowful even unto death!" (Mat. xxvi. 38.) What cause, what adequate cause, can be assigned for this amazing anguish? None but the wrath of his Almighty Father, who was now become an inexorable Judge; and treated him no longer as the Son of his love, but as the Surety for unnumbered millions of guilty creatures.

Ther. Was it possible that the innocent and holy Jesus, the dearly beloved Son of God, should be an object of his Father's wrath?

Asp. It was not only possible, but unavoidable and necessary: unavoidable, with respect to the divine holiness; necessary, for the procurement of our redemption. Sin was charged upon Christ; all the sins of all believers, in all ages and places of the world. And could the infinitely-righteous God behold such a deluge of iniquities, (those abominable things, which he hateth) without expressing his displeasure? Or could the blessed Jesus be punished, truly punished for them, without any painful sensation of their horrid evil, and of that tremendous indignation which they deserved?

If this was not the case, who can maintain the dignity of his conduct during the agony in the garden? Was there no pouring out of the divine displeasure? Then his behaviour in that hour of trial did not equal the intrepidity of the three Hebrew youths, who continued calm, and without the least perturbation, while the furnace was heated into seven-fold rage, (Dan. iii. 16, 17, 18.) But if this was the time in which, no created arm being strong enough to give the blow, "it pleased the Lord to bruise him," (Isa. liii. 10.) if the most high God "bent his bow like an enemy, and stood with his right hand as an adversary," (Lam. ii. 4.) it is easy to account for the prodigious consternation of our Redeemer. It is not to be wondered, that his heart, though endued with otherwise invincible fortitude, should become like melting wax. For who knoweth the power of that wrath, at which "the pillars of heaven tremble?" (Job. xxvi. 11.)

Ah! Theron, the vinegar and the gall which they gave him to drink, were not half so bitter as the cup of his Father's wrath; yet, for our sake, he drank it off to the very dregs. The nails that pierced his hands, and the spear that cleft his heart, were not half so sharp as the frowns of his eternal Father's countenance; which, for our consolation, he patiently submitted to bear.—He was rent with wounds, and racked with pain; his bones were dislocated, and his nerves convulsed: a thousand thorny daggers were planted in his temples, and life flowed out at ten thousand gushing veins. Yet this, all this was gentle, was lenient, in comparison of those inexpressible agonies, which penetrated his very soul. The former fetched not a single complaint from his mouth; the latter wrung from his breaking heart that passionate exclamation; "My God! my God! why hast thou forsaken me?"—Astonishing words! Surely, a distress, beyond all imagination grievous,* uttered them. Surely, the vengeance, not of men, but of heaven itself, extorted them. Every syllable of which speaks what the mourning prophet describes, "Is it nothing to you, all ye that pass by? Behold and see if there be any sorrow like unto my sorrow, wherewith the Lord hath afflicted me in the day of his fierce anger?" (Lam. i. 12.)

Here now is our whole punishment endured; the shame of the cross, and the sorrows of death; the suspension of the Almighty's favour, and the terrible sensations of his wrath.

Ther. Be it so. Yet all this amounts to no more than part of payment. For these sufferings were transient, temporary only, not eternal. Therefore the main circumstance, the most bitter ingredient, was wanting.

Asp. In the estimate of divine justice, and in point of penal satisfaction, they were equivalent to our endless punishment; especially if we consider the severity of the sufferings and the dignity of the Sufferer.

The severity of the sufferings. At the last day, all those fierce eruptive flames, which have raged in Ætna, in Vesuvius, and in every other burning mountain throughout the world; all those confined subterranean fires, which have so terribly shaken the foundations of Jamaica, Sicily, and Constantinople—in a word, the whole element of fire, however employed through all the revolutions of time, wherever diffused through all the regions of the globe, will then be collected from all quarters, and burst forth into one vast, resistless, general conflagration. In some such manner, all that wrath, which was due to the innum-

* To heighten our idea of this distress, the evangelists make use of the most forcible words—νεξαιτα εκθ. φεισθηαι, he was seized with the most alarming astonishment—αθημοσις, he was overwhelmed with insupportable dejection—σφιλωσις, he was besieged on all sides, as it were, with an army of invading sorrows—He wrestled amidst strong cries and tears, not only with the malice of men and rage of devils, but with the infinitely more dreaded indignation of God; he wrestled even unto an agony of spirit, αγωνια. All these circumstances of horror and anguish, constitute what a celebrated poet very justly styles,

"A weight of woe more than ten worlds could bear!"

The critic, probably, will admire the propriety and beauty of this line, which, composed of nothing but monosyllables, and clogged with the frequent repetition of a cumbrous consonant, makes the sound remarkably apposite to the sense. May we all be sacred critics! have not only a refined taste to relish such elegancies of composition, but an awakened heart, to feel the energy of such important truths.

able multitude of sinners, redeemed from every kindred, and tongue, and people, and nation, which, if executed on the offending creatures, had been prolonged to eternal ages—all that wrath was contracted into one inconceivably dreadful blaze, and at once poured out upon the interposing Surety; at once flamed forth on our heavenly victim. This will appear more than probable, if, among other particulars, we contemplate the unequalled magnanimity of our Lord, who is styled “the Lion of the tribe of Judah,” (Rev. vi. 5.) and compare it with his bloody sweat in the garden, and his exceeding bitter cry on the cross.*

The dignity of the Sufferer.—Had our Saviour’s sufferings been the sufferings of a mere man, or of the most exalted angel, I acknowledge they could have bore no proportion to our demerit. It were impossible for a finite being to sustain the wrath, or discharge the debt. But they were the sufferings of the Prince of Heaven, and the Lord of Glory; before whom all men are as dust, and all angels as worms. Was an infinite Majesty offended? An infinite Mediator atoned. Weigh the dignity, the immense dignity of the Redeemer’s person, against the everlasting duration of our punishment, and it will not only counterbalance, but preponderate. Finite creatures can never make an infinite satisfaction; no, not through the most unlimited revolution of ages. Whereas, when our divine Lord undertook the work, being truly and properly infinite, he finished it at once. So that his sufferings, though temporary, have an all-sufficiency of merit and efficacy. They are, in this respect, parallel; nay, on account of the infinitude of his nature, they are more than parallel to an eternity of our punishment.

It was Emmanuel, it was the incarnate God, who purchased the church, and redeemed sinners, with his own blood. (Acts xx. 28.) The essential grandeur of our Saviour communicated its ennobling influence to every tear he shed, to every sigh he heaved, and every pang he felt.

This renders his sufferings a perfect, as their vicarious nature renders them a proper, satisfaction. And though “the wood of Lebanon was not sufficient to burn, nor all the beasts thereof sufficient for a burnt-offering,” (Isa. xl. 16,) this sacrifice fully answers the exigence of the case. This sacrifice sends up an ever-acceptable odour to the skies, and diffuses its sweet perfume through all generations; such as appeases heaven, and revives the world.

Yes, Theron, you must give me leave to

* I think the language of the Greek liturgy is the language of strict propriety, as well as of fervent devotion, Δὲ ἀγρίων ἢ παθημάτων. The sufferings of our Lord are, in their measure and weight, to us unknown; absolutely beyond the reach of human imagination.

repeat the delightful truth: It was “the great God, even our Saviour Jesus Christ, who gave himself for us.” (Tit. ii. 13, 14.) His sacrifice, therefore, must be inconceivably meritorious. O that sinners, the vilest of sinners, knew its all-sufficient efficacy! they would no longer be holden in the bonds of iniquity, by that destructive suggestion of the devil, “There is no hope.” (Jer. ii. 25.)

Ther. What valuable end could such vicarious sufferings accomplish? Suppose God absolutely inexorable, and they cannot avail. Suppose him divinely merciful, and they are needless.

Asp. The difficulty you propose, I think, has been obviated already; so that I have no occasion to solve your dilemma, but only to answer your query. These sufferings, as a punishment, gave ample satisfaction to the divine violated law; as a sacrifice, they perfectly reconciled us to our offended God; as a price, they redeemed us from every evil, and purchased for us a title to all good.

This is a subject of the most distinguished importance. Let not my Theron imagine, I would abuse his patience, if I dwell a moment longer on the favourite topic. I might enumerate many ends, all magnificent and gracious, accomplished by this wonderful expedient. I content myself with specifying a few; but those, such as bring the highest glory to God, administer the most solid comfort to man, and most effectually promote the interests of piety.

In this we have a manifestation of the most awful justice, and at the same time a display of unbounded goodness. Awful justice, in that the great and terrible God, though determined to exercise mercy, would exercise it only in such a manner as might vindicate the authority of his law, might testify the purity of his nature, and declare the inviolable faithfulness of his word. Unbounded goodness; in that he withheld not his Son, his only Son, but freely gave him up for us all; gave up “the brightness of his glory,” to be covered with infamy; gave up “the beloved of his soul,” to expire in agonies; on purpose to obtain honour and immortality for apostate men. The torments inflicted on all the damned in hell, are not so fearful a monument of God’s justice, as those dying agonies of the Lord Jesus Christ. Nor could a thousand worlds conferred on mankind, have been such an act of superabundant munificence, as that gift of his ever-blessed Son.

Look we for power and wisdom? To uphold the humanity of Christ, under all the studied cruelties of men, under the insatiate rage of devils, and the far more tremendous curse of the divine law;† to conquer sin, † Isaiah xliii. 6. “I the Lord, will hold thine hand, and will keep thee.” This is spoken of the and death, and hell, by a person bound with fetters, nailed to a tree, and crucified in weakness; to expiate, by one offering, the innumerable millions of crimes committed by all his people from the beginning to the end of time: was not this power? matchless power! astonishing power! And as for wisdom, how admirable was the contrivance, which could harmonize the seemingly opposite claims of mercy and of justice! and not only satisfy each, but magnify both! Had punishment been executed in all its rigour on the sinner's person, mercy had lost her amiable honours. Had the sinner been restored to favour, without any penalties sustained either by himself or his Surety, justice had been set aside as an insignificant attribute. Whereas, by our Lord's vicarious and expiatory sufferings, both are manifested, and both are exalted. Therefore the Scripture affirms, that God hath not only exercised, but abounded in wisdom and prudence; nay, hath abounded in all wisdom and prudence, (Eph. i. 8,) by this combination of righteous vengeance and triumphant grace, which is at once so honourable to himself and so advantageous to his people.

Ther. "Advantageous to his people."—I am glad you are come to this point. This is what I want to have cleared up. I am for those doctrines, which glorify God by doing good to man. Give me the religion whose aspect is benign, and whose agency is beneficial: not like a meteor, to dazzle us with a vain glitter; or like a comet, to terrify us with a formidable glare; but like yonder sun, whose beams shed light, and life, and joy all around.

Asp. If this be what you seek, and what you prize, the Christian religion, this doctrine in particular, will answer your warmest expectations, and challenge your highest esteem; for it is rich with benefits of the most needful, the most desirable, and most exalted kind.—The first and grand blessing is pardon of sins; pardon, not of small sins only, but of the most aggravated, the most horrid, the most enormous. Be they flaming as scarlet, be they foul as the dunghill, be they black as hell itself—yet they shall be as the spotless wool, or as the virgin snows. Isaiah i. 18. They shall "be, as though they had never been." Pardon, not of a few, but of all sins. Be they numerous as the hairs of our head, numerous as the stars of heaven, numerous as the sand upon the sea-shore, the blood of Jesus cleanseth from them all. (1 John i. 7.)

Messiah. It gives him assurance of effectual support, when the vengeance of heaven, the fury of hell, and the sins of the world, should fall upon him with united violence. To support the Mediator under these circumstances, is mentioned as a very distinguished act of that omnipotent arm, which created the heavens, and spread forth the earth, and giveth spirit to them that walk therein, ver. 5.

Hereby we have victory over death, and admittance into everlasting life. For thus saith the holy apostle, concerning the poor sojourners in clay: "Seeing therefore the children were partakers of flesh and blood, he also partook of the same: that, by undergoing death he might destroy him who had the power of death, that is the devil, and deliver those who, through fear of death, were all their lifetime subject to bondage." (Heb. ii. 14, 15.) And thus saith the venerable elder, concerning the glorified saints in light: "These are they who came out of great tribulation; and they have washed their robes, and made them white in the blood of the Lamb; therefore are they before the throne." (Rev. vii. 14.)

The Philistines rejoiced when Samson, the destroyer of their country, was delivered into their hands. How much greater reason have we to rejoice, since the blessed Jesus has vanquished our last enemy! has made death the minister of endless life, and the grave a gate to eternal glory! Joseph had cause to be glad, when he put off his prison-garments, and was clothed with change of raiment; when he was brought from the dungeon to the palace, and honoured with a seat at the right hand of the king. But is it not an incomparably richer blessing, to have our robes washed in redeeming blood, and our souls cleansed from all guilt? Is it not an incomparably higher advancement, to be admitted into the blissful presence, and to possess the everlasting kingdom of God?

To comprehend all in a word.—Hereby are procured, even for the most unworthy creatures, all the benefits of the new covenant. Therefore the blood of Christ is styled by a prophet, "the blood of thy covenant," (Zech. ix. 11.) by an apostle, "the blood of the everlasting covenant," (Heb. xiii. 20.) and our Lord himself says, "this is the new covenant in my blood," (Luke xxii. 20.) Is it a privilege to know God, the infinitely amiable centre and source of all perfection? Is it a most valuable endowment to have his laws put into our minds, and written on our hearts? Is it a branch of real felicity to have our numberless sins forgiven, and not one of our iniquities remembered any more? Is it the compendium of all happiness to have God for our portion and our exceeding great reward? to be his peculiar treasure, his loving and beloved people? (Heb. viii. 10—12.) Of all these we may say, They are the purchase of Immanuel's blood; and whoever is truly interested in the one, is unquestionably entitled to the other.

Who, then, would refuse so comfortable—

Ther. Too comfortable, we might imagine, to be either true in itself, or safe in its consequences. Must it not tend to imbolden the sinner in the prosecution of his vices? Who need scruple to transgress, or be very solicitous to repent, if an all-atoning sacrifice has been offered for every kind and every degree of wickedness?

Asp. Would you have sinners intimidated? Nothing speaks such terror to the children of disobedience, as the bitter passion and accursed death of Christ. All the rhetorical aggravations of sin, with regard to its loathsome nature, and execrable vileness; all the severity of vengeance, executed upon rebellious angels or wicked men; all, all are weak and inexpressive, compared with the dreadful emphasis of this great transaction. For if the Lord Almighty spared not his own Son, when guilt was not found in him, but only imputed to him; how much less shall he spare incorrigible offenders, who both habitually commit, and obstinately persist in their daring impieties?

If, by repentance, you mean an ingenuous sorrow for our transgressions, nothing is so likely to break the stony, or melt the icy heart, as these doleful effects of sin. Let us imagine ourselves present at Calvary, and standing by the cross. See! the innocent, the amiable, the illustrious Saviour, hangs on a tree—a tree, torturous as the rack, and ignominious as the gibbet! See! his face is foul with spitting, and his sides are torn with the scourge. His veins stream with blood, and his heart is wounded with anguish. There he hangs, abandoned by his friends, reviled by his enemies, and forsaken even by his God. Can we reflect, that we, even we, were the cause of this inconsolable misery, and not feel remorse in our consciences, or sorrow in our minds? Can we reflect, that for us, for us he bore this amazing torment, and not smite our breasts, or be pained at our very souls?

If, by repentance, you mean a thorough renunciation of all iniquity, no motive is so effectual to divorce the heart from every abominable idol, and divert the feet from every evil way, as an attentive consideration of our Redeemer's death. Whose indignation does not rise against the infamous wretch that betrayed the blessed Jesus? who is not ready to detest those envenomed tongues which accused him, and those barbarous hands which crucified him? How then can we cherish those horrid lusts, which were the principal actors in this deepest of tragedies? How can we caress, how can we entertain, how can we endure those execrable iniquities, which were the betrayers and murderers of the Prince of Life? "He bore our sins in his own bleeding, agonizing body on the tree;" not that we should be imboldened to forsake them, but incited to abhor them, and induced to forsake them; that, in our practice and our affections we should not only be averse, but even "dead to sin," (1 Pet. ii. 24.)

If you would have benevolence, your favourite principle, take place and operate, it is impossible to urge so endearing a persuasive to universal good-will as this "kindness and love of God our Saviour," (Tit. iii. 4.) How can we indulge the sallies of resentment, or harbour the seeds of animosity, when the meek, the merciful, the infinitely gracious Redeemer, laid down his life for his bitterest enemies? How can we treat with contempt or indifference, even the meanest of mankind, since our divine Master gave his all-glorious person for vile wretches, and miserable sinners? Never was there so winning a call to disinterested charity, as the amiable example of Christ; never so binding a cement of brotherly love, as the blood of the crucified Jesus.

In short, would you have people possessed of every heavenly virtue, and animated to the practice of every good work? Nothing administers so powerful an incitement to them all, as a lively and appropriating sense of this wondrous grace. Set home by the Holy Ghost,* it produces such a warm gratitude, and such a heart-felt joy, as are far more operative than the most awful threatenings, or the most cogent reasonings. So that, quite contrary to your suspicions, the native tendency of this excellent doctrine is, to suppress ungodliness, and promote piety.

Observe how the present calm evening, yonder mild declining sun, and these soft balmy breezes, have unlocked the flowery prisons, and detached a profusion of odours through the air; have inspirited the little songsters of the grove, and fetched lavish harmony from their throats. So sweetly will a true belief in Jesus Christ, and him crucified, draw forth all the powers of the soul, in acts of ready and cheerful obedience. He is therefore said, not only to justify, but also to "sanctify the people with his blood," (Heb. xiii. 12.)

Let us consider the death of Christ, in this its full grandeur and extensive efficacy, and we shall discern the admirable propriety of the apostle's remark, "It became him, for whom are all things, and by whom are all things, in bringing many sons unto glory, to make the Captain of their salvation perfect through sufferings," (Heb. ii. 10.) It became, as an act of sovereignty in God, it comported with the dignity, and emblazoned (if I may so speak) the incomprehensible majesty of his perfections. As an execution of impartial vengeance on our Surety, it asserted the rights of divine government, and secured the utmost veneration to the divine law. As an emanation of rich indulgence to us, it redressed all our misery, and retrieves our whole happiness. In each, in every respect, it is worthy of the most grateful and adoring acceptance from sinful man, and such as will be had in everlasting honour by the choirs of saints, and the host of angels.

* The reader will give me leave, on this occasion, to subjoin the noble doxology of our church; which, when thus applied, may be an excellent means, both of expressing our gratitude, and of quickening our devotion. "Glory be to the Father," for providing this all-sufficient atonement, and giving his Son to save a ruined world. "Glory be to the Son," for humbling himself to the death of the cross, and obtaining eternal redemption for sinners. "Glory be to the Holy Ghost," for testifying of Christ in our hearts, and appropriating this great salvation to our souls.

Ther. I thank you, Aspasio. Your arguments have not indeed converted me, but they have strengthened my faith. I never was so unhappily mistaken, as to disbelieve the satisfaction made by our Lord Jesus Christ; made to divine justice; made for the sins of the world. But I now see more clearly its reasonableness and importance; its cheering aspect on the guilty conscience, and its benign influence on the moral conduct.

Asp. I congratulate you, dear Theron, from my inmost soul, on your thorough conviction of this important truth. May you have still more extensive and generous views of the glorious article! and may every renewed view be more and more influential on your heart!

Reviving, ravishing thought! to have him for our bleeding victim! him for our great propitiation! at whose feet the armies of heaven bow, and the saints in light adore! reviving, ravishing thought! to have all our punishment sustained, and the whole curse of the law exhausted; so that justice itself can demand no more! Nay, to have so perfect a ransom paid for our redemption, that it is not barely an act of favourable indulgence, but of the highest righteousness* also, to pardon, accept, and glorify the believer. In such a method of reconciliation, how fully does the judgment acquiesce, and how securely the conscience rest!

Excuse me, Theron. My affections are again upon the soar. But I clip their wings.—Only let me ask, is not this doctrine the grand peculiarity of the gospel, by which it stands distinguished from every other religion professed in the world? Is it not the central point, in which all the lines of duty unite, and from which all the rays of consolation proceed? Strike this article from the creed, and you reduce the mystery of godliness to a system of ethics; you degrade the Christian church into a school of philosophy. To deny the expiation made by our Redeemer's sacrifice, is to obscure the brightest manifestation of divine benignity, and to undermine the principal pillar of practical religion; is to make a desperate shipwreck of our everlasting interests, and to dash (such, I fear, it will be found in the final issue of things) ourselves to death on the very rock of salvation.

Ther. Now, I believe it is time to repair homewards. And I hope it will be no disagreeable exchange, if we resign our seat on the mount for a place in the dining-room.

Asp. Pray, let me inquire, as we walk along, (for I was unwilling to interrupt our discourse, merely to gratify my curiosity,) what may be the design of yonder edifice, which rises on a small eminence, near the public road? It is neither a tower, nor a dwelling-house; but looks like a stately column, erected on purpose to beautify the prospect.

Ther. It is a sort of monumental pile: erected, as the story goes, on a very memorable occasion. Queen Eleanor accompanied King Edward the First to (what was called) the holy war; in which he gained signal advantages over the infidels, and acquired a large share of renown to himself. After many gallant exploits performed in the field, a treacherous and desperate Saracen, demanding admittance into his chamber, under pretence of private business, wounded him with an poisoned dagger. The consequence of which, his physicians declared, must be inevitable and speedy death, unless the poison was sucked out by some human mouth. This might possibly preserve the royal patient, but would be extremely dangerous to the operator.

Dangerous as it was, his Queen claimed the office; insisted upon it, as the consort's right; and executed it so faithfully, that she saved the king's life—so happily, that she lost not her own. After this, she returned to England, lived many years, and bore several children. But, sooner or later, royalty itself must pay the debt to nature. Dying on a journey to Scotland, she was brought back to the last and long home of our English monarchs.* Wherever her corpse rested, in the way to its interment, a structure,† (such as you now behold) was raised,

* Therefore the apostle says, "God is faithful and just to forgive us our sins." 1 John i. 9. Faithful; because he had promised this blessing, by the unanimous voice of all his prophets. Just; surely then he will punish! No; for this very reason he will pardon. This may seem strange; but, upon the evangelical principles of atonement and redemption, it is apparently true; because, when the debt is paid, or the purchase made, it is the part of equity to cancel the bond, and consign over the purchased possession.

* Westminster Abbey.

in order to perpetuate the memory of her conjugal affection.

Asp. And should not our hearts be a monument of gratitude to the blessed Jesus? who drew the deadly venom, not from our veins, but from the immortal part of our nature; and not at the hazard, but at the loss, the certain and unavoidable loss of his precious life? He opened his breast, opened his very soul, to the keenest arrows of vindictive justice; that, transfixing him, they might drop short of us; "the poison wherewith drank up his spirits," (Job vi. 4,) that the balm of peace might refresh ours.

O, my Theron! let our memories be the tablet, to record this unexampled instance of compassion and goodness. Let our affectionous dwell upon the tragical, the delightful history; till they melt into contrition, and are inflamed with love. If we want an inscription, let us make use of those noble lines, which, in the finest climax imaginable, describe the magnificence and grace of this astonishing transaction:

—"Survey the wondrous cure,
And at each step let higher wonder rise.
Pardon for infinite offence! and pardon
Through means that speak its value infinite!
A pardon bought with blood! with blood divine!
With blood divine of him I made my foe!
Persisted to provoke! Though wood'd and w'd, Bless'd and chastised, a flagrant rebel still;
Nor I alone! A rebel universe!
My species up in arms! Not one exempt!
Yet for the foulest of the foul, he dies!"

Night Thoughts, No. iv.

DIALOGUE V.

ASPASIO having some letters of importance to answer, as soon as the cloth was taken away, retired from table. His epistolary engagements being dispatched, he inquired for Theron. The servants informed him that their master walked into the garden. A very little search found him seated on an airy mount, and sheltered by an elegant arbour.

Strong and substantial plants of labournum formed the shell, while the slender and flexile shoots of syringia filled up the interstices. Was it to compliment, as well as to accommodate their worthy guests, that they interwove the luxuriant foliage? Was it to represent those tender but close attachments, which had united their affections, and blended their interests? I will not too positively ascribe such a design to the disposition of the branches. They composed, however, by their twining embraces, no inexpressive emblem of the endearments and the advantages of friendship. They composed a portion. A Latin inscription informs the traveller, concerning its occasion and design:

"In perpetuum Regina Eleanore

canopy of the freshest verdure, and of the thickest texture; so thick, that it entirely excluded the sultry ray, and shed both a cool refreshment, and an amusing gloom; while every unsheltered tract glared with light or fainted with heat.

You enter by an easy ascent of steps, lined with turf, and fenced with a balustrade of sloping bay-trees. The roof was a fine concave, peculiarly elevated and stately. Not embossed with sculpture, not mantled over with fret-work, not incrustated with splendid fresco; but far more delicately adorned with the syringa's silver tufts, and the labournum's flowering gold; whose large and lovely clusters, gracefully pendent from the leafy dome, disclosing their sweets to the delighted bee, and gently waving to the balmy breath of spring, gave the utmost enrichment to the charming bower.

Facing the entrance, lay a spacious grassy walk, terminated by an octangular basin with a curious jet d'eau playing in the centre. The waters, spinning from the lower orifices, were attenuated into innumerable little threads, which dispersed themselves in a horizontal direction, and returned to the reservoir in a drizzling shower. Those which issued from the higher tubes, and larger apertures, either sprung perpendicularly, or spouted obliquely, and formed as they fell, several lofty arches of liquid crystal, all glittering to the eye and cooling to the air.

Parallel to the walk ran a parterre, planted with an assemblage of flowers, which advanced one above another, in regular gradations of height, of dignity, and of beauty. First, a row of daisies, gay as the smile of youth, and fair as the virgin snows. Next, a range of crocuses, like a long stripe of yellow satin, quilted with threads, or diversified with sprigs of green. A superior order of ranunculuses, each resembling the cap of an earl's coronet, replenished the third story with full blown tufts of glossy scarlet. Beyond this, a more elevated line of tulips* raised their flourished heads, and

* Here is, it must be confessed, some little deviation from the general laws of the season: some anachorism in the annals of the parterre. The flowers united in this representation do not, according to the usual process of nature, make their appearance together. However, as, by the economy of a skilful gardener, they may be thus associated, I hope the possibility of the thing will screen my flowery productions from the blasts of censure. Or, may I not shelter my blooming assembly under the remark of a masterly critic, which is as pertinent to the case, as if it had been written on purpose for our vindication; and in all respects so elegant, that it must adorn every work which quotes it, and charm every person who reads it?

"A painter of nature is not obliged to attend her in her slow advances, which she makes from one season to another; or to observe her conduct in the successive productions of plants and flowers. He may draw into his description all the beauties of the Spring and Autumn, and make the whole year contribute something to render it more agreeable. His rose trees, wood opened their enamelled cups; not bedecked with a single tint only, but glowing with an intermingled variety of almost every radiant hue. Above all arose that noble ornament of a royal escutcheon, the fleur-de-luce, bright with ethereal blue, and grand with imperial purple; which formed, by its graceful projections, a cornice or a capital of more than Corinthian richness, and imparted the most consummate beauty to the blooming colonnade.

The whole, viewed from the arbour, looked like a rainbow painted upon the ground, and wanted nothing to rival that resplendent arch, only the boldness of its sweep, and the advantage of its ornamental curve.

To this agreeable recess Theron had withdrawn himself. Here he sat musing and thoughtful, with his eye fixed upon a picture representing some magnificent ruins. Wholly intent upon his speculation, he never perceived the approach of Aspasio, till he had reached the summit of the mount, and was ready to take a seat by his side.

Asp. Lost, Theron! quite lost in thought! and unaffected with all these amiable objects; insensible amidst this profusion of beauties, which, from every quarter, make their court to your senses! Methinks, the snarling cynic in his tub, could hardly put on a greater severity of aspect than my polite philosopher in his blooming Eden.

Ther. Ah! my dear friend, these flowery toys, which embellish the garden, are familiar to my eye, and therefore cheap in my esteem. I behold them frequently, and for that reason, feel but little of the pleasing surprise which they may possibly awaken in a stranger. Something like this we all experience with regard to events infinitely more worthy our admiring notice. Else, why are we not struck with a mixture of amazement, veneration, and delight, at the grand machinery and magnificent productions of nature?

That the hand of the Almighty should wheel round the vast terrestrial globe, with such prodigious rapidity and exact punctubines and jessamines may flourish together, and his beds be covered at the same time with lilies, violets, and amarantuses. His soil is not restrained to any particular set of plants, but is proper either for oaks or myrtles, and adapts itself to the product of every climate.—Oranges may grow wild in it; myrrh may be met with in every hedge; and if he thinks it proper to have a grove of spices, he can quickly command sun enough to raise it. His concerts of birds may be as full and harmonious, and his woods as thick and gloomy as he pleases. He is at no more expense in a long vista than a short one, and can as easily throw his cascades from a precipice of half a mile high, as from one of twenty yards. He has the choice of the winds, and can turn the course of his rivers in all the variety of meanders, that are most delightful to the reader's imagination. In a word, he has the modelling of nature in his own hands, and may give her what charms he pleases, provided he does not reform her too much, and run into absurdities by endeavouring to excel."—Spect. Vol. vi. No. 418.

ality, on purpose to produce the regular vicissitudes of day and night, on purpose to bring on the orderly succession of seed-time and harvest! We wonder when we read of the Israelites sojourning forty years in the desert, marching backward and forward over its burning sands, and find neither their clothes waxing old, (Deut. viii. 4,) by so long a use, nor their feet swelling with so painful journeys. (Neh. ix. 21.) Yet we are neither impressed with wonder, nor affected with gratitude, when we enjoy the benefits of the air, which clothes the earth, as it were, with a garment; which has neither contracted any noxious taint through the extensive revolution of almost six thousand years, nor suffered any diminution of its natural force, though exercised in a series of unremitted activity, ever since the elementary operations began.

This draught in my hand, shows us the instability of the grandest, most laboured monuments of human art. They are soon swept away among the other feeble attempts of mortality; or remain only, as you see here, in shattered ruins, memorials of the vain and powerless ambition of the builders. How strange then, that a structure, incomparably more tender and delicate, should be preserved to old age and hoary hairs! That the bodily machine, which is so exquisite in its frame, so complicated in its parts, and performs so many thousands* of motions every moment, should continue unimpaired, yet act without intermission, so many days and weeks, and months and years! How strange all this; yet, because common, how seldom does it excite our praise, or so much as engage our notice!

Asp. Your remarks are as just, as the neglect of them is customary.—Unaccountable supineness! Though "God doth great things," worthy of all observation, "yea, and wonders without number," we yawn with indolence, instead of being animated with devotion, or transported with delight. "Lo! he goeth before us," in evident manifestations of wisdom and power, yet we see him not; "he passeth on also," and scatters unnumbered blessings from his providential hand, "but we perceive him not." (Job ix. 10, 11.)

* Thousands—Not to mention the spontaneous, if we consider only the mechanical motions, which are continually performed in the animal system; the digestive action of the stomach—the vermicular agitation of the bowels—the progress of the chyle through the lacteal vessels—the many, many operations of the secreting glands—the compression of the lungs, and all their little cellular lodgments by every act of respiration: above all, that grand impetus, the systole of the heart, which, by every constriction, darts the crimson current through an innumerable multitude of arteries: and drives, at the same instant of time, the reflux blood through an innumerable multitude of corresponding veins. Such a view will oblige us to acknowledge that Theron's account is far from being extravagant, that it rather diminishes than exaggerates the real fact.

This, though greatly culpable, is to be reckoned among the smallest instances of our ungrateful insensibility. Are we not inattentive even to the work of redemption? That work, which according to the emphatical declaration of scripture, "exceeds in glory," (2 Cor. iii. 9,) is by far the greatest, the most marvellous of all sublimary, perhaps of all divine transactions. Are we not shamefully unaffected, even with the appearance of God in human flesh? Though the King of kings vouchsafes to exchange his throne for the humiliation of a servant, and the death of a malefactor; though he is pleased by the imputation of his active as well as passive obedience, to become "the Lord our righteousness;" yet—

Ther. You are taking an effectual way, Aspasio, to rouse me from my reverie, and make me indeed like the snarling philosopher. "Imputed righteousness is a scheme grossly frivolous and absurd, utterly insufficient to answer the end proposed; and, one would think, could never be depended on, where there is the least degree of understanding, and capacity for reasoning."*

Asp. Who is warm now, Theron? May I not remind my friend, that the resentful is no more fitted to work conviction than the rapturous? Perhaps you have not duly considered this subject, nor seen it in the proper point of view. I have sometimes beheld a ship of war several leagues off at sea. It seemed to be a dim cloudy something, hovering on the skirts of the horizon, contemptibly mean, and not worthy of a moment's regard. But, as the floating citadel approached, the masts arose; the sails swelled out; its stately form and curious proportions struck the sight. It was no longer a shapeless mass, or a blot in the prospect, but the master-piece of human contrivance, and the noblest spectacle in the world of art. The eye is never weary of viewing its structure, nor the mind in contemplating its uses.

Who knows, Theron, but this sacred scheme likewise, which you now look upon as a confused heap of errors, may very much improve when more closely examined; may at length appear a wise and benign plan, admirably fitted to the condition of our fallen nature, and perfectly worthy of all acceptation.

Ther. I know not what may happen,

* The reader will probably be disgusted at this heat of temper, this asperity of diction, and both so abruptly introduced. I have no apology to make for my Theron. The reader has reason to be disgusted, has reason to be chagrined. Only let me desire him to remember that this is the very spirit, nay, these are the very words of a celebrated opposer of our doctrine; not added when he has fully proved the absurdity of the scheme, but assumed even upon the entrance to his discourse.

Aspasio; but there seems to be very little probability of such a change. For, though my last opposition was a mock-fight, in my present objections I am very sincere, and to this doctrine I am a determined enemy. The notion of a substituted and vicarious righteousness, is absurd even to common sense, and to the most natural and easy reflections of men.

Asp. It may not, my dear friend, agree with our natural apprehensions, nor fall in with the method which we might have devised for the salvation of mankind. But this is the voice of scripture, and a maxim never to be forgotten: "God's thoughts are not as our thoughts, nor his ways as our ways," (Isa. lv. 8.) "His righteousness is like the strong mountains, and his judgments are like the great deep," (Psal. xxxvi. 6.) the former immoveable, the latter unsearchable.

Ther. The mention of mountains put me in mind of what I was reading yesterday; the keen irony with which Abimelech's principal officer chastised the blustering Gaul: "Thou seest the shadow of the mountains, as if they were men," (Judg. ix. 36.) He, it is sarcastically intimated, was afraid, and my Aspasio seems to be fond, of shadows.

Asp. Happy for your Aspasio, that irony is no argument. If a jury was impanelled to try me and my doctrine, I should certainly except against irony. Generally speaking, he is neither a good man, nor a true; and, if I remember right, you yourself consented to set him aside in this debate. I shall therefore adapt my reply rather to what is solid than what is smart. "This notion," you say, "is absurd even to common sense." A saying, on which I must beg leave to put a query. It was, I own, absolutely beyond the power of common sense, unassisted by divine revelation, to discover this truth. I will grant, farther, that this blessing infinitely transcends whatever common sense has observed in all her converse with finite things. But if I have any the least acquaintance with common sense, I am very sure she will not, she cannot pronounce it an absurdity. To this judge I refer the cause.

And to open the cause a little, let me just observe that God imputed our sins to his Son. How else could the immaculate Jesus be punished as the most inexcusable transgressor? "Awake, O sword, against the man that is my Fellow, saith the Lord of Hosts," (Zech. xiii. 7.) Is not this the voice of a judge, pronouncing the sentence, and authorizing the execution? Or rather, does it not describe the action of justice, turning the sword from us, and sheathing it in Christ? Who, if he was our substitute, with regard to penal suffering, why may he not stand in the same relation with regard to justifying obedience? There is the same reason for the one as for the other, every argument, in favour of the former, is equally conclusive in behalf of the latter.

Ther. I very freely grant, that Christ Jesus was punished in our stead; that his death is the expiation of our sin, and the cause of our security from penal suffering. But this—

Asp. Will undeniably prove, that sin was imputed to him; otherwise he could not truly suffer in our stead, nor be justly punished at all. “And imputation is as reasonable and justifiable in one case as in the other, for they both stand upon one and the same foot; and, for that reason, he who throws down one, throws down both.” I should not have interrupted my Theron, only to introduce this answer from an eminent divine, who adds what should be very seriously considered: “And therefore, whoever rejects the doctrine of the imputation of our Saviour’s righteousness to man, does, by so doing, reject the imputation of man’s sin to our Saviour, and all the consequences of it. Or, in other words, he who rejects the doctrine of the imputation, does, by so doing, reject the doctrine of the expiation likewise.”*

Ther. I know nothing of this divine; and, eminent as he is, can hardly take his ipse dixit for a decision.

Asp. I was in hopes you would pay the greater regard to his opinion, because he is not in the number of the whimsical fanatics.

Give me leave to observe farther, that the imputation of Christ’s righteousness bears an evident analogy to another great truth of Christianity. We did not personally commit Adam’s sin, yet are we chargeable with guilt, and liable to condemnation, on that—

Ther. How! we chargeable with guilt and liable to condemnation on account of Adam’s transgression! This position I must deny, I had almost said, I must abhor. None other could, in the eye of justice and equity, be blamable for any offence of our first parents, but they only.

Asp. So says Theron; but what says St. Paul? This may be the voice of natural reason, but what is the language of divine revelation? “In whom,” that is, in Adam, “all have sinned.”

Ther. The words, if I remember right, are, “For that all have sinned.”

Asp. In the margin, they are translated as I have repeated them. For this interpretation I might contend, as not in the least incompatible with the original phrase,* and as the most precisely suitable to the sacred argument. But I waive this advantage. Let the words run into your mould, and the translation take your form. They are equally decisive of the point in debate. They assign the reason why death came upon all men, infants themselves not excepted: “For that,” or inasmuch as, “all have sinned.” How? not in their own person; this was utterly impossible. But in that first grand transgression of their federal head, which, as it could not be actually committed by them, must, according to the tenor of the apostle’s arguing, be imputed to them.

Ther. Pray, what do you mean by that stiff, and to me unintelligible phrase, federal head?

Asp. I mean what Milton celebrates, when he represents the Almighty Father thus addressing his eternal Son:

—“Be thou in Adam’s room
The head of all mankind, though Adam’s son.
As in him perish all men, so in thee,
As from a second root, shall be restored
As many as are restored; without thee none.”
Book 3. l. 285.

I mean what the apostle teaches, when he calls Christ “the second man,” (1 Cor. xv. 47.) and “the last Adam,” (1 Cor. xv. 45.) The second! the last! How? Not in a numerical sense, not in order of time, but in this respect: That as Adam was a public person, and acted in the stead of all mankind, so Christ was a public person, and acted in behalf of all his people. That, as Adam was the first general representative of this kind, Christ was the second and the last; there never was, and there never will be any other. That what they severally did, in this capacity, was not intended to terminate in themselves, but to affect as many as they respectively represented. This is St. Paul’s meaning, and this is the foundation of the doctrine of imputation.

Ther. If you build it on no other foundation than your own particular sense of the apostle’s words, perhaps your ground may prove sandy, and treacherous to its trust.

Asp. I build it upon mine, and I deduce it from yours, Theron. But I am far from resting the whole weight of the cause upon a single text. It is established, again and again, in this same chapter. Neither do I wonder at the prejudices which you and others may entertain against the doctrine. It lies quite out of the road of reason’s searches; it is among the wonderful things of God’s law. This the inspired penman foresaw, and modelled his discourse accordingly. Like some skilful engineer, who,

* Εφ’ ὃ πάντες ἠμαρτον. Rom. v. 12.

though he makes the whole compass of his fortification strong, yet bestows peculiar and additional strength on those parts which he apprehends will be exposed to the fiercest attack; so the wise, the divinely wise apostle, has inculcated, and re-inculcated this momentous point, has enforced it with all the assiduity of zeal, and confirmed it by all the energy of expression. "If, through the offence of one, many be dead—The judgment was by one to condemnation—By one man's offence, death reigned by one—By the offence of one, judgment came upon all men to condemnation." (Rom. v. 15, 16, 17, 18.) That there may remain no possibility of mistaking his meaning, or of eluding his argument, he adds, "By one man's disobedience, many were made sinners." (Rom. v. 19.)

Ther. Sin, I am told by a celebrated expositor, sometimes signifies punishment. He farther informs me, that we may be said to sin in Adam, not by the imputation of his disobedience to us, but by becoming obnoxious to those sufferings which were due to his sin.

Asp. Then the apostle's reasoning will stand in this form; "death came upon all men, for that all have sinned;" that is, "death came upon all men, because all have been punished, or, an obnoxiousness to punishment came upon men, because all are become obnoxious to punishment." A goodly strain of argumentation for an unerring writer to use! But surely Gamaliel's pupil would disclaim, much more would Christ's ambassador scorn, such weak and unmeaning chicanery. He mentions sin and its punishment; but never hints, that they are intended to signify one and the same thing. He all along maintains a distinction between them; represents the former as the cause of the latter. Judgment, condemnation, death, are owing to sin, offence, disobedience. It is by the imputation of these that we become obnoxious to those.

This account is clear, is natural, and wants no strained criticisms to support it. This account demonstrates the equity of that providential government, which executes the sentence of death even on those descendants of Adam who have not sinned in their own persons. It also illustrates the procedure of that sovereign grace, which treats as righteous, and entitles to life, even those believers in Jesus, who have not obeyed in their own persons.—What says our church? You have a great veneration for the church of England, Theron.

Ther. I have. But, I fear, my Aspasio has neither so honourable an opinion of her worship, nor so steady an adherence to her constitution; otherwise he would not so highly extol those ambitious and canting hypocrites the Puritans; who were the most inveterate enemies of our excellent establishment, and would have rejoiced in its utter subversion.

Asp. As to the Puritans, you will do me the justice to acknowledge, that I speak only of their evangelical tenets, abstracted from all political principles. As to myself, your fears are friendly, but I trust they are groundless. I would only ask, who are to be deemed the most affectionate and faithful sons of their sacred mother? Those, I presume, who most cordially embrace her doctrines, and most dutifully submit to her precepts. By this touchstone let my fidelity be tried; and, for an immediate trial, be pleased to repeat her ninth article.

Ther. I cannot say, that I remember the particular words of any, though I have often read, and very much approve them all.

Asp. I wish you would commit to your memory four or five of the most distinguished.* They are a valuable treasure, and contain the quintessence of the gospel.

These are the words of the ninth article. "Original sin is the fault and corruption of every man, that naturally is engendered of the offspring of Adam." It is the fault, says the pious Bishop Beveridge, and therefore we are guilty of it; it is the corruption also, and therefore we are defiled with it. Our homilies have recourse to no such palliatives, and qualifying interpretations, as my Theron's expositor uses. One of them affirms point blank, that "in Adam all men sinned universally." This seems to be a paraphrase on the text, whose translation you lately controverted. In what sense our great poetical divine understood the sacred writer is apparent from the following words, which are supposed to have been spoken by Jehovah himself:

"Adam's crime Makes guilty all his sons."
Milton, book iii. l. 290.

And from another passage, where our rebellious progenitor, bewailing his aggravated misery, and the extensive malignity of his sin, declares,

"In me all Posterity stands cursed."—Book x. l. 317.

For my own part, I must confess, that if the transmission of original depravity be granted, I know not how the imputation of Adam's destructive apostacy can be denied.

If we had no concern in the one, how could we be justly punished with the other? I say punished. For to lose the primitive integrity of our nature, and inherit a depraved disposition, is at once a most deplorable calamity, and a most terrible punishment. Corruption transmitted, and guilt imputed, seem to be doctrines indissolubly connected. To allow the former, and reject the latter, is in my apprehension to acknowledge the effect without admitting the cause.

Ther. To make us parties in a covenant, which we did not agree to, can this be equitable? To ruin us for a crime which we never committed, can this be merciful? Surely this is a flagrant injustice, never to be ascribed to the all-gracious God; a diabolical barbarity, add some, never to be mentioned without the utmost detestation.

Asp. I see no cause for such a tragical outcry of barbarity, nor indeed for any complaint of injustice. Not to insist upon the sovereignty of an all-creating God, and his unquestionable right, to "do what he will with his own," (Matt. xx. 15.) I would only ask, did he not condescend to transact with man, not on the foot of absolute uncontrollable authority, but in the honourable and delightful way of a covenant? Were not the terms of this covenant perfectly easy, and wonderfully gracious? Wonderfully gracious; for they proposed a state of inconceivable and everlasting felicity to creatures who were entitled to no happiness; (Luke x. 28.) had not the least claim to any good; no, not so much as to the privilege of existence. Perfectly easy; for what was the condition on man's part? Not any rigorous act of duty, nor severe course of self-denial, but the free enjoyment of millions of blessings and pleasures, with only the prohibition of one pernicious indulgence. Here, then, is made on one hand, a promise of the most glorious reward that God himself could give; and nothing required on the other, but the smallest expression of allegiance that man himself could wish. And is this injustice? is this barbarity?

Ther. All this was equitable enough with regard to Adam; but why should we be condemned for his violation of the covenant? Or how was such a constitution of things gracious with respect to us?

Asp. "Why condemned?" Because we should have been partakers of the benefit and the glory, if he had persevered in his duty. To this, I presume, none would object. And if they would not to the one, they ought not to the other.

You ask farther, "How was such a constitution of things gracious with respect to us?" I answer, because it was the most likely means to secure the happiness of us and all mankind. Was not Adam, of all persons, by far the best qualified to act as a general head? He had a perfection of knowledge, to discern his true interest; a perfection of holiness, to capacitate him for obedience; and a perfection of happiness, disposing him to perseverance. As none could have more eminent qualifications, none could have so many obligations. His own welfare, both bodily and spiritual, was at stake; the eternal interests of his rising family, and of his remotest posterity, were depending; the lives, the souls, the everlasting all of the whole human race, were embarked on the single bottom of his fidelity. Therefore the felicity of every individual that should spring from his loins, was a fresh motive to vigilance, an additional engagement to duty.* As his love to his offspring was more refined, more exalted, more god-like than ours, all these considerations, and inducements must operate upon him in their fullest scope, and with the strongest energy. What an intrenchment was here to keep out disobedience, and ward off ruin! An intrenchment deep as hell, high as heaven, wide as the whole extent of the human species.—Here then I may venture to throw the gauntlet, and challenge the whole world. Let the most penetrating mind devise a scheme, so wisely and graciously calculated to ascertain the success of a probationary state. If this be impracticable, then must every mouth be stopped; no tongue can have the least reason to complain: I, for my part, shall think myself obliged to admire the benignity of my Creator's conduct; and God may justly demand of all intelligent creatures, "What could have been done more" for the preservation and felicity of mankind, "that I have not done?" (Isaiah v. 4.)

Especially, when to all this we add, that the same Almighty Being, who appointed Adam to be our representative in the first covenant, without asking our actual consent, appointed also Christ to be our representative in the second covenant, without staying for our actual solicitation. When we take this into the account, there remains not the least shadow of injustice; but goodness, transcendent goodness, shines forth with the brightest lustre.

Ther. Goodness, Aspasio! This is surprising indeed! Why, if Adam's transgression be laid to our charge, we are damnable creatures the very moment we exist; and are liable to the torments of hell, even on account of his disobedience. To term this goodness, is the greatest of paradoxes! to affirm it of the Deity, is little less than blasphemy!

Asp. Let us be calm, my dear friend, and

* Should any person imagine himself more capable of standing than Adam, who was endowed with all the perfections of an innocent, holy, god-like nature; I think, by this very imagination he begins to fall; fall into pride. Should any person suppose, that, from a view to his own particular salvation, he would continue faithful; when Adam was not engaged to fidelity, from a regard to his own and the final happiness of all his posterity; he seems to be just as wise as the mariner, who persuades himself, that though a thousand anchors could not secure the ship in a storm, yet one might have done it effectually.

consider the case impartially. If it is not a real truth, I shall be as willing to relinquish it as yourself.

Is not death, eternal death, the wages of every sin? And if of every sin, then doubtless of original, which is the fountain from whence all the streams of actual iniquity flow; or rather the abyss from whence all the torrents pour. That which could not be pardoned, but by the humiliation and agonies of God's adorable Son, may reasonably be supposed to deserve the most dreadful vengeance. And it is affirmed, by an authority which you will not dispute, that, "for original as well as actual sin, the offering of Christ is a propitiation and satisfaction."^{*}

Does not St. Paul deliver it as a maxim in divinity, That, "by the offence of one," Adam he undoubtedly means, "judgment came upon all men to condemnation?" (Rom. v. 18.) The import of the words, together with the connexion of the passage, lead us to understand this of a condemnation to eternal misery. The import of the words; for they are doubled,† to make them peculiarly strong in their signification; and each word, within the compass of this very epistle, is used in that awful latitude of meaning, (Rom. ii. 3; iii. 8; viii. 1.) The connexion of the passage; because it stands opposed to that justification which is unto life. This, we are sure, includes the idea of an everlasting duration. And why should its tremendous counterpart be less extensive?

This sense is evidently patronized, and this doctrine most peremptorily asserted by our established church. What says the book of Homilies, when treating of the miseries consequent upon the fall? "This so great and miserable a plague, if it had only rested on Adam, who first offended, it had been much easier, and might the better have been borne. But it fell not only on him, but also on his posterity and children for ever; so that the whole brood of Adam's race should sustain the self-same fall and punishment, which their forefather by his offence most justly had deserved."[‡] Let any should misapprehend the design of our reformers, and suppose the punishment to consist only of some bodily suffering, or the loss of immortality, it is added in the same alarming discourse, "Neither Adam, nor any of his, had any right or interest at all in the kingdom of heaven; but were become plain reprobates and castaways, being perpetually damned to the everlasting pains of hell."

Let you should imagine this might be written under a sally of hasty zeal, or that it is to be reckoned among the doting opinions of a credulous antiquity, let me remind my friend, that it is ingrafted into the Articles: those articles, which were approved by the archbishops and bishops of both provinces, were ratified by the general consent of the clergy, and are to this day the national standard of our belief. The ninth article, beginning with a description of our depraved nature, subjoins an account of its proper desert: "In every person born into the world, it deserveth God's wrath and damnation."^{*}

Ther. How miserable then is man!

Asp. In himself he is miserable beyond expression. But a conviction of this misery is the beginning of all happiness. The valley of Achor is a door of hope.†

Ther. Explain yourself, Aspasio. You seem to deal very much in the incomprehensible.

Asp. Such a conviction would demonstrate the absolute insufficiency of all human attainments, and all human endeavours to procure life and salvation. For in case we could perform every jot and tittle of the divine law, offend in no instance, fall short in no degree, persevere to the very end; yet this would be no more than our present bounden duty. Not the least pittance of merit could arise from all this. Much less could this be sufficient to expiate original guilt, or remove the dreadful entail of the primitive all-destroying sin.

This, therefore, would most effectually preclude every false confidence, and sweep away at one stroke "every refuge of lies," (Isa. xxviii. 17.) It would lay us under an immediate, indispensable, and happy necessity of betaking ourselves to Christ. I say happy necessity; because then we should know by experience what each part of our Lord's awful yet tender declaration meaneth; "O Israel, thou hast destroyed thyself, but in me is thy help," (Hos. xiii. 9.) We should then find, that as sin and misery hath abounded through the first Adam, mercy and grace have much more abounded through the second. For, if we were ruined by a crime which we committed not, we are recovered by a righteousness which we performed not; a righteousness infinitely

* I am surprised to see a learned author attempting to sheath the sting of this awful denunciation; attempting to prove that the words "do not signify God's eternal wrath, and the damnation of hell." I shall take no pains to confute what he is pleased to advance. I leave the question in the reader's own breast. Let him discover, if he can, a different meaning in the sentence. Unless he has a pretty shrewd knack at sophistry, I am persuaded he will find it a difficult matter to give any other tolerable turn to the passage. Surely it must be a reproach to our venerable mother, if she delivers her doctrine in language so fallacious, as must necessarily mislead the generality of her sons; or in terms so abstruse, as even a good understanding cannot develop, without some proficiency in critical legerdemain.

surpassing whatever we could have acquired, even though our nature had been transmitted to us free from any depravity, and exempt from all guilt.

Ther. In your opinion, then, and according to your scheme, salve and regimen are better than a sound constitution.

Asp. No, Theron. My opinion is, that none can think himself aggrieved, or have any reason to complain, at that grand and beneficent regulation, which suffers the glimmering taper to be obscured or extinguished, but sheds abroad the boundless and majestic beams of day. And if any comparison be made between the most perfect human obedience, and the everlasting divine righteousness of Christ, it should be taken from the glimmering taper and the meridian sun.

Ther. I cannot persuade myself to admire such mysterious and unaccountable notions. They must puzzle some, will offend others, but cannot edify any.

Asp. This point, that "we all died in Adam," were undone by his apostacy, cannot puzzle the simplest, if unprejudiced, mind. Nor will it offend any but the proud philosopher, or the self-righteous moralist. And I assure you I should not mention it, much less insist upon it, did it not subserve, and in a very singular manner, the purposes of edification. The doctrine of a Redeemer obeying and dying in our stead, is the very hinge and centre of all evangelical revelations—is the very life and soul of all evangelical blessings. This doctrine is not a little illustrated, and comes greatly recommended, by the imputation of Adam's sin.

Contraries, you know, cast light upon and set off each other. Winter and its severe cold make spring and its cheering warmth more sensibly perceived, and more highly pleasing. Such an influence has the present subject with respect to the vicarious obedience of our Mediator. The more clearly we see the reality of the first, the more thoroughly we shall discern the expediency, the excellency, the glory of the last. The more we are humbled under a conviction of the former, the more we shall covet, or the more we shall triumph in, the enjoyment of the latter. The apostle draws a long parallel, or rather forms a strong contrast between them, in the fifth chapter to the Romans. He speaks copiously of Adam's guilt, imputed to all mankind for condemnation and death; that he may speak the more acceptably, the more charmingly of Christ's righteousness, imputed to all believers for justification and life. In that dark ground, he well knew, this fairest, loveliest flower of Christianity appears with peculiar beauty; indeed with all the beauty of consummate wisdom, and adorable benignity.

Ther. It really seems to me a thing impossible, that one man's righteousness should be made another's. Can one man live by the soul of another? or be learned by the learning of another?—Good Aspasio, never attempt to maintain such palpable absurdities. They will expose Christianity to the scorn of infidels.

Asp. If infidels scoff at this comfortable truth, their scoffing will be, like all their other cavils, not the voice of reason, but the clamour of prejudice.

My friend's objection insinuates, what we never assert, that the essence of this righteousness is transfused into believers; which would doubtless be in fact impossible, as it is in theory absurd. But this we disavow as strenuously as you can oppose. The Redeemer's righteousness is made ours, not by infusion, but by imputation. The very terms we use may acquit us from such a ridiculous charge; as imputation signifies a placing to the account of one what is done by another. Accordingly, we believe, that the essence of this righteousness abides in Christ, but is placed to our account; that Christ, and Christ alone, actually performed it; that Christ, and Christ alone, personally possesses it; but that, performing it in our stead, and possessing it as our covenant-head, God imputes it to us, God accepts us for it, accepts us as much as if we had, on our own behalf and in our own persons, severally fulfilled it.

Though one man cannot live, be actuated with a principle of life, by the soul of another; yet you must allow, that one man, nay, that many men may live, be continued in the possession of life, for the righteousness of another. Or else you must do, what I am sure you abhor, you must charge with absurdity and impossibility even the declaration of the Deity: "If I find in Sodom fifty righteous within the city, then will I spare all the place for their sakes." (Gen. xviii. 26.)

Ther. Not all your refinements can reconcile me to this uncouth notion. The practice is unexampled, and absolutely inconsistent with the rules of distributive justice.

Asp. Ah! my Theron, if we seek an example of God's unbounded goodness amongst the puny proceedings of men, we shall be led into the most egregious misapprehensions. To measure one of the sparks on your ring, and fancy we have taken the dimensions of the Alps or the Andes, would be, in comparison of this error, a small mistake: Since between a brilliant speck, and a range of mountains there is some proportion, but between human beneficence, and heavenly bounty there cannot possibly be any. However, the all-condescending Creator has been pleased so to dispense his infinitely rich grace, that we may find, though nothing parallel, nothing correspondent, yet some faint shadow of its manner among the affairs of mankind; something that may perhaps give us such an idea of the stupendous subject, as a glow-worm would give of the sun's splendour, in case a person had never beheld that magnificent luminary. This remark I must entreat you to recollect, whenever I attempt to elucidate the mysteries of the gospel by the occurrences of common life.

When your worthy minister was disabled, by a rheumatic disorder, from attending on the business of his function, several of the neighbouring clergy gave him their assistance. Was he not, by this vicarious performance of his office, entitled to all the profits of his living? It seems, therefore, not so unexampled a thing for one person to act in another's stead. And when a service is thus discharged by the proxy, the benefit may, according to the received maxims of mankind, accrue to the principal. Did not Jehu's descendants, even to the fourth generation, reap the advantage of their great-grandfather's zeal? (2 Kings x. 30.) Does not the Duke of * enjoy the honours and rewards won by the sword of a victorious ancestor? And may not the whole world of believers, with equal, with far greater justice, receive life and salvation on account of their all-deserving Saviour, especially since he and they are one mystical body, represented as such in scripture, and considered as such by God.

No, say you, this is contrary to the rules of distributive justice. What is your idea of a Surety? How was the affair stated, and how were matters negotiated, with relation to your generous acquaintance Philander? He, you know, was bound for an unfortunate brother, who lately stepped aside.

Ther. The debt by his brother's absconding, devolved upon Philander. He was responsible for all, and obliged to pay the whole sum.

Asp. Was not his payment as satisfactory to the creditor, as if it had been paid in the debtor's own person, by the debtor's own hand?

Ther. Certainly.

Asp. Was not the debtor, by this vicarious payment, released from all fear of prosecution, and acquitted from any future demand on this score?

Ther. He was.

Asp. Apply this instance to the redemption of sinners by Jesus Christ, who is in the sacred writings expressly styled a Surety. (Heb. vii. 22.) If Philander's act was deemed, in the estimation of law, the act of his brother; if the deed of the former was imputed, in point of advantage, entirely to the latter; why should not the same effects take place, with regard to the divine bondsman and poor insolvent sinners? Why should that be exploded in our systems of divinity, which is universally admitted in our courts of justice?

Ther. Obedience and righteousness are, in the nature of the things themselves, personal qualities, and only so. Every man is that only (and can be nothing else) which he is in himself.

Asp. Righteousness, as dwelling in us, is undoubtedly a personal quality; and obedience, as performed by us, comes under the same denomination. But does this supersede the necessity, or destroy the existence of imputed righteousness? Your first proposition is ambiguous. Let it speak distinctly; add inherent to your righteousness, and the sense becomes determinate, but the argument falls to the ground.

"Every man is that only (and can be nothing else) which he is in himself." If I had never seen the Bible, I should have yielded my ready assent to this proposition. But, when I open the Old Testament, and find it written by the prophet, "in the Lord shall all the house of Israel be justified," (Isa. xlv. 25.) when I turn to the New Testament, and hear the apostle saying, "Ye are complete in him, who is the head of all principalities and powers," (Col. ii. 10.) I cannot concur with Theron, without contradicting revelation. Israel, or the true believer, is said to be justified; and the foundation of this blessing is declared to be, not in himself but in the Lord. The Colossians are said to be complete, which we are very certain they were not in themselves, and are expressly assured they were so in Christ. Hence it appears quite contrary to my friend's assertion, that sinners both have and are that in Christ, which they neither have nor are in themselves. They have by imputation a righteousness in Christ; they are, by this imputed righteousness, complete before God.

I believe your mistake proceeds from neglecting to distinguish between inherent and imputed. We never suppose that a profane person is devout, or an intemperate person sober. This is inherent righteousness. But we maintain that the profane and intemperate, being convinced of their iniquity, and betaking themselves to the all-sufficient Saviour for redemption, are interested in the merit both of his life and of his death. This is imputed righteousness. We farther affirm, that though really abominable in themselves, they are fully accepted by God for his beloved Son's sake. This is justification through imputed righteousness.

However strange this may seem, it is no precarious or unwarrantable opinion, but the clear and positive declaration of scripture. He justifieth, he absolves from guilt, he treats as righteous—Whom? Upright, obedient, sinless creatures? This were nothing extraordinary.—No, but “he justifieth the ungodly, that believe in the Lord Jesus,” (Rom. iv. 5,) imputing as the ground of this justification, their trespasses to him, and his righteousness to them.

Ther. I see no occasion for such nice distinctions and metaphysical subtilities, in plain popular divinity. Hard terms and abstruse notions may perplex the head, but seldom improve the heart.

Asp. Why then do you oblige us to make use of them? If some people twist and entangle the reins, it behoves others to clear them of the embarrassment, and replace them in their due order. Many writers, either from an artful design, or through a strange inadvertence, have jumbled and confounded these two very different ideas. Hence they have started objections to our doctrine, which, the moment you introduce this obvious distinction, vanish into air. They fall into a mistake of their own, and then charge the absurdity upon others.

I am no more fond of hard terms and abstruse notions than my Theron. Neither can I think the instance before us so abstruse a notion. I am very certain, you are capable of comprehending much higher and nicer refinements. Therefore I must once again intreat you to remember the very material difference between inherent and imputed righteousness. The former is the essence of sanctification, the latter is the ground of justification. By this, we are restored to the favour of God; by that, we are made meet for his heavenly kingdom. Let this distinction, which is easy, which is scriptural, which is important, take place, and we may for the future dismiss what you call the metaphysical subtilities. Our disagreement will cease, and our opinions tally.

Ther. I question that, Aspasio. There are other difficulties to be got over before I can digest so crude an opinion. If we are justified by the righteousness of Christ, then the righteousness which justifies mankind is already wrought out.

Asp. And this you take to be a most enormous falsehood, whereas I look upon it as a most delightful truth. The righteousness which justifies sinful man was set on foot, when God sent forth his Son from the habitation of his holiness and glory, to be born of a woman, and made subject to the law. It was carried on through the whole course of our Saviour's life, in which he always did such things as were pleasing to his heavenly Father. It was completed at that ever memorable, that grand period of time, when the blessed

Emmanuel bowed his dying head, and cried with a strong triumphant voice, “it is finished!”

If the justifying righteousness was to be wrought by ourselves, we could never be truly and fully justified till death, till our warfare is accomplished, and our last act of obedience exerted. But how uncomfortable is such a notion! How miserable would it render our lives! And how directly does it run counter to the determination of the apostle, “Ye are justified,” (1 Cor. vi. 11.)

Ther. Soothed, then, with this pleasing surmise, may not the libertine say to his soul, “Soul, take thine ease in the most indolent security. All my carnal appetites, indulge yourselves without restraint. Conscience, be under no solicitude to live soberly, righteously, and godly, for the work is done, all done to my hands. I am like some fortunate heir, whose parents have been successfully industrious, and have left nothing to exercise the diligence of their surviving son, but only to possess the inheritance, and live on labours not his own.”

Asp. The libertine, who only speculates or disputes, may indeed abuse the doctrine of grace. But the believer, who feels the power of grace, will improve it to better purposes. Where the former only fluctuates in the understanding, such detestable consequences may ensue. Where the latter operates on the heart, it will always produce very different effects. Such a person, from such a faith, will be no more inclined to inactivity or licentiousness, than our busy humming companions are inclined, by this bright sunshine, and all those expanded blossoms, to sleep away their hours in the hive. And you may as soon expect to see these colonies of the spring swarm in December, clinging to an icicle, or dispersing themselves to gather honey on the snow, as to see a truly gracious man “who is dead to sin, living any longer therein,” (Rom. vi. 2.) Whoever, therefore, so shamefully perverts so sweet and glorious a doctrine, is a witness against himself, that he has neither lot nor portion in the inestimable privilege. If an animal suck poison from the most wholesome herbs, we are sure, from that infallible indication, it is the vile spider, or some envenomed insect, not the valuable and industrious bee.

Ther. Truly, Aspasio, I know not how to call that doctrine sweet, much less can I recommend it as wholesome, which renders repentance, personal reformation, and inherent rectitude, needless. And if your tenet is once received, all these duties may fairly be dismissed. So that if the thing was possible, yet it would be pernicious.

Asp. The prophet was of another mind: “They shall look on him whom they have pierced, and mourn," (Zech. xi. 10.) Sinners shall look by faith to their crucified Lord; shall see him fastened with nails to the cursed tree; see him stabbed to the heart by the bloody spear. And remembering that this was the punishment due to their provocations, believing that by this punishment they are freed from all penal sufferings, and entitled to all spiritual blessings,—they shall not be tempted to transgress, but incited to mourn; not play the profligate, but act the penitent. The apostle exactly agrees with the prophet; and both are diametrically opposite to my friend: "The goodness," the transcendent and amazing goodness of God our Saviour, instead of diverting from, "leadeth to repentance," (Rom. ii. 4.)

Far from obstructing, it powerfully promotes personal reformation. For thus saith that all-wise Being, who intimately knows our frame, and discerns what is most effectual to work upon our minds: "The grace of God, which bringeth salvation, hath appeared; teaching us, that, denying all ungodliness and worldly lusts, we should live soberly, righteously and godly, in this present evil world," (Tit. ii. 11, 12.)—Grace, you observe, even that gloriously free grace, which bringeth salvation to unworthy creatures, is a dissuasive of all vice, and an encouragement to every virtue.

As to inherent rectitude, how can that be rendered needless by imputed righteousness? Is health rendered insignificant by the abundance of our riches? Does ease become superfluous, through the beauty of our apparel? Holiness is the health of our souls and the ease of our minds; whereas, ungovernable passions create keener anguish than a brood of vipers gnawing our bosoms. Inordinate desires are a more intolerable nuisance than swarms of locusts infesting our abodes. To regulate those, and to restrain these, can never be needless, till comfort and sorrow change their properties—till the diabolical nature becomes equally desirable with the divine.

Ther. The believer, indeed, out of mere generosity, may, if he please, add works of righteousness of his own. But his main interest is secure without them.

Asp. Rather, Theron, he must out of duty, he will out of gratitude; and, from the new disposition of his nature, he cannot but add to his faith works of righteousness.

How runs the heavenly edict in this case made and provided? "I will, that they who have believed in God, be careful to maintain good works.—How beats the pulse of a believing soul? You may feel it in that truly generous demand made by the Psalmist, "What shall I render unto the Lord for all the benefits that he hath done unto me," (Psalm cxvi. 12.) A grateful heart wants not the goad, but is a spur to itself. How leans the bias of his nature? He is new born; "created in Christ Jesus unto good works," (Eph. ii. 10.) "his delight is in the law of the Lord," (Psalm i. 2.) And whatever is our supreme delight, we are sure to prosecute, and prosecute with ardour. "We cannot but speak the things which we have seen and heard, was the profession of the apostles; and, if applied to practical godliness, is the experience of the Christian.

Nor can his main interest be secure without a holy obedience. Because the Judge of the world, at the day of eternal retribution, will declare to the workers of iniquity, "I never knew you; depart from me," (Matt. vii. 23.) Because holiness, though not the cause of our admittance to the beatific vision, is so necessary a qualification, that "without it no man shall see the Lord," (Heb. xii. 14.) Without it, there is no access to heaven, neither could there be any enjoyment in heaven.

Ther. Pray recollect yourself, Aspasio, According to the tenor of your own illustration, the necessity of personal obedience is evidently vacated. For how can the law demand a debt of the principal, which has been fully discharged by the surety?

Asp. The debt of penal suffering, and the debt of perfect obedience, are fully discharged by our divine Surety, so that we are no longer under a necessity of obeying, in order to obtain an exemption from punishment, or to lay the foundation for our final acceptance. We are nevertheless engaged, by many other obligations, to walk in all dutiful and conscientious regard to the law; because this is the most authentic proof of our love to the gracious Redeemer: "If ye love me, keep my commandments," (John xiv. 15.) This is a comfortable evidence of our union with that exalted head: "He that abideth in me, and I in him, the same bringeth forth much fruit," (John xv. 5.) This is also the most effectual method of adorning our profession, of magnifying its Author, and of winning our neighbours to embrace the gospel: "Let should show others the way, and outstrip them in the honourable race; be both a pattern, and a patron of universal godliness.

* "Cannot but"—This is an expression used by the apostles, Acts iv. 20. It describes the genuine and habitual propensity of their new nature. As the compassionate bowels cannot but yearn at spectacles of misery: as the benevolent heart cannot but dilate with pleasure at the sight of a brother's happiness; so the new creature in Christ cannot but desire to glorify, and delight to obey the ever-blessed God.

* Tit. iii. 8. The original word προσκαταβαί has a beauty and an energy, which, I believe, it is impossible for our language to preserve, by any literal translation. It implies, that a believer should not only be exercised in, but eminent for, all good works; your light," the light of your exemplary conversation, not only appear, but "shine before men, that they, seeing your good works," may think honourably of your religion, (Matt. v. 16,) "may glorify your Father which is in heaven;" and say, with those proselytes mentioned by the prophet, "We will go with you."

"Do we then make void the law," through the imputed righteousness of our Lord? No, verily; but if gratitude to our dying Saviour have any constraining influence; if a concern for our own comfort have any persuasive energy; if there be any thing inviting, any thing desirable in the prospect of honouring God, and edifying man—"we establish the law." By all these generous, manly, endearing motives, we enforce its precepts, and provide for its observance.

Ther. Should we admit this doctrine, mankind could no longer be considered as in themselves, and solely in themselves, accountable creatures. Nor would the future judgment be an equitable distribution of rewards and punishments, but only God's awful and uncontrollable execution of his own arbitrary and irreversible decrees.

Asp. I have never been accustomed to consider mankind, under the gospel dispensation, as accountable solely in themselves; because in this comfortable and benign scheme a Mediator intervenes, undertakes to answer for his people, and bears the chastisement of their peace. Were we accountable solely in ourselves, Christ as our great High-Priest would be set aside, and his sacrifice as a propitiation for sin be of none effect.

Why may not the future judgment be an equitable distribution of rewards and punishments? If those who reject the atonement of the dying Jesus, and refuse to depend on his consummate righteousness, are left to stand or fall according to the issue of their own obedience; if believers, on the other hand, are accepted through their most meritorious Redeemer, but rewarded with higher or inferior degrees of felicity, in proportion to the sanctity of their nature and usefulness of their lives:—I see nothing arbitrary in this procedure, but an admirable mixture of just severity, and free goodness: on those who reject the atonement, just severity; to those who rely on their Saviour, free goodness.

Ther. The obedience of Christ was wholly due for himself, and therefore could not merit for another.

Asp. A bold assertion this! Whoever can make it good, will infallibly overthrow my opinion, and at the same time destroy all my hopes. But surely, Theron, it is not your real sentiment.

Could it then be matter of duty in the eternal Son to be born of a woman; and in the Lord of lords to become the servant of all? Could it be matter of duty in the King of Glory, to embrace the infamy of the cross; and in the Prince of life, to pour out his soul unto death? If all this was matter of duty, the ever-blessed Jesus (how shall I speak it! who can believe it?) was no better than an unprofitable servant. For such is the acknowledged character of every one who does no more than is his duty to do. (Luke xvii. 10.)

Ther. Not so fast, nor quite so vehement, my friend. Remember what the scripture affirms. Christ is said to receive a commandment, and be subject to the law; both which expressions evidently imply duty.

Asp. In order to accomplish our redemption, the Son of God submitted himself to the authority of the law, and became obedient to its precepts. But this was his own spontaneous act, the matter of his free choice; to which he lay under no manner of obligation, till he engaged to be our Surety.

"Being in the form of God," he was Lord of the law; and no more subject to its commands than obnoxious to its curse. Nevertheless, "he took upon him the form of a servant, and was made under the law." Wherefore? That he might obtain everlasting life and glory for himself? No; but that he might "redeem those who were under the law." (Gal. iv. 5.) From which it appears, that both his engagement and his obedience were, not for himself, but for his people. Therefore the prophet cries out, with holy exultation, "To us a Child is born; to us a Son is given!"* His incarnate state and human nature, together with all that he did and suffered in both, were for us; those assumed on our account, these referred to our advantage.

Let us consider this, and be amazed, and be charmed. The great universal Lord vouchsafes to pay universal obedience: What condescension was here! He vouchsafes to pay it, for us men, and for our redemption: What goodness was this!

Ther. Before we indulge the devotional strain, we should take care that our devotion is founded on rational principles; otherwise it may prove, like the flash of a skyrocket, transient and momentary.

Asp. For this, I think there is a solid foundation in reason, as well as scripture. As soon as the man Christ Jesus was united to the second person of the Trinity, he must have, by virtue of that union, an unquestionable right to everlasting life and glory; therefore he could be under no necessity of obeying, in order to procure either honour or happiness for himself. But all that he performed in conformity to the preceptive part of the law, he performed under the character of a public person, in the place and for the benefit of his spiritual seed, that they might be interested in it, and justified by it.

Ther. Be it so: the believer is interested in Christ's righteousness. Pray, is he interested in all, or only in part? If in all, then every believer is equally righteous, and equally to be rewarded; which is contrary to an allowed maxim, that there will be different allotments of happiness in the heavenly world. If in part only, how will you ascertain the degree—what proportion belongs to this person, and what to the other? Either way, your scheme is inextricably embarrassed.

Asp. The reply to my Theron's inquiry is easy; and the embarrassment he mentions is but imaginary. Every true believer is interested in all Christ's righteousness—in the whole merit of his spotless nature, of his perfect obedience, and expiatory death.

Less than the whole would be unavailable. Whereas the whole renders us completely justified.

You are a great admirer of anatomy, Theron, and must undoubtedly remember the very peculiar structure of the ear. Other parts of the body are progressive in their growth: their bulk is proportioned to the infantile or manly age. But the organs of hearing, I have been informed, are precisely of the same size, in the feeble infant and the confirmed adult. Justification likewise, being absolutely necessary to a state of acceptance with God, is in every stage of the Christian course, and even in the first dawn of sincere faith, complete. With regard to the existence of the privilege, there is no difference in the babes, the young men, the fathers in Christ.* The perception, the assurance, the comfortable enjoyment of the mercy, may increase; but the mercy itself is incapable of augmentation.

The various advances in sanctification account for the various degrees of future glory; and not account for them only, but render them entirely reasonable, and, according to our apprehension of things, unavoidable. As to settling the proportion, we may safely leave that to the supreme Arbitrator. He, "who meteth out the heavens with a span, and setteth a compass upon the face of the deep," cannot be at a loss to adjust this particular.

Ther. The organs of hearing, though not precisely, are very nearly, of the same bulk in the babe and the man. They acquire, from advancing years, scarce any thing more than an increase of solidity. So that I make no objection to your illustration, but to your doctrine.

If Christ has done all, and we are entitled to his whole merits only by believing—to be saved must be the easiest thing in the world: whereas the Bible represents Christianity as a race and a warfare, a state of conflict and a course of striving. In good truth, Aspasio, you prophesy pleasing things. Divinity is not your profession, or else I should number you among "the smooth emollient downy doctors." For, according to the articles of your creed, there is no more difficulty in securing heaven, than in rising from our seat.

Asp. A speculative assent to all the principles of religion, is, I acknowledge, a very easy matter. It may, it must exist, wherever there is a tolerable capacity for reasoning, and a due attention to evidence. This notional faith forced its way into the breast of Simon the sorcerer. (Acts viii. 13.) and extorted a confession from the dying lips of Julian* the apostate. Irresistible as the stroke of lightning, terrible also as its fiery glare, it flashes conviction into the very devils. Even those execrable spirits, "believe and tremble." (James ii. 19.)

But the faith which, far from resting in speculation, exalts the desires, regulates the passions, and refines the whole conversation; the faith which, according to the expressive language of Scripture, "purifies the heart, overcomes the world, and sets the affections on things above;"—this truly noble and triumphant faith is no such easy acquisition. This is the gift of an infinite Benefactor, the work of a divine Agent; called therefore by way of super-eminent distinction, "faith of the operation of God," (Col. ii. 12.) because God himself, by the effectual working of his mighty power, produces it in the human soul.

The exercise of this faith I would not compare to an active gentleman rising from his seat, but rather to a shipwrecked mariner, labouring to gain some place of safety. He espies a large rock which rears its head above the boisterous flood. To this he bears away, and to this he approaches; but whirling winds and dashing waves drive him back to an unhappy distance. Exerting all his strength, he advances nearer still, and attempts to climb the desirable eminence, when a sweeping surge interposes, and drenches him again in the rolling deep. By determined efforts, he recovers the space he had lost. Now he fastens on the cliff, and has almost escaped the danger. But there is such a numbness in his limbs that he cannot maintain his hold, and such an impetuous swell in the ocean that he is once more dislodged, and plunged afresh into the raging billows. What can he do? His life, his precious life is at stake. He must renew, still renew, and never intermit his endeavours. Neither let him abandon himself to despair. The Master sees him amidst all his fruitless toil. Let him cry earnestly, "Lord save me, I perish!" and he who commandeth the winds and the waves will be sure to put forth his beneficent hand, and rescue him from the devouring sea.

* To the same purpose speaks one of our most celebrated divines; as great an adept in sacred literature as ages have produced.—"All are justified alike: the truth of faith justifying, not the measure. Justification therefore is the same in all that believe; though their belief be in different degrees. So, once in the wilderness, all gathered not manna in the same measure, yet when all came to measure, they had all alike; none above an omer, none under."

Lightfoot, vol. ii. p. 1052.

* It is related in ecclesiastical history, that the Emperor Julian, that royal but wretched apostate, in an engagement with the Parthians, was mortally wounded; and that he cried, with his expiring breath, "'Vixisti, O Galilæe!'"—I am vanquished, O Galilee; thy right hand hath the pre-eminence!

Such, my friend, so painful, so assiduous are the struggles of faith, before it can rest in peaceful security on the "Rock of Ages, Christ Jesus." Of this you may, some time or other, be assured, not only from my lips, but from your own experience.

Ther. What may happen in some future period of time, is beyond my power to foresee. At present, I am apt to think, we must put a stop to the theological lecture. Do you not remember our engagement with Altinous? and you will own, that punctuality in performing our promises is at least a moral virtue, if it be not a Christian grace.

DIALOGUE VI.

ASPASIO'S affairs called him to London. He staid in town a few days; but as soon as business was finished, he quitted the city, and hastened to his friend's country-seat. Upon his arrival, he found some agreeable company, that came to spend the evening with the family. This incident prevented the immediate prosecution of their subject. As the next morning proved misty, and unfit for walking abroad, Theron invited Aspasio to pass an hour in his study.

It was situated at the extremity of a large gallery, which, while it conducted the feet to a repository of learning, interposed between the ear, and all the disturbance of domestic affairs; so that you are accommodated with every thing that may regale a studious mind; and incommoded with nothing that may interrupt a sedate attention. Aspasio readily consented to the proposal; but desired first to take a turn in this beautiful oblong, and divert himself with the decorations of the place.

Asp. A very short survey, Theron, is sufficient to discover the correctness of your judgment, and the true delicacy of your taste. Here are no impertinent and frivolous exhibitions of romantic tales or poetic stories. Here are no indecent pieces of imagery, that tend to corrupt a chaste, or inflame a wanton fancy. On the contrary, I am presented with a collection of maps, accurately drawn by the most able hands; and with several remarkable transactions of aniquity, most eloquently told in the language of the pencil. You have happily hit that grand point, which the gentleman of refinement, as well as the author of genius, should ever keep in view—the union of the beneficial with the delightful.

Ther. Indeed, my Aspasio, I have often been disappointed, sometimes even shocked, in the gardens, the porticos, and the walks of some modern virtuosi.—Their portraits and statues are little else but an assemblage of elaborate trifles. Ixion stretched upon the wheel, or Phaeton precipitated from the chariot. Apollo stringing his lyre, or Jupiter (I beg his supreme highness' pardon, for not giving him the precedence in my catalogue) bestriding his eagle and balancing his bolts. Pray, where is the advantage of being introduced to this fabulous tribe of gentry? What noble idea can they awaken, or what valuable impression leave upon the mind? The best we can say of such performances is, that they are limning and sculpture expensively thrown away.

This celebrated trumpery one can bear with however. But when the painting and sculpture, instead of cultivating virtue, and improving our morals, are calculated to be the very bane of both—will you call this an elegant entertainment? No: it is a nuisance; it is a pest. In the statues, I grant, every dimple sinks, and every muscle swells, with the exactest propriety. The countenance is animated with life, and the limbs are ready to start into motion. The picture, I am sensible, is as highly finished as the effigy: the distributions of light and shade most artfully adjusted; the diminutions of the perspective true to a nicety; nor can any thing exceed the easy flow of the robe, unless it be the graceful attitude, and almost speaking aspect, of the principal figure. But is this masterly execution an equivalent for the most malignant effects? for sullyng the purity of my fancy, and poisoning the powers of my imagination?

Is it an indication of the owner's judicious taste, to prefer regularity of features in the hammered block, before orderly and harmonious affections in his own breast? Does it bespeak a refined disposition, or a benevolent temper, to be so extravagantly enamoured with the touches of a lascivious pencil, as to expose them in the most frequented passages, and obtrude them on every unwary guest? Surely, this can create no very advantageous opinion of a gentleman's intellectual discernment; much less can it raise an amiable idea of his moral character.* On such occasions I am strongly tempted to suspect that real honour is a stranger where common decency† is wanting.

As for the artist, one can hardly forbear execrating his hateful folly, who could prostitute such fine talents to such infamous purposes. Detested be the chisel that teaches, though with inimitable dexterity, the cold obdurate marble, to enkindle dissolute affections. Abhorred be the pencil that makes no other use of the most lovely colours, than to pollute the canvass, and insult the spectator.

It is argued, I know, that many of those pieces are the completest models extant. An everlasting reproach this to the art; but no apology for the performances; since the more nicely they are executed, the more mischievous‡ is their influence. It strikes the surer, and sinks the deeper. It dresses destruction gay, and paves with beauty the way to ruin.

* It is a pity, but the advice of Cicero, that great master of elegant taste and polite manners, was received as a standard of regulation by all our connoisseurs in the fine arts: "In primis providcat, ne ornamenta adium atque hortorum vitium aliquod indicent inesse mortibus."—De Offic.

† A gentleman observing some gross indelicacies of this kind at the seat of a person of distinction, very acutely (and, I believe, too justly) said, "His paintings are the gibbet of his name."

‡ I hope it will not be thought improper, I wish it was entirely needless, to animadvert upon a practice, which is not only a reproach to our Christian profession, but an insult upon national decorum—the practice of exposing to public view, and offering to public sale, such shameful prints, as are fitted only to create licentious desires and cherish the most profligate dispositions.

Such spectacles are a species of the rankest poison. And can the poison be less pernicious, because it is received at the eye, instead of passing through the lips? Because it tends more immediately to debauch the morals, and but remotely to destroy the constitution? No wonder so many of our youths are corrupted, and so many robberies committed, while such scenes of pictured lewdness are suffered to inflame them with lust, and habituate them to impudence.

Another very indecent custom has unaccountably stole its way into several performances of genius and elegance. The custom, I mean of representing the nudes, the graces, and other romantic personages in the form of beautiful ladies, partly, if not entirely, naked. It is true, here are no loose adventures; no immodest gestures, nay, more, he artist expresses his own and consults your modesty, by presenting you with a position in profile, by the intervention of a foliage, or the lapet of a robe. But let me ask the ingenious operator, if he would choose to introduce his wife or his daughter, in such a manner, to public company? Is he startled at the question? is he shocked at the thought? Then set him effect, and let others consider, whether that can be graceful or allowable in a picture, which would be brutal and unsufferable in common life.

Socrates (who, before his application to philosophy, practised as a statuary) could not but blush at this abuse of his art; and, being to form a representation of the graces, he represented them properly habited.

It is my chief ambition, Aspasio, to have all my decorations so circumstanced, that the beholder may learn some valuable lesson in morality, or be reminded of some important event in history,—may find, even in the scenes of his amusement, something to establish his virtue, or enlarge his knowledge.

I frequently entertain my eldest son, who is reading the Greek and Latin historians, with an explanation of my principal drawings, that he may behold in colouring, what he has perused in narrative.—At this instant, the youth happened to make his appearance, paying his respects to Aspasio, and dutifully saluting his father. It just recurs to my memory, said Theron, that some necessary affairs of the family require my attendance for a few minutes. Will you excuse my absence, good Aspasio; and permit my son to supply my place.

You will very much oblige me by leaving me such a companion.—And come, my dear Sir, addressing himself to Eugenio, as I know you are a lover of learning, what think you of diverting ourselves with these agreeable books? which give us their instructive lessons, not in puzzling languages, but in pleasing colours. Eugenio spoke his consent, and expressed his modesty, by a becoming blush, while Aspasio proceeded—

Asp. This is a striking picture indeed: Hills piled on hills form a most astonishing prospect. What horrible magnificence reigns amidst those wild and shaggy rocks! Nature seems to have designed them for the boundaries of the world. Yet those daring troops are attempting to pass the prodigious barrier: Who are they, Eugenio; and whom shall we call their leader?

Eng. This, Sir, is the famous Hannibal, heading and encouraging his army in the passage of the Alps. The sons of Africa seem to shiver with cold, as they traverse those frozen regions, and march among the clouds.

Asp. It is the very same. Some, you observe, climb with excessive toil, the steep and craggy cliffs. Others, with far greater difficulty, descend through dreadful declivities of ice, exposed all the while to the arrows of the mountaineers. Some, endeavouring to avoid the showers of steel, slip with their feet, and tumble headlong down the vast projecting promontories. See from what a height they are falling! carriages and their drivers, the horse and his rider, and at what a distance still from the stony abyss below! Some lie with closed eyelids and ghastly features, dashed to death at the very bottom. Others writhing with the torture of mangled limbs and broken bones, lift up an agonizing look to their comrades. Their comrades, insensible of a brother's misery, and wholly intent upon their own preservation, hang frightfully suspended on the edges of the precipice. The precipice seems to totter as they cling; and the alarmed spectator expects every moment a hideous downfall. Are you not startled at the view, Eugenio, and in pain for the hardy adventurers?

Eug. I am, Sir. And I wonder how they will extricate themselves from these perilous circumstances. I have read in Livy, that they cut their way through the rocks, after they had softened them with vinegar. But is this probable? how could they procure a sufficient quantity amidst those desolate mountains?

Asp. I believe their resolution and their perseverance were the vinegar. These open a road through rocks. These, under the conduct of prudence, and the favour of heaven,* surmount all obstacles. Influenced by these, the survivors press boldly on, and are determined to vanquish the horrors of nature, as a prelude to their victory over the forces of Rome. Let these, resolution and perseverance I mean, be the companions of my Eugenio's youthful studies, and they will enable him also to conquer difficulties—even all the difficulties which lie in his way to true religion and sound learning.

What is our next draught! At each end we have a group of living figures. All the intermediate space is an extensive tract of land, diversified only by rapid rivers, horrid deserts, and mountainous, ridges; with here and there a few savage natives in uncouth dresses, and formidable arms. It is more like a map than a picture; and the most remarkable beauty is the aerial perspective; which puts a very agreeable cheat upon our eyes; causing us to behold on an ell of canvass the space of many hundreds of miles.

Eug. This represents the retreat of the ten thousand Greeks. First we behold them in the plains of Media; at an immense distance from their native country; without

* Under the favour of heaven. I cannot but wish that the relator of Lord Anson's voyage round the world had anticipated Aspasio's remark; had made some grateful acknowledgments to an interposing Providence, in that masculine, nervous, noble narrative: A narrative of such signal deliverances, so critically timed, and so surprisingly circumstanced, as in the course of one expedition, are scarcely to be paralleled.

I am persuaded, it would have been no disparagement of the great commander, and his gallant officers, to have it thankfully recognised, on some very unexpected, yet most advantageous turn of affairs, "this hath God done." Neither could it have detracted from the merit of the brave sailors, to have confessed, on many hazardous emergencies, that all their resolution, all their address, and the exertion of their utmost abilities, had been only lost labour, without the remarkable co-operation of divine goodness. And I am apprehensive, that it must considerably diminish the delight of many readers, to observe the blessed author of all these mercies passed by unnoticed, unacknowledged, and without any share of the praise.

The sarcasm on Pope Adrian and his exploits, I fear, would be too proper on this occasion, Ilic Deus nihil fecit.

guides; without provision; and, what is the most desperate calamity of all, deprived of their ablest officers by treachery and murder. Well may they look dejected! How have I pitied them as I read their story? abhorred the perfidy of their enemies; and wished them all success in their hazardous enterprise!

Asp. Do not you perceive their drooping spirits begin to revive, and some gleam of hope diffuses itself through their countenances, while they listen to the eloquent Xenophon, who stands conspicuous in the midst, haranguing his soldiers, and rousing their courage. But, ah! what a vast extent of unknown climes must they traverse, with a numerous and victorious army harassing them in flank, or hanging upon their rear? What fatigues must they sustain, what hardships endure, before they arrive at their wished-for home!—Fired by the enchanting name, and animated by their brave philosophic leader, they resolve to push their way through all the extremes of peril and of pain. To scatter, with their little band, the encircling millions of barbarians, is the smallest of their achievements. They cross rivers, they scale rocks, whose slippery banks, and craggy summits, are lined with opposing nations. They wade through deserts of snow; and pass over inhospitable mountains, the far more dreaded abodes of desolation, drought and famine. They encounter the keenness of the northern storm, and all the rigour of the most malignant seasons. As some of these articles are incapable of being expressed by the pencil, the artist remits us to the historian, and has contented himself with marking out the most distinguished stages of this memorable expedition. Only we view the courageous itinerants, once again, on a pretty lofty eminence. There they appear, not with their former dejection, but in all the transports of joy.

Eug. This, Sir, is the mountain Tecqua, from whence they had the first view of the sea, and the first dawn of safety. There they embrace one another, and extol their commanders, especially the noble Xenophon, whose history gives me great delight, and his manly yet benign aspect strangely attracts my esteem. Methinks, under such a general, I could have been willing to take my share in all the toil and all the hazards of the expedition.

Asp. Would my Eugenio? Then I will list him under a Captain unspeakably more accomplished and beneficent. Young as you are, you shall, from this hour commence a soldier and a traveller;—a soldier, to fight against sin, and every temptation—a traveller, to pass through the wilderness of this world, unto the land of everlasting rest. Though your enemies may be numerous, and your journey tedious, yet faint not, neither be discouraged. The Lord of heaven is your guide, and heaven itself shall be your exceeding great reward. When you arrive at those happy abodes, your delight will infinitely surpass all that the Grecians felt on Tegea, when their ravished eyes beheld, and their tongues with ecstasy shouted, "the sea! the sea!"

The scene of yonder picture, I would venture to affirm, lies among the ancient Jews.

Eug. How can you tell this, Sir, at such a distance?

Asp. By "the fringes in the borders of their garments, and on each fringe a riband of blue." God Almighty commanded all the Jews to observe this peculiarity in their habit,* that their very clothes, being different from the apparel of their heathen neighbours, might admonish them not to be conformed to their idolatrous worship and licentious manners. This, as well as every other divine command, our Lord Jesus Christ most exactly obeyed. Therefore we are told by the evangelical historian, that the diseased woman, "who touched but the hem of his garment, was restored to health." Hem it is in our English bibles; but, if you consult that most excellent of all books, the Greek Testament, you will find, that the original word might more properly be rendered fringe.† However, let us pass from the drapery to the design.

Eug. Here we see David in one of the most threatening exigencies of his whole life. Saul, more like a blood-hound than a king, pursues the best of sons, and the most valuable of subjects. He has extended the wings of his very superior army, in order to surround the injured hero and his handful of associates.

* One would wonder how the Jews can so tenaciously adhere to their law, and yet so apparently neglect its precepts. Where are the sons of Abraham, who observe this express and positive command of Jehovah! Though this indeed might be obeyed, yet many of the Mosaic injunctions are rendered, and by nothing less than the dispensations of Providence, absolutely impracticable. Is not this, therefore, a most incontestible proof—a proof, not invented by the arts of sophistry, but written by the finger of the Almighty himself—that the legal ordinances are abolished, in order to make way for a better dispensation? When the avenues are become inaccessible, the house untenable, and the principal apartments irreparably decayed; is not this the most cogent admonition to the inhabitants, that they betake themselves to some new and more commodious residence? See Num. xv. 38.

† Matt. ix. 20. Κρατερῶν.

‡ To this, or some such incident, may be applied a passage of the Psalms, which, in our translation, is very obscure; has scarce any sense, or if any, a very unjustifiable one. "Wherefore should I fear in the days of evil, when the wickedness of my heels compasseth me round about?" Psalm xlix. 5. Wherefore! The reason is very apparent: When wickedness cleaves to a person's heels, or habitually attends his goings, it raises an army of errors; it unsheathes the sword of divine vengeance, and levels at his guilty head every threatening in the book of God.

Surely then another translation should be given to

Asp. This is the most animated, and I think the most masterly performance, that has hitherto come under our notice. Consternation and doubt agitate their looks. Shall they surrender themselves, as so many tame victims, to a tyrant's fury; or shall they cut their way to safety, through the hearts of countrymen, friends, and brothers? Dreadful dilemma! While they are debating, the pursuers are closing upon them. A few, a few minutes more, must decide their fate. But who is the person that intervenes, just at this critical juncture?

Eug. It is a messenger from the principal inhabitants of Judea. He comes breathless and trembling, amazement in his face, and dust upon his head. "An invasion!" he cries, "an invasion! The Philistines have poured themselves upon our frontiers! The Philistines are overrunning the land!"*

Asp. Upon the receipt of this news, see what vexation reddens in the disappointed monarch's aspect! What anger lightens in his eye! At the same time, what pale reflections on his country's danger mingle themselves with the fiery passions, and almost quench the flame enkindling in his cheeks. Shall the vulture relinquish his prey, even when it lies fluttering under his talons? Galling thought! But his kingdom is at stake. If he does not immediately advance to repel the enemy, his all, his all is lost. Burning therefore with indignation, yet chilled with fear, he turns, hasty though reluctant, away. Are you not charmed, Eugenio, with this description of tumultuous and contrary passions, which afford the finest subject for historic painting, and are so happily expressed in this piece?

Eug. Indeed, Sir, I am shocked, rather than charmed. The very looks of that revengeful monarch fill me with horror. What must he suffer in his mind, who discovers such rage and anguish in his features! I would not have his furious temper, for all his royal power.

Asp. Then, my dear Eugenio, you must endeavour to suppress every emotion of the words, and a different turn to the sense! And another translation the words will bear; a different sense the connexion demands: "Wherefore should I fear, when wickedness compasseth me about at my heels?" This is a fine spirited interrogation. This implies a great and edifying truth. From this also the verse appears, not only with propriety, but with beauty. When wickedness, or the malicious attempts of wicked men—compass me about, surround me, threaten me on every side—may, when they are at my very heels, just upon the point to seize, overwhelm and crush me, so that the danger seems both inevitable and imminent; yet even then, having God's almighty power and inviolable faithfulness for my protection, wherefore should I be alarmed? alarmed! No; confiding in such a safeguard, I will bid defiance to my enemies, and bid adieu to my fears.

* This event is related 1 Sam. xxiii. 25, &c. And it is one of the most extraordinary instances of a divine interposal, at the very crisis of need, that any history has recorded.

envy and malevolence. You must cherish a cordial good-will to all men; and learn to rejoice in their excellencies and happiness, as well as in your own. Envy is the worm that gnaws, envy is the fury that embroils his wretched heart. And an author, with whom you will ere long be acquainted, has assured us,

Invidia Siculi non invenerunt tyranni Tormentum majus.—Hor.

The next is a kind of night-piece. Stars are in the sky, and the new moon rides on the skirts of the hemisphere; which affords just light enough to distinguish objects. This is a perfect contrast to the foregoing: We see no conflict of jarring passions; but the principal person appears sedate and composed, as the night that surrounds him. He stands on the bank of a river, thoughtful and attentive, as though he was pondering or executing some important project.

Eug. This is Cyrus the Great. He stands upon the banks of the Euphrates, not far from Babylon. He points with his sceptre, and is giving directions to his army. The directions are, to pass through the channel of the river (which is drained of its water) in order to surprise the city.

Asp. This is a prince of very superior dignity, the honoured instrument of executing Jehovah's counsels. He was foretold by the prophet Isaiah, and even mentioned by name, more than two hundred years before his birth. (Isaiah xlv. 28; xlv. 1.) Let us wish him prosperity; for he goes to humble the pride of Babylon, and release the captivity of Israel. See with what regular movements and what calm alacrity his troops advance! Silence seems to escort them, while, under covert of the shades, and with Providence at their head, they march along a road never before trodden by the foot of man. The soldiers of the garrison have abandoned their station on the wall, to join in the dissolute indulgence of this fatal night. The inhabitants, like many a heedless sinner, are lulled in indolence, and dreaming of pleasures, even on the very brink of ruin.

Eug. Why are those brazen gates which lead to the river, placed in such a distinguished point of view? They strike my eye more, I think, than all the monuments of art and grandeur, which adorn that superb city. And let me farther ask, whether the painter has not offended against probability, in suffering them to stand wide open? On approach of so formidable an adversary, I should expect to have found them shut with all possible security.

Asp. In this particular, the painter has showed his judgment, and not forgotten his piety. God had devoted that haughty and oppressive metropolis to destruction. And you will perceive, from this circumstance, how wonderfully he overrules all events* for the accomplishment of his sacred purpose. Had those ponderous gates been shut,* the city had continued impregnable, and the whole enterprise been defeated. But, through some accidental forgetfulness, occasioned by the disorders of this riotous solemnity, or rather by a very signal interposition of divine vengeance, they are left open, and afford an easy entrance to slaughter and death, which rush upon the unhappy creatures all sunk in sleep, or overcharged with wine, as a concealed snare in some dreadful unexpected moment springs up, and inextricably entangles the unwary bird. Was I to inscribe this picture with a motto, I would choose the apostle's admonition, "be sober; be vigilant."

Who is this, with his length of hair flowing upon his shoulders, with such amplitude of personage, such magnificence of mein, and noble plainness of habit?

Eug. This is my favourite piece. My father sometimes shows me the heads of the philosophers; but there is something so uninviting and severe in Socrates and Diogenes, that I could never much admire them. But this, Sir, is Scipio; the thunderbolt of war, as Virgil calls him. Here is something so lovely and engaging, as well as grand and majestic, that I am never weary of looking on him.

Asp. He appears with a lady of distinguished beauty in his hand.

Eug. This is the captive princess, who had been taken in war, who was set apart for the General's prize, but whom he is now restoring to her espoused husband.

Asp. You are right, Eugenio. He has just led in his lovely captive, attended by her husband and parents, amidst a full assembly of Romans and Celtiberians, the victors and the vanquished. His modest eyes, you observe, are rather turned from, than gazing upon the blooming virgin. Cannot you suppose, how the spectators must be affected, upon the opening of this extraordinary scene? Every one beholds the hero with admiration, the lady with delight. Every bosom is big with expectation

* See this very momentous, though seemingly inconsiderable circumstance, finely illustrated by Mr. Rollin, and compared with a remarkable prophecy in Isaiah, Ancient Hist. vol. ii. p. 144, &c. A work, in which the most entertaining and instructive events of antiquity are regularly digested, elegantly related, and stripped of those minuter incidents, which make the story move slow, and are apt to fatigue the attention.

† I believe it was not customary with the Romans, especially their warriors, to have long flowing hair. This, therefore, might seem an offence against what the Italians call il costume, if the painter was not supported by the authority of Livy; who, in his descriptive picture of Scipio, gives us the following touches: "Species corporis ampla ac magnifica. Præterquam quod suapte natura multa majestas inerat, adornabat promissa Cæsaries, habitusque corporis, non cultus munditius, sed virilis vere ac militaris.—Lib. xxviii. c. 35.

or in pain for the event. After a short pause, he addresses himself to the lover, in words to this effect: "I am no stranger to your interest in this fine woman: The fortune of war has put her entirely into my power. The circumstance of my youth cannot render me insensible to so engaging a person: But with us Romans, honour and generosity have a more prevailing influence than transitory gratifications. Take your bride; be happy in each other; and when you look upon this gift, admire the Romans, be a friend to Rome." Upon this he delivers her (as you behold the action here represented) to the enamoured prince.—See how the crowds, that cluster and hang around, are struck with the beneficent deed! In the Celtiberians, we behold a mixture of veneration and surprise. Their looks are full of meaning. Methinks they are going to cry out, "excellent man!" In the Romans, we discern a conscious superiority, and exultation of mind. Triumph is in their features, as though they would say, "this wondrous man is ours." In the lady, we admire the accomplished and modest fair, uniting all the dignity of her birth with all the delicacy of her sex. What soft confusion and what tender joy appear in her countenance! She is lost in wonder, and at a loss for words; she speaks the acknowledgments of her heart by the silent eloquence of a tear, which steals down her glowing cheek to bedew the kind hand that has protected her innocence, and is delivering her to her lord. Her lord is under an apparent and a graceful struggle of love and gratitude: He doats upon his charming princess, and he almost adores his generous benefactor. We can hardly tell whether he is going to clasp the former in his arms, or throw himself at the feet of the latter. The aged parents express their transport in a different manner. Their knees are bent to the earth; their eyes are lifted up to heaven; they implore for their noble guardian, every blessing that the gods can bestow. Scipio himself displays all the magnanimity of the conqueror, tempered with the sedateness of the philosopher, and softened with the gentleness of the friend. He gives happiness; but he enjoys a greater. His eyes sparkle with a sublime delight; and he seems to anticipate the applause, which this truly heroic act will gain in all countries and in all ages.

Eng. Is not this a greater victory than any that he had won in the field of battle; and a nobler triumph than any that could be voted him by the applauding senate! Amiable Scipio! Might I be a Roman, I would be no other than Scipio.

Asp. I wish you, my dear Sir, the temperance and generosity of Scipio; but from a better motive than his. He, I fear, was too much swayed by a spirit of ambition, which you must endeavour to suppress rather than cherish. A spirit of ambition which pants after distinction, and thirsts for applause, is diametrically opposite to the genius of the gospel, (Gal. v. 26.) It is a lesson which must infallibly be unlearned, if ever we become possessors of faith, or partakers of Christ, (John v. 44.) It is "a root of bitterness," which naturally produces envy, (Gal. v. 26.) that most odious, and (as you have just now seen) most self-tormenting of all tempers. It is a habit of mind, which generally renders men incendiaries in the church, and disturbers of its tranquillity, (3 John 9, 10.) It is, therefore, more like an enchanted potion which inebriates, than a genuine cordial which animates.

Eng. From what motive then would you encourage me to be diligent in the pursuit of learning, and in the cultivation of every virtue?

Asp. Not, that you may acquire the poor, contemptible, perishing honour, which cometh from men;—but that you may please God, your Almighty Creator; that you may glorify Christ, your infinitely condescending Redeemer; that you may yourself attain what is the true dignity and only felicity of your nature; and may be serviceable to the best interests of your fellow-creatures—even their present holiness and their eternal happiness.

These are the grand and endearing encouragements which our holy religion proposes. These will operate, I am bold to aver, with a much sweeter and a far more sovereign efficacy, than all the glittering enticements which ambition can devise: and, what is above all other considerations weighty, these will be more likely, or rather these will be very certain, to receive the divine blessing.

You told me you was never weary of contemplating Scipio. For which reason I promise myself, you will not be fatigued or displeas'd though I have so long confin'd your attention to this portrait. But have we no hero of Britain, fit to join this illustrious triumvirate from Rome, Persia, and Judea?

Eng. The very next we meet is one of our English kings. But I cannot say that I remember either his name or his story.

Asp. How, my young gentleman! Do you read the annals of other nations, and not acquaint yourself with the affairs of your own country? If I was in your place, I would apply myself to the classical writers by way of study, and to some valuable English historian by way of amusement. Such an amusement is infinitely preferable to novels or romances, and will not only relax your attention, but enrich your mind.

Eug. I thank you, good Sir, for your admonition, and, if you please, I will now begin the study you recommend. Your explanation of these drawings shall be the rudiments of my knowledge, and I shall think it a happiness to receive my first instructions from so able a master.

Asp. It is honour enough for me, Eugenio, to have given you the hint. I only point out your game, or spring the covey; you shall be taught by a more expert proficient, to make it your own. Yet, though others may direct you with greater skill, none will rejoice in your successful pursuit, more sincerely than myself.

This is our renowned Henry the Fifth, as he appeared after the victory of Agincourt. You see the gallant conqueror clad in steel, and recent from the slaughter of the insulting foe. He seems to breathe an heroic ardour, which is irradiated and exalted by a lively devotion. If courage can be expressed by the pencil, this is its genuine likeness; keen, yet composed; grasping the sword, yet looking up to heaven. He that a little while ago drove the battle, like a whirlwind, on the legions of France, now bends a suppliant knee, and offers the eucharistic hymn to the Lord God of Hosts. No turbulent or disorderly joy riots among the soldiery. They express not the triumph of their hearts in frantic exultations or drunken revels, but in acts of thanksgiving to Jehovah: in an attitude which speaks the devout acknowledgment of the prophet, "Thou art our battle-axe and weapons of war," (Jer. li. 20.) or the grateful declaration of the Psalmist, "Not unto us, O Lord, not unto us, but unto thy name be the glory," (Psal. cxv. 1.)

This last instance informs my Eugenio, that prayer is an honourable employ; has been practised by persons of the most admired endowments; is the surest method of obtaining success in whatever business we undertake, and of enjoying prosperity, in whatever circumstances we are placed.

The next piece is different from all the preceding. In those, armies with their banners displayed, ships of war riding at anchor, battering engines, and instruments of death, form the perspective. In this, we have all around, a lovely and rural landscape, expressive of peace, and enriched with plenty. Corn and cattle in the valleys, fruitful vineyards on the hills, and beautiful gardens surrounding the houses. But who is that graceful and august personage, seated on a stately throne of ivory and gold?

Eug. This is Solomon, having an interview with the Queen of Sheba. A large train of her attendants through the avenues of the palace; some leading foreign animals; some bearing vases and caskets; all arrayed in strange apparel. The Israelites stare upon their outlandish visitants, their costly presents, and peculiar habits. Their visitants are as much surprised at the walls, the towers, and especially the temple of Jerusalem. But you, Sir, I apprehend, are most pleased with the venerable person who fills the throne.

Asp. Indeed I am; and so his royal guest. You observe in her robe, her retinue, her deportment, an unpolished kind of grandeur. But all in Solomon is so splendid, and at the same time so elegant; displays such a delicacy of taste and such a magnificence of spirit, that the Sabeen princess is perfectly in raptures. See how she stands fixed and gazing with speechless admiration,* like one lost in astonishment and transported with delight! Her looks speak what, when she recovers the power of utterance, her tongue expresses: "It was a true report, that I heard in my own land, of thy acts, and of thy wisdom. Howbeit, I believed not the words, until I came, and mine eyes had seen, and behold, the half was not told me; thy wisdom and prosperity exceed the fame which I heard."

Eug. This is a great compliment. Is it right, Sir, to praise a man in such plain terms, and such high strains, to his very face? I think I have heard Philenor blame such a practice, as inconsistent with refined manners; and I have heard my father say, no one is a better judge of fine breeding than Philenor. And if the most agreeable behaviour, added to the most winning conversation, are what you call fine breeding, I am sure Philenor is master of it to a very great degree. I love to be in his company, and am never better pleased than to hear him talk.

Asp. The compliment is high, but it is just. It is strictly conformable to truth, and proceeds from the most unaffected sincerity. If we take what follows into consideration, we shall have a pattern of true politeness; a propriety, and a refinement of address, far surpassing her Majesty's external state; "Happy are thy men; happy are these thy servants, which stand continually before thee, and that hear thy wisdom." Instead of envying, she congratulates the domestics of Solomon, and rejoices in their superior felicity. This is benevolence. "Blessed be the Lord thy God, which delighted in thee, to set thee on the throne of Israel. Because the Lord loved Israel for ever, therefore made he thee king, to do judgment and justice."—Here she ascribes all his royal virtues, and matchless accomplishments, to the bounty of heaven. Though they are applauded in the person of Solomon, they are recognised as the free gift of God. This is piety. When the endowments we celebrate lead us to magnify, not their possessor, but their author, then the poison is corrected, and turned into medicine. Praise thus circumstanced loses its malignity, and is rendered salubrious.

* This, I apprehend, is the meaning of that remarkable strong expression used by the sacred historian; "There was no more spirit in her," 1 Kings x. 5.

It pleases me to perceive that you take so much notice of the conversation which passes between your worthy father and his ingenious friends. I promise myself, you will also remember the maxim, which we have now learned from a queen—a queen, whom not only the sacred historian, but our Lord Jesus Christ himself vouchsafes to mention, and with marks of approbation; whose name therefore will be had in honour, when Semiramis and Cleopatra, the heroines and the beauties, are consigned over to oblivion. The maxim which I mean is this: There must be an union of sincerity, of benevolence, and of piety, in order to constitute true politeness. Whoever pretends to fine breeding, and is destitute of these qualities, is nothing more than a pretender. He bears just the same proportion to this ornamental character, as the ape and the monkey bear to the man.

But we have not sufficiently examined our picture. The dome is of cedar, supported by pillars of marble, to which are annexed curtains of silk and embroidery. The pillars shine with the most glossy polish, and swell upon the eye with the boldest projections. The curtains, pendent in large and easy folds, seem not adhesive to the canvass, but waving in the air. The throne is exquisitely contrived, richly ornamented, and highly finished. It is evident the painter had in his eye that remarkable observation of Scripture, “There was not the like made in any kingdom;” and he has really done all which art could devise, or colours execute, in order to exemplify the great eucommium.

If the monarch was absent, we should desire no better entertainment than to view the beauties of the apartment; but can hardly allow any attention to the edifice, when so graceful and so grand a presence bespeaks our regard. For I must own there appears to me something peculiarly excellent in this figure; a serenity and dignity, without any of that martial air which adds a tincture of ferocity to the warrior; a sagacity and penetration not to be equalled by the wrinkles of age, yet transparent through all the bloom of youth. Piety and wisdom, the love of God and the grace of his Spirit, give an elevation to the mind, a sacred charm to the countenance, and something more than mortal to the whole man. I am apt to suspect, Eugenio, that you yourself are ready to adopt a new favourite; that you now prefer Solomon even to Scipio; and had rather be like the “beloved of the Lord,” than the darling of Rome.

Eug. Every thing in Solomon is so venerable and heavenly, that I am filled with awe, rather than fired with emulation. It is not for a boy to think of imitating such high perfection!

Asp. Why not, my dear Sir? It was God who gave Solomon his superior wisdom and exalted accomplishments. And God is “the same yesterday, to-day, and for ever;” as willing to hear, and as able to help you, as he was to hear and bless his servant Solomon. Neither let your youth be a discouragement. “Out of the mouth of very babes and sucklings, he ordaineth strength, and perfects praise. (Psalm viii. 2.) Samuel ministered in the temple when he was but a child. (1 Sam. ii. 18.) Josiah, while he was yet young, began to seek after the God of his fathers. (2 Chron. xxxiv. 3.) Timothy was acquainted with the holy scriptures from his earliest years. (2 Tim. iii. 15.) And Solomon himself was none of the oldest, when he was favoured with that extraordinary vision, and made that admirable choice, at Gibeon. (1 Kings iii. 5, 6, &c.) a passage of scripture, which I dare say you have read, which I would recommend to your attentive consideration, and which I hope you will take for the model of your conduct. And if you, like that illustrious young prince, desire a wise and understanding heart, more than the affluence of wealth, or the distinctions of honour; “if you seek wisdom as silver, and search for her as for hid treasure; then shall you also understand the fear of the Lord, and find the knowledge of God.” (Prov. ii. 4, 5.)

The next that occurs, presents us with a view of the sea; and a most tremendous view it is.

Eug. This is the voyage related by the evangelist, when our Lord sailed with his disciples, and bid the storm be still, and made the ocean calm.

Asp. Then we may truly say, “a greater than Solomon is here!” Give me leave to hint, upon this occasion, that every picture of Christ must necessarily depreciate his glorious person. Therefore you will never think, that a few rays beaming round his sacred head, can properly distinguish the Son of God, or express the grace of his offices, and the divinity of his nature. It is not to display the perfections of the Lord Jesus himself, but only to give us an idea of one of his works, that the pencil has been employed on this grand subject.

You will also remember, that it was not the main ocean, but the lake of Tiberias, on which they sailed. However, the painter is at liberty to make his sea as large as he pleases, and his storm as terrible as he can. Accordingly he has collected all the horrors of a tempest. Lightnings fire the arch above; and thunders, could thunders have been painted, would have rocked the ground below. Those flaming bolts have smitten a huge promontory, and tore its rugged brow. See how the rocky fragment is tumbling, with impetuous bound from cliff to cliff! The waters, lashed by furious winds, heave and toss their tumultuous billows: Here they rise in rolling ridges, there they rage in devouring whirls. Amidst these horrible commotions, you behold a vessel in all the extremity of distress: Straining under the blast, battered and half overwhelmed by the surge, she can no longer maintain the unequal conflict; she yields to the resistless flood; and begins, evidently begins to sink. Perplexed, amazed, and at their wit's end, the disciples run to and fro. They shift the tackling, lighten the stowage, try every expedient; and find, to their inexpressible affliction, every expedient ineffectual.

We cast our eye forward, and their divine Master appears, sedately rising from a gentle slumber. He sees the perplexity and horror of his companions, without the least emotion of alarm. He sees destruction approaching, heaven and earth mingling; and instead of being dismayed, enjoys the elemental war. What composure in his mien! what dignity in his attitude! what majesty, sweetened with compassion, in his aspect! such as could arise from no other cause, but a conscious and undoubted certainty that not one of the company should perish, not a hair of their head be injured; and that all this mighty uproar of nature should end in a demonstration of his mightier power, and a confirmation of his disciples' faith. He looks abroad into the mutinous sky, and the turbulent deep: He waves, with an authoritative air, his sacred hand; and adds the great commanding word, "Peace! be still." Do you inquire after the effect? Let Milton declare it:

Confusion heard his voice, and wild uproar Stood ruled.

This is expressed in another draught. Where all is hushed, the tremendous agitations cease, and the most profound tranquillity takes place. The water is smooth as glass; we have the picture of a perfect calm, and view those very persons, who a little while ago, were in the wildest distraction, and in the jaws of ruin, surrounding their Lord as men alive from the dead. Their consternation is turned into wonder; and their pangs of fear into ecstasies of joy. They acknowledge the omnipotence, and adore the goodness of Jesus.

Eug. Well may they acknowledge his omnipotence, since winds and waves obey him. Great reason have they to adore his goodness, since he rescued them from the very jaws of death—that worst of deaths, perishing in the stormy deep.

Asp. If Jesus Christ had vouchsafed such a deliverance to my Eugenio, what would he have thought, or how would he have been affected?

Eug. I should have thought myself inexpressibly obliged, and that I could never show sufficient gratitude to so great a benefactor.

Asp. Assure yourself, then, my dear Sir, that he has done infinitely more for you: That he has delivered you, not indeed from being swallowed up by the raging billows, but from sinking into the pit of everlasting perdition: That he has not only rescued you from endless destruction, but obtained eternal life and heavenly happiness for you.—This he has done, not by speaking a word, or issuing a command; but by bearing your guilt, suffering your punishment, and dying the death, the most ignominious and tormenting death, in your stead. Should you not then unfeignedly love him? study to please him? and make it the reigning endeavour of your life to glorify him?

Here Theron returned, and the young student withdrew, after receiving some affectionate and encouraging compliments from Aspasio, who was going to enlarge upon the excellent taste of his friend, the instructive style of his pictures, the good sense and great proficiency of his son: But Theron, far from coveting the praise, and fully satisfied with the consciousness of acting the becoming part, prevented his discourse by stepping to a pair of glass folding doors, which, thrown open, admitted them into the study.

A chimney-piece of grey marble, with plain, but bold and protuberant mouldings, formed a very handsome appearance. In various little niches were fixed elegant busts; and on the several interstices hung beautiful prints, representing many of the most eminently learned men, who were the ornaments and blessings both of ancient and modern times. The shelves all around were accommodated, not encumbered, with books. Aspasio, running over the lettered backs, observed a collection of the most valuable authors in history and natural philosophy, in poetry and divinity.

You will easily perceive, said Theron, that I am somewhat singular in furnishing my study, as well as in ornamenting the avenue. My books are not for show, but use; and claim a regard, rather on account of their worth than their number. An immense multitude of volumes, I have always thought, is more likely to embarrass the attention than to improve the understanding. A huge library seems to resemble a perplexing labyrinth; and often bewilders the mind, instead of leading it expeditiously to the acquisition of truth.

When people are eager to peruse a multiplicity of writings, it frequently happens, that in reading all they digest none.* They taste some empty and transient amusement, but collect no solid or lasting advantage. Their minds are somewhat like those capacious looking-glasses, which we have seen exposed in the most frequented and populous streets of London. They receive all manner of shadowy images, but no substantial impression. A thousand figures pass through them, not one abides in them.

Our books, replied Aspasio, as well as our friends, should rather be select than numerous. For my part, I would desire no more than two or three of the most correct and masterly writers in any science. These a person of moderate capacity may be able to comprehend; and not comprehend only, but enrich his memory with the choicest sentiments, and make the substance of their works his own. He will, by repetition and familiar converse, enter into their spirit, and acquire their manner; while a rambler in reading does little more than gratify his fancy, without refining his taste, or amending his heart.

Upon this Aspasio turned himself, and espied, in one corner of the apartment the celestial and terrestrial globes; in another, a large reflecting telescope; and on the top of a bureau, one or two of the best microscopes.

These instruments, resumed Theron, have opened an inexhaustible fund of the finest entertainments.† They have furnished us with new eyes, and brought up, I may venture to say, a new world into our view. They give us a sight of wonders, which may seem incredible to the incurious vulgar, and were utterly unknown to the most inquisitive sages of antiquity. They charm the eye with a display of inimitable beauties, where nothing worthy of notice was expected. They throw the mind into a pleasing transport of admiration; and from the meanest, lowest objects, raise the most amiable and exalted ideas of the all-glorious Creator.

I have often regretted, that such rational and manly gratifications should be almost

* The author of Night Thoughts has touched this subject with great judgment, and equal sprightliness. Voracious learning, often over-fed, Digests not into sense the moiety meat. This forager on other's wisdom leaves Her native farm her reason quite untill'd. With mixed manure she surfeits the rank soil, Dung'd, but not dress'd; and rich to beggary.

† Gentlemen of taste and seriousness cannot, I think, have a nobler piece of furniture for their studies, than the microscope and the telescope, the orrery and the air-pump. This apparatus would afford them a most delightful and improving amusement in a solitary hour; it would also give them an opportunity of entertaining company in a truly elegant and very instructive manner. It would open a fine and ample field for displaying the glories of God the Creator, and of God the Redeemer.

universally supplanted by the fantastical and childish amusements in vogue. Why should not the contemplation of nature's surprising novelties be as acceptable an entertainment as the stale diversion of quadrille? be as refined an employ for a leisure hour, as to count the spots on a pack of cards? The ladies, I am very sure, might find brighter colours and more delicate ornaments, in the robes and head-dress of a common fly, than ever they found amidst the trinkets of a toyshop. And was the fair circle of females once acquainted with the radiant varnish and rich studs which enamel the cover of a beetle's wing, I am apt to think, they would view with less rapture, with more indifference, perhaps with a becoming disdain, all the pretty fancies of a beau's wardrobe.

A few days ago, when the accomplished Manilia favoured us with a visit, I showed her, through a magnifying glass, the sting of a bee, the scale of a soal, the wing of a guat, and some other beautiful minims of nature, together with the powder which adheres to our finger when we touch the body of a moth. "Amazing!" cried the young lady; "What elegant figures! What enchanting finery!"

— "Smallest lineaments exact,
In all the liveries deck'd of summer's pride,
With spots of gold and purple, azure and green."
Milton, l. vii.

"How perfect the polish, and how high the finishing, of that little weapon! This piece of defensive armour, how skilfully contrived, and how curiously wrought! Here rising into little ridges, like the bosses of a buckler, fitted to repel injuries: there, scooped into little cavities, designed, I suppose to diminish its weight; that the coat of mail may not encumber, even while it defends, the puny wearer. What I took to be a whitish despicable rag, is the neatest fan I ever beheld, mounted on sticks* inimitably tapering and slender, tinged with all the soft and lovely colours of the most glossy mother-of-pearl. But what astonishes me more than all, is the view of that coloured dust, which your instrument has turned into a cluster of feathers. Every one wrought off with a regularity and a delicacy that are beyond the power of description. The finest stroke drawn by the Italian pen, compared with the extreme minuteness of the shaft, is broad and bulky as an admiral's mast. A speck of leaf gold, could it be weighed against the exquisite attenuations of the vane,† would seem more substantial and ponderous than yonder marble slab.

* These sticks are the little ribs, which support, at proper intervals, the fine transparent membrane of the wing.

† Vane is the feathery part of a quill.

"How nice, even to a prodigy, must be the mechanism of the animalcule race! I see globules, I see tides of blood, rolling through meanders inexpressibly finer than the finest hair.—Stranger still! I see whole shoals of active creatures expatiating in a single drop of water;* taking their pastime amidst such a scanty canal, as unstrained, and as much at large, as leviathan in the abysses of the ocean. A whole kingdom of those creatures, though collected into a body, are quite undiscernible by the naked eye. What then must be the size of every individual? Yet in every individual there is a complete system of limbs; each endowed with spontaneous motion; all assembled, though not crowded, in a living atom. To reflect upon the texture of vessels, and the operation of organs, so complex, so numerous, yet so inconceivably minute; how it awakens admiration, fills me with reverence of the Almighty Maker, and yields a pleasure infinitely superior to all the moidish amusements of our sex! Your discoveries of life in miniature have given me a disgust of what is called high life, and its solemn fopperies. You have spoiled me, Theron, for a fashionable trifler. I shall no longer relish the dull economy of the fan, or the poor parade of the snuff-box."

Asp. Have you nothing to say of the telescope?—I believe it must be my province to celebrate this admirable invention; and I wish I could do it, with Manilia's brilliant imagination. If the microscope leads us downward, to the curious secrets of the animalcule creation, the telescope bears us upward, to the grand peculiarities of the starry regions. The eye, conducted by this wonderful guide, visits a variety of majestic orbs, which would otherwise be lost in unmeasurable tracts of ether. This, far more surprising than the discoveries of Columbus, has found out new colonies of worlds in every quarter of the nocturnal skies. This has placed a glittering crescent on the brow of one of the planets; and has given others a most stately train of attendants.†

Tell me, Theron, could you discern the full choir of the constellations, or distinguish the variegated face of the moon, without the aid of our telescopic tube? Could you, with your unassisted eye, get a sight of Jupiter's satellites, or procure a glimpse of Saturn's ring? Without that supplementary aid to our sight, they are quite imperceptible; though the satellites of the former are incomparably more magnificent than the retinue of all the monarchs in the world; and, compared with the ring of the latter, all the bridges on ten thousand rivers, are less than the ferule of your cane.

As the telescope to the eye, so is revelation to the understanding. It discovers truths, which, exclusive of such a discovery, had been for ever hid from the most sagacious minds. It is strange to the unlearned observer, that this ponderous globe of earth and seas should wheel its rapid circuit round the sun. But the telescope has rendered this fact clear to a demonstration. It is strange likewise to our natural apprehensions, that we should die in Adam, and be undone by our first parent's disobedience; nor less so, that we should be made alive in Christ, and derive our recovery from his imputed righteousness. But revelation makes this doctrine as certain as it is comfortable.

Ther. Does revelation make it certain? —This is a point not yet established but taken for granted. I rather apprehend, that revelation in no place maintains it—in many places disavows it. Since your absence, Aspasio, I have spent some time in searching the scriptures, with a particular view to this tenet; and I can find no such expression in the whole Bible as the imputation of Christ's righteousness. If it was so leading an article as you represent, surely it could not have been entirely forgotten by the inspired writers, nor utterly excluded from their body of divinity.

Asp. The very identical expression may not occur, and yet the doctrine be abundantly taught. I believe, you never met with the word resurrection in any part of the Pentateuch, nor ever read the phrase satisfaction in all the New Testament. Yet our Lord fully proved the truth of the former from the writings of Moses; and you yourself have acknowledged the latter to be the unanimous sense of the apostles and evangelists.

In the Epistle to the Romans, we have express and repeated mention of a righteousness imputed. What or whose righteousness can be the subject of this assertion? Not the righteousness of angels: They are a superior class of beings, and have no such intimate connexion with our nature. Not the righteousness of eminent saints: This is the exploded error of Popery; and furnishes the Romish zealots with that chimera of arrogance and folly, works of supererogation. Not any righteousness of our own: for it is positively

* In a single drop of water, Dr. Hook is said to have discovered, with his microscope, eight millions two hundred and eighty thousand animalcules. This is mentioned, because it is the prevailing philosophy of the age; though I must confess that M. Gautier seems to have gone a considerable way towards giving it another turn; as he has proved, before a learned assembly at Paris, that the vermiculares of Lewenhoeek, and the living molecule of M. de Buffon, were only balls of air agitated by the fermenting of the seed. If so, it is not impossible but Dr. Hook's animalcules may be nothing more than balls of air, agitated by the fermenting of the pepper. Be this as it will, the young lady's remarks on the wonder of mechanism in the animalcule creation, I believe, will never be controverted.

declared to be without works, (Rom. iv. 6,) in which no works of our own have any concurrence, or the least share.—What other righteousness then can be meant, but the righteousness of our great Substitute, Surety, and Saviour, who took our nature, discharged our debt; and is therefore styled, “Jehovah our righteousness.” (Jer. xxiii. 6.)

Ther. This seems contrary to the whole tenor of the sacred instructions. What says the prophet? “When the wicked man turneth away from his wickedness that he hath committed, and doth that which is lawful and right, he shall save his soul alive.” (Ezek. xviii. 27.) Here that greatest of blessings, the salvation of the soul, is ascribed to a departure from evil, and a perseverance in good; to a real alteration in a man’s own temper and conduct, not to any fanciful application of some transmissive righteousness from another.

Asp. Let me ask my Theron, is there no wickedness but riot and debauchery, profaneness and injustice? Unbelief, though it may pass without censure or notice in a system of morality, is, in the volume of revelation, declared a capital crime. Our Lord, speaking of the Holy Spirit, mentions it as a signal part of his office, that “He shall convince the world of sin.” Of what sin? Scandalous violations of moral rectitude? This were a needless employ. The light of reason is sufficient to evince such a charge, and the court of conscience is erected to pass the deserved sentence. Of sin, adds the heavenly Teacher, “because they believe not on me,” (John xvi. 9,) on my death, as the cause of their forgiveness; on my righteousness, as the ground of their acceptance; on my Spirit, as the powerful principle of their holiness.

Unbelief treats God as a liar, (1 John v. 10,) because it rejects the testimony which he has bore concerning his beloved Son. Unbelief tramples on the blood of Christ, and is a most contemptuous affront to all his saving offices. Unbelief would counteract the operations of the Holy Ghost, whose peculiar work it is to testify of Christ, and make manifest his righteousness. Unbelief instigates (could we have thought it possible?) a child of dust, a slave of sin, to idolize himself and his own performances. To say all in a word, unbelief is that great, that comprehensive iniquity, which scornfully rejects, or impiously renounces, the most glorious method of salvation which Omniscience itself could devise.

The wicked man, therefore, never turns from his wickedness, till he turns, by a true faith, to Jesus Christ. Till then, he is a rebel against the gospel, however he may pay some specious and partial regard to the law. So flagrant a rebel, that he stand-particularly excepted, in the act of evangelical indemnity. For as “he that believeth on the Son, hath everlasting life; so he that believeth not, is condemned already, and the wrath of God abideth on him.”*

Ther. What are the Psalmist’s sentiments on this subject? Does not he represent the matter in a very different light? “Thou, Lord, art merciful; for thou rewardest every man according to his,” not another’s “works.” (Psalm lxii. 12.)

Asp. Weighty saying! May it impress our very hearts! God is merciful, and therefore rewardeth. From whence it appears, that what we call a reward is really an act of mercy rather than of justice. “The wages of sin is death; but the gift,” (says the apostle, altering his style, and making a most important distinction,) the gift of God “is eternal life.” (Rom. vi. 23.) The inspired penman subjoins, not for but according to, every man’s works. His works are the measure, not the meritorious cause. To merit, is the sole prerogative of the Saviour. To him it is owing, that our imperfect services are honoured with any acceptance; much more that they are recompensed with any reward.

Ther. Does not this exposition of yours clash with that truly generous acknowledgment of St. Peter? “In every nation, he that feareth God, and worketh righteousness, is accepted with him.” (Acts x. 35.) Here it is undeniably evident, that acceptance with our Creator is founded on a man’s own piety, and personal integrity.

Asp. Rightly to understand this text, we should inquire into the circumstances of the history. The apostle had been strongly and most unreasonably prejudiced in favour of the Jews; imagining, that the salvation of Christ, like the dispensation of Moses, must be confined to his countrymen. But now, having considered the purport of his late heavenly vision, having compared it with the angelic message delivered to Cornelius; and being made acquainted with the character of that valuable man; he breaks out into this truly catholic declaration: “My prejudices are vanished. My sentiments are enlarged. From the instance before me, it is demonstrably certain, that God does not appropriate the blessings of his covenant to any particular person, family, or people. ‘But, in every nation, he that feareth him, and,’ from a principle of

* John iii. 18, 36. The words are exceedingly emphatical, and no less awful. Not barely he shall come into condemnation, but he (that believeth not) is condemned already. Though ever so civilized or refined in his outward conversation, he lies under a sentence of death, and is the object of divine wrath. Which not only will visit him, but abideth on him. So that, wherever he may be, whatever he may do, the displeasure of the tremendous Jehovah hangs over him, like a dreadful destructive sword; which, if he dies in such a condition, will inevitably fall upon him, and cut him in pieces eternally.

religion in the heart, 'worketh righteousness' in the life, 'is accepted;' so accepted, as to be an object of the divine favour, and an inheritor of eternal happiness."

This, I think, is the exact meaning of the place. And let it be recollected, that no one truly fears, or can possibly please God, without faith. (Heb. xi. 6.) For which reason, it seems necessary to suppose, that Cornelius, though a heathen by birth, had believed through grace. Nay, it is evident from the context, that he had heard of Jesus Christ; had some acquaintance with the design of his coming, and the execution of his office;* enough to be the ground of a real, though perhaps an infantile faith. The business of the apostle was, to lead this convert into the clear light, and full privileges of the gospel; to ratify and confirm his title to them, by the sacred seal of baptism; and introduce him, as the first fruits of the Gentiles, into the Christian church.

So that nothing can be concluded from this passage, but that the glad tidings of Christianity are for Jews, for Gentiles, for all people; that faith, even when weak, is productive of good works; and when sincerely improved, will certainly be increased—"will go from strength to strength."

Ther. Does not our Saviour, in describing the process, and fortelling the issue of the last decisive trial, assign a kingdom to the righteous? assign it in this precise view, as a proper remuneration of their own good works; saying in the most express terms, "Come, ye blessed of my Father, inherit the kingdom prepared for you from the foundation of the world: For I was an hungered, and ye gave me meat: for," &c. (Matt. xxv. 30.)

Asp. Be pleased to take notice of the expression. They are bidden to inherit; and what is freer than an inheritance? Observe also the reason alleged, and compare it with the rule of judicature: "He that believeth," saith the supreme judge, "shall be saved." This is the avowed, the invariable standard, by which he proceeds in administering everlasting judgment. Accordingly, he confers eternal life on the righteous, as persons entitled to this great felicity on the foot of his own gracious appointment.

For denotes, not the foundation, but the evidence of their right. "I acquit such a person," says the arbitrator in a judicial claim; "for the witnesses depose that the debt is paid." The deposition, which answers to these righteous acts, is the proof; payment of the debt, which corresponds with Christ's perfect obedience, is the cause* of the discharge. "For ye have given, ye have abounded in all instances of duty to me, and love to your brethren; and thereby have manifested yourselves true believers."

It may be farther observed, that our Lord says not ye have done it to your fellow-creatures, but to "these my brethren," (Matt. xxv. 40.) He commends not every random act of good nature or generosity, but such kinds of beneficence only as carry the Christian stamp—were exercised to a disciple, "in the name of a disciple." And those most evidently spring from faith; these undeniably attest its sincerity.

Ther. Are not these distinctions more subtle than solid?

Asp. To me they appear in no such light. If you think otherwise, let us appeal to those excellent persons themselves. The turn, the very remarkable turn of their sentiments will fully decide our question. Do they lay any stress upon their own religious duties and beneficent deeds? Far from relying on them, farther still from pleading them, they bestow not a single thought upon them. Having fixed their hopes on the Rock of Ages, they forget these transient bubbles,† Nay, they wonder, that their exalted Master should condescend to make any honourable mention of such imperfect services. O that we may be enabled, through the whole course of our lives, to follow the example of their piety! and, when we stand before the tremendous tribunal, to imitate their humility and wisdom! Their humility, in renouncing themselves, and disclaiming all desert of their own: their wisdom, in reposing their whole confidence on the merits and righteousness of their Redeemer.

Ther. Our Lord makes no mention of this doctrine in his sermon on the mount. Whereas if it had been so very material, he would at least have touched upon it in that comprehensive summary of true religion.

Asp. Our Lord says not a word concerning the sacrifice of his death. Neither is there a syllable relating to his intercession for transgressors. But are these articles of our faith to be deemed fictitious or super-

* The spring is come, says the countryman; for the orchard blooms, and the blackbird sings. The blooming of the trees, and the melody of the birds, were never supposed to create, only to characterise, the delightful season. They are not its cause, but the proof of its taking place.

† Bubbles they are, compared with the all-glorious obedience of Christ, or considered in reference to the grand affair of justification before God. But as bubbles, or watery vesicles inflated with air, are the means of exhibiting the beautiful colours of the rainbow; so these services, though poor and defective, bear testimony to the existence of that precious grace—faith.

* Acts x. 36, 37. Indeed it could hardly be otherwise, since Cornelius was settled at Cesarea, the residence of the lord-lieutenant, and seat of the civil, as Jerusalem was of the ecclesiastical government. In a place of such general resort, so very remarkable an event could not be unknown, especially as Philip the evangelist had fixed his abode in that city. See Acts viii. 40.

fluous, because they are not expressly inculcated in that admirable treatise of practical divinity?

However, upon a more attentive examination, perhaps, we shall find the point most strongly implied, though not distinctly specified: its necessity demonstrated, though its nature be not explained. The illustrious Teacher opened his mouth, and with a peculiar solemnity said, "Blessed are the poor in spirit," (Matth. v. 3.) But who are they? Not the persons who soothe themselves with the flattering conceit of the Laodicean church, "I am rich in obedience, and increased in spiritual goods," (Rev. iii. 17.) Those rather, who see their indigence, bewail their guilt, and hunger and thirst after the justifying merit of a Redeemer; who, from the very bottom of an humbled heart, confess, "Lord, I am no more able to conform all my conduct to thy most holy law, than I am capable of atoning for my innumerable sins. Christ must be my righteousness, as well as my propitiation, or else I am irrecoverably undone."

The inimitable preacher farther assures his hearers, that, "unless their righteousness exceed the righteousness of the Scribes and Pharisees, they shall in no wise enter into the kingdom of heaven," (Matth. v. 20.) How must Christians exceed the Pharisees? Not only in being sincere, in having respect unto all God's commandments; but also in possessing a complete righteousness, such as the divine holiness can with complacency accept, and in which the divine justice may with honour acquiesce. Nor can this be any thing less than the perfect obedience of the great Mediator. St. Paul's memorable testimony, concerning his attainments in the pharisaical, and his hopes in the Christian state, afford the very best comment upon this important declaration of our Lord, (Phil. iii. 7, 8, 9.)

Ther. The Oracle of heaven, you know, was once consulted upon that most momentous of all questions, how a person may ascertain his title to life and immortality? And what is the tenor of the sacred rescript? We are referred to the ten commandments; and, in the most explicit terms, with the most peremptory air, told, "this do, and thou shalt live." (Matth. xix. 17. Luke x. 28.)

Asp. That particular person, if you please, was referred to the ten commandments; not we, and mankind in general. Our Lord, in the preceding verses, had been informing his disciples, that they must receive the kingdom of God, or the grace of the gospel, and the blessings it proposes, as a little child. And this can hardly signify, in consequence of their own doings.

Ther. "That particular person referred to! Not we, and mankind in general!" I do not understand your meaning, Aspasio.

Asp. You will observe, then, that our Lord's reply was not an universal direction, but an answer, ad hominem, peculiarly adapted to the young gentleman's application, which, however it may be admired, was none of the wisest. Instead of asking, "How shall a poor guilty mortal, who is every day offending, obtain forgiveness from the righteous God?" instead of saying, "How shall I, who am not able to think a good thought, make sure my title to an eternal weight of glory?" our querist demands, "what good thing shall I do, that I may inherit eternal life?" The reply proceeds upon the inquirer's own principles, "If you expect salvation upon such legal terms, know, that your obedience must be nothing less than a perfect conformity to the divine law. Perform all its precepts, in their utmost extent, and with an unremitting perseverance, then"—But, alas! such perfection is too high for fallen creatures, they cannot attain unto it. Necessarily, therefore, must they drop all such pretensions, and have recourse to some other method of justification.

Ther. Why did that "wonderful counselor," if such was the purport of his answer, express himself so obscurely? Why did he not divert his promising scholar from this fruitless attempt, and put him in the right, the practicable way of obtaining salvation?

Asp. This he did with the finest address, and in the most skillful manner. Had our Lord affirmed, "You are worldly, you are covetous, your riches are your god;" such a charge would in all probability have been as confidently denied as it was plainly urged. Therefore he brings this specious hypocrite to a test* which could not be evaded, and which was sure to discover the truth, a test which laid open the palpable and enormous defects of his so much boasted obedience; which made it appear that, instead of keeping all the commandments, this vain self-justiciary had not obeyed the very first; but amidst all his towering imaginations of himself, had been, and at that very instant was, a sordid grovelling idolater, who preferred his transitory possessions on earth to an everlasting inheritance in the kingdom of heaven. Could any expedient be more suitable to the case, or better calculated to reduce him, intoxicated as he was with pride, to a sober humble mind; to beat him off from his false foundation, "the right-

* Matt. xix. 21. "If thou wilt be perfect, sell all that thou hast, and give to the poor." This direction seems to be much of the same nature with that other part of our Lord's reply: "If thou wilt enter into life, keep the commandments." Both were personal, both occasional, both adapted to particular circumstances. The latter is no more the stated evangelical way to heaven, than the former is indispensably obligatory on all Christians.

ousness which is of the law," and lead him to a reliance on the promised, the expected, the present Messiah?

It puts me in mind of my friend Sagacio's conduct, which seems to have some conformity with our Lord's procedure, and may possibly tend to illustrate its propriety. Visiting one of his unlearned neighbours, he found him in company with a certain talkative stranger, who was haranguing at an extravagant rate on the wonders of astronomy. Sagacio soon perceived that the chief furniture of this extraordinary adept lay in a little acquaintance with the technical terms, and somewhat more than a little share of assurance. How should he bring the self-plumed sciolist to a little modesty of sentiment, and decorum of conversation? He took leave to ask, "What the word astronomy might signify? The orator was struck dumb in a moment. He had never informed himself, it seems, that astronomy related to the order and regulation of the stars. This single question taught our minute philosopher more effectually than twenty lectures on the subject. It taught him his own ignorance, and that he had the very rudiments of his so much admired science still to learn.

Ther. What will you say to those famous passages in the epistle of St. James, "By works a man is justified,"—"Was not Abraham our father justified by works?" (Jam. ii. 21, 24.) Can any words be plainer in their meaning? or can any meaning be more directly opposite to the whole scope of your argumentation?

Asp. This I would say, Theron: the passages you quote, when detached from the context, may seem inconsistent with the declarations of another apostle; as a lump, when wrenched from its natural situation, appears with an air of disproportion. Whereas, reduce the dislocated part, and it will recover the symmetry of its shape, it will harmonize exactly with the animal system. Replace likewise these assertions, consider them in connexion with the whole paragraph, and they will be found, if not unisons, yet perfect concords with the strain of St. Paul's teaching.

What is the point which St. James undertakes to illustrate? To distinguish a genuine from an insincere faith. "If a man say, he hath faith," (Jam. ii. 14.) this is mentioned as the boast of some hypocritical professor. So that the apostle is evidently dealing with a pretender to the precious gift; and therefore replies, "Shew me thy faith," prove the reality of thy claim; prove it to me and to the church, to thy fellow-creatures and fellow-Christians. If unproductive of righteous and godly works, we must pronounce it spurious, worthless, dead.

Having detected the counterfeit, he proceeds to describe the sterling. The grand characteristic of which is, a frame of mind, and a course of action, corresponding with the doctrine believed. By this touchstone, the faith of our renowned progenitor was tried, and, being tried, was "found unto praise, and honour, and glory." "Was not Abraham our father justified by works?" Justified! How? As to acceptance with the Supreme Judge? No: this was effected long before the Patriarch offered up Isaac. But when he exercised that heroic act of self-denial, resignation and obedience, then his justification was evidenced to all generations. "His faith was made perfect," answered its proper end, and appeared to be of the true, the triumphant, the scriptural kind, since it overcame the world, overcame self, and regarded God as all in all.

Upon the whole, St. Paul speaks concerning the justification of our persons, St. James concerning the justification of our faith.* St. Paul describes the manner of being justified before the all-seeing God; St. James points out the proof† of a justified state, as it is visible to men. The former proceeds from the immaculate righteousness of Christ, placed to our account; the latter consists in the fruits of righteousness adorning our life. Rightly understood, therefore, these passages are not the least contradictory to the epistles of St. Paul, or to the scope of my argumentation. But are a seasonable caveat, and a proper preservative, against misunderstanding those, or perverting this.

Ther. I wish you would read that concise but judicious abridgment of true religion, comprised in the fifteenth psalm. The sacred penman, for his own, and for the information of all mankind, asks, "Lord, who shall dwell in thy tabernacle, or who shall rest upon thy holy hill?" To this most interesting inquiry, the following verses are a full and satisfactory answer; the whole of which turns upon the discharge of moral duties; "walking uprightly and working righteousness;" without a syllable, or a single hint, concerning the very superior

* That the expression used by St. James signifies this declarative justification is plain from 1 Tim. iii. 16, where the apostle, speaking of our Lord Jesus Christ, says δικαιωθη. He was justified in or by the Spirit; declared to be the true Son of God; manifested on earth, and recognised from heaven, as the undoubted Saviour of the world.

† A very little reflection, I should imagine, could convince every unprejudiced reader, that St. James cannot possibly be stating the method of justification before the infinitely righteous God; because he never so much as mentions the death of Christ, "who made his soul an offering for sin; to whom gave all the prophets witness, that whosoever believeth in him, shall receive remission of sins; and besides whom, there is no other name given under heaven, whereby we can be saved. Could an apostle so absolutely forget his Lord; and in a case where every other inspired writer acknowledges him; nay, acknowledges him to be ALL IN ALL!

Asp. I have often read, and I well remember, that beautiful, that instructive psalm. And I beg leave to observe, once for all, with relation to such passages of the Old Testament, that they suppose the persons whom they describe to be convinced of their natural corruption, to be humbled under a sense of their actual guilt, and to live in a conscientious observance of the expiatory sacrifices; all which had an invariable reference to Christ, and derived their whole virtue from his mediation.

Would any of the Jewish saints, think you, have dared to advance a plea for eternal blessedness, upon the foot of their own conformity to such moral directions; neglecting, at the same time, the sacrifices of the three great festivals, or a believing improvement of the daily oblation? By no means. They were, and they would acknowledge themselves deplorably defective; they would plead the promise of free grace, and fly to the blood which God himself had appointed to make an atonement for their souls. By such sentiments, and such a conduct, they reduced to practice the very essence of our doctrine; disavowing their own deeds, however virtuous or religious, and trusting in the strength of Israel, "the Lord our righteousness," who alone fulfilled all the precepts contained in this excellent formulary of duty; who was also the substance of every purifying and of every propitiatory rite.

Ther. Has not the sacred writer expressly said, at the close of the psalm, "Whoso doeth these things, shall never fall?"

Asp. He has; and this, I apprehend is his meaning. "Persons of such a temper, and such a practice, bear the marks of God's children, and are meet for his glory. Accordingly, they shall never fall either into total apostasy here, or final condemnation hereafter. They are now heirs, and in due time shall be possessors, of his eternal kingdom."

But you will take notice, that all these duties and qualifications only characterise, not constitute, the inheritor of heaven. You will likewise advert to another very remarkable circumstance in the description: "He setteth not by himself, but is lowly in his own eyes;"* or, as the more expressive original speaks, he is despicable and vile in his own sight; so far from aspiring to self-justification, that he even condemns and abhors himself, and falls down, as a most unworthy wretch, at the foot of infinitely free grace.

Ther. I cannot but think it is the current doctrine of scripture, and I am sure it is one of the first principles which the light of nature teaches,—That the most high God must necessarily love righteousness, and take pleasure in the righteous.

Asp. If the light of nature was to publish a gospel, I believe it would be formed upon your plan. It would bestow favour only on the innocent, the virtuous, and the holy. But the gospel of Christ runs in a very different strain: This brings pardon for the condemned, and blessings for the accursed: This is health to the sick, and recovery to the ruined. "The Lord hath anointed me," saith its divine Author, "to preach good tidings to the meek,"* who are humbled under a sense of their sinfulness. "He hath sent me to bind up the broken hearted," who are wounded with a conviction of their undone state;—"to proclaim liberty to the captives," the wretched captives of Satan; "and the opening of the prison to them that are bound," bound in the chains of ignorance, impotence, and misery.

As I am myself a most unworthy sinner, you must not be displeas'd if I espouse the cause of those unhappy creatures. Yet though a friend of sinners, I am no enemy to the righteous. I entirely agree with my Theron in allowing, that the most high God necessarily loves righteousness. Only I want to be inform'd, where this admirable and lovely quality is to be found? Not far more difficult instance of true religion. This is to copy the highest pattern of human excellence, who, notwithstanding his very superior attainments, accounted himself less than the least of all saints, nay, the very chiefest of sinners.

* Isa. lxi. 1. Upon this passage of Isaiah I would beg leave to observe that the word meek, seems not to answer or convey the prophet's idea. By glad tidings to the meek, we are inclin'd to think of persons endued with that placid and quiet spirit, which is in the sight of God of great price. This might discourage many people, who know themselves to be destitute of such a gracious habit. This might lead others to suspect, that some amiable disposition is previously necessary, in order to receive the benefits of redeeming grace. Which is a very mistaken, and will prove a most uncomfortable forbidding notion.

The original עניוּם signifies, in this place, the afflicted; not so much those who are beautified with meekness as those who are oppress'd with misery, spiritual misery especially; not excepting even those who are slaves to their own unruly passions. The Lord Jesus never binds, but makes people meek. Meekness is one of the fruits of his Spirit, one of the blessings which he bestows on the unworthy.

The whole paragraph is a description of extreme wretchedness. What can be more distressed than the man whose outward circumstances are impoverish'd and ruin'd; whose spirit is broken under the weight of his calamities, who is taken captive by the enemy, is thrown into a dungeon, and loaded with irons? This is the prophet's representation, and this is the picture of unconverted sinners; and to these, to these Christ Jesus is a ransom, a deliverer, a portion.

† Psal. xv. 4. בְּרוּעוֹתַי וְיִכְאֹבֵי לִי I cannot say that I admire the Bible translation of this clause: "In whose eyes the vile person is contemptible." Methinks, it does not savour of the tender and benign spirit of our religion, which teaches us to honour all men, to despise no one's person, but only to detest the wickedness of the wicked.

‡ Should the sense I have oppos'd have its weight, the sense I have preferred is incomparably weightier. If to despise the vile, is a religious act, to think meanly of ourselves, is a much more advanced, and a among the Gentiles: They have swerved from the dictates of natural conscience. Not among the Jews: They have broke the holy commandment delivered on mount Sinai. Not among Christians: For, if God should enter into judgment with us, we could not answer him one of a thousand. In the kingdom of Ethiopia, or in the country of the Moors, where will you find the native whites?

The Son of God found none among the race of Adam that were entitled to the character of righteous. He who gave himself a ransom for all, makes no application to such persons.* Why? Because he sullenly disesteemed personal goodness, or was unable to distinguish the excellency of inherent virtue? No; but because he knew, that, amiable as these qualifications are, they have no existence in the human heart, till the sinner, reconciled by his death, be sanctified also by his Spirit.

You remember, perhaps, that remarkable answer which the Spartans once returned to a threatening embassy from some of the neighbouring states? Nothing could be more concise; and, I think, nothing was ever more spirited and significant.

Ther. Those neighbours gave them to understand, by their ambassadors, "That, if they entered their territories, they would burn their towns, make the inhabitants prisoners, and spread destruction wherever they advanced." To which insolent menace, the brave Lacedemonians made no other reply, than—If. Is this the story to which you refer?

Asp. The very same. And when you are speaking of human righteousness, as the cause of our acceptance with the eternal God, I would borrow the language of a Spartan. If shall be my reply.—If, exclusive of the obedience, and independent on the Spirit of Christ, you can furnish yourself with this endowment; or if you can carry your righteousness to that perfection, which may equal the purity of the law, and comport with the majesty of the Law-giver; then trust in it—let it be the ground of your confidence, and seek no better foundation.

But whosoever shall in this manner seek for his recommendation to the favour of God, will act like the mistaken countryman in Horace, who, being unable to ford the river, took up a resolution to wait till the stream was all run by:

—————"At ille
Labitur, et labetur in omne volubilis ævum."†

Ther. Here, I fancy, we must take leave of your countryman. If he adheres to his resolution, we shall find him in the very same situation when breakfast is over; and may resume our subject, just where it is discontinued.

DIALOGUE VII.

Ther. To me, who have spent the greatest part of the winter in town, these scenes of the country are inexpressibly pleasing. Take who will the gilded saloon, and the silken settee, so long as I can shelter myself under the canopy of such a spreading beech, and use one of its coarse misshapen roots for my seat.

It is true we see no longer those splendid brocades, and elegant toupees, which distinguish the Park and the Mall: but we have full in our view a multitude of honest rustics, pursuing their cheerful labours in yonder meadow; some mowing the luxuriant herbage; some raising it into regular cocks; others loading their waggons with the hay, or clearing the ground with their rakes. The ground, cleared of its soft encumbrance, appears fresh and green, like another spring; while the exhalations of the tedded grass, floating in the air, give a rural perfume to the gale. And which, my Aspasio, which are the most valuable objects:—The little labourers of the hive, that enrich themselves, and regale their masters? or the gay flutterers of the garden, whose whole life is nothing but sport, and their highest character is, to be insignificantly pretty?

Asp. In this retirement we hear none of the wanton and corrupting airs of the opera; no, nor the majestic and ennobling melody of the oratorio.* But we have a band of music stationed in the grove, and a concert of native harmony warbling from the boughs. We are entertained with the music which charmed the human ear long before Jubal found out his instruments, (Gen. iv. 21,) and thousands of years before Handel composed his notes. The bulfinch, and a multitude of little tuneful throats, strike the key. The thrush below, and the skylark responsive from above, diversify and exalt the strain. The blackbird, somewhat like the solemn organ, with notes perfectly mellow and gracefully sonorous, crowns the choir; while the turtle's melancholy voice,

* Majestic and ennobling.—This, I think, is the true character, and expresses the real tendency of the oratorio. Nevertheless, it may not be improper to observe, that if we carry a trifling or irreligious spirit to the entertainment; if we attend to the musical airs, but disregard those sacred truths which enter into the composition; such a behaviour will be little better than a profanation of holy things. I fear it will be a species of taking God's adorable and glorious name in vain.

and the murmuring water's plaintive tone, deepen and complete the universal symphony.

This is the music which constituted the first song of thanksgiving, and formed the first vocal praise, that the all-gracious Creator received from his new made world. This is neither the parent of effeminacy, nor a pander for vice, but refines the affections, even while it amuses the imagination.

Ther. All the entertainments of nature are calculated to secure our innocence, as well as to gratify our fancy. And what is another very agreeable circumstance, those gratifications which afford the sublimest pleasure are exhibited gratis, while those which enervate the mind and debase the affections must be dearly purchased. Every one cannot gain admittance into the boxes or the pit, when some celebrated tragedy is brought upon the stage; but every one may behold the beautiful exhibitions of spring, and the finished productions of autumn. All may contemplate the machinery of nature, and the wonders of creation; thereby enjoying a far more exquisite amusement, without any of the guilt or any of the danger.

The inhabitants of yonder villages have never beheld the splendid procession which solemnizes the coronation of a monarch, nor the gaudy illuminations which distinguish the anniversary of his birth. But they see, almost every morning, a much nobler spectacle displayed in the east. They see the great Ruler of the day, or rather the envoy from day's eternal Sovereign, making his entry amidst the spaces of the sky. The heavens are strewed with colours, which outvie the pinks and carnations. The grass is decked with dew-drops, and every plant is strung, as it were, with pearls. All around, the darkness retires, and sweet refreshing gales arise. At length the magnificent luminary appears. And what is all the ostentatious pomp of kings, what is all the glitter of the most brilliant court, compared with his transcendent lustre? This spectacle we may behold without loss of time or prejudice to health. Nay, we cannot behold it without improving one and redeeming the other. So beneficial are even the pleasures which nature yields; so serviceable the very diversions to which she invites!

Asp. Thus gracious is the Almighty Maker in the constitution of material things. The substantial and the valuable are open to every one, are accessible by all. Only the tinsel and the trappings are the property of a few, the poor prerogative of wealth.

No less gracious is God in the disposal of spiritual favours. These are infinitely more excellent, and yet are equally free. We are invited to buy them, "without money and without price." (Isaiah lv. 1.) What do you give for the benefits of the rising sun, or the delights of this rural melody? The case is much the same with regard to the righteousness by which we are justified, and all the blessings of salvation.

Ther. This brings to our remembrance the countryman whom we left on the banks of the river. And for aught I can see, Theron and the rustic are pretty much upon a footing: the first as far from acceding to your notions, as the last is from gaining his point.

Asp. Have you any objection, Theron, to these gifts of nature, because they are neither purchased by your money nor produced by your own toil?

Ther. But who can ever expect to obtain pardon, and acceptance, and eternal salvation, at so cheap a rate! It seems to be all delusion, Aspasio.

Asp. So cheap! Then you would pay somewhat, I perceive, by way of price. But give me leave to ask, what price did you pay to God your Maker, for fashioning you in your mother's womb? what price have you paid to God your Preserver, for upholding you ever since you were born? or what price do you think of paying to God the supreme Proprietor, for the ground on which you tread, for the air in which you breathe, for the light by which you see? Just the same price must you advance to God your Saviour, for all his justifying merits.

Both these and those proceed from the same benefactor. They are all absolutely necessary, either for the welfare of the body, or the happiness of the soul. And they are all vouchsafed on the same free terms. For thus saith the prophet: "His going forth," in the dispensation of the gospel, "is prepared as the morning." (Christ, with all his precious privileges, "shall come unto us as the rain, as the latter and former rain unto the earth." (Hos. vi. 3.) However, if you are acquainted with a different or a better way, be so good as to communicate your knowledge.

Ther. Some, you may observe, depend upon their inoffensive behaviour. They live peaceably; they do no harm to their neighbours; they are guilty of no gross offence against God. And why should they not hope to obtain his favour? They apprehend the prophet Samuel establishes their hope, when he makes this solemn appeal: "Whose ass have I taken? whose ox have I taken? or whom have I defrauded?" (1 Sam. xii. 3.) Nay, they imagine, that our Lord himself has authorized their expectation, by giving this character of Nathaniel: "An Israelite indeed, in whom is no guile." (John i. 47.) A freedom from outward injustice and inward hypocrisy, is all the qualification, applauded in the one case, avowed in the other.

Asp. This negative goodness (if it deserves to be called goodness) was a plea for the empty Pharisee. But none, I presume, would choose to be associated with such a companion, either in character here, or in condition hereafter.

Samuel, in the place you mention, is vindicating himself only to his fellow-creatures, and only in the capacity of a magistrate. He speaks not of his justification before the Judge of quick and dead. This he well knew must be derived from another source, and must rest upon a firmer bottom.

The "Israelite without guile," was a person who not only abstained from every sin, but performed every duty; and without any wilful neglect of the one, or any allowed indulgence of the other. This instance, therefore, will by no means prove the sufficiency of your negative righteousness, which seems to have just the same degree of excellency as a fountain that never issues in water, or as a cloud that never descends in rain.

Ther. In this particular, Aspasio, your sentiments are mine. But I would add morality to civility; the virtuous to the inoffensive conversation. And if we not only cease to do evil, but learn to do well; if we use temperance, exercise charity, and keep all the commandments to the best of our power, is not this a sufficient foundation for our hope?

Asp. Yes, Theron; if, as you add morality to your civility, you add perfection to both. Otherwise you must be ranked, not among the claimants, but among the delinquents. You have no title to a reward, but stand in need of pardon.

It is a principle of justice, founded on the unalterable constitution of things, that the debtor be acquitted, when he has paid the debt. But supposing him, instead of gold to bring iron; instead of talents to return pence, instead of defraying, to increase the score daily; can he then reasonably expect, or legally claim a discharge?

With respect to such an obedience, we may pass our verdict in the figurative, but very expressive language of Isaiah: "The bed is shorter than that a man can stretch himself on it; and the covering narrower than that he can wrap himself in it." (Isa. xxviii. 20.) It can neither give rest to the alarmed conscience, nor afford protection to the guilty soul. If we have nothing better to plead, we shall not be able to lift up our heads in the last decisive judgment; "but must enter into the rock, and hide ourselves in the dust, for fear of the Lord, and for the glory of his majesty." (Isaiah ii. 10.)

Ther. We will go a step farther, and take in the exercise of devotion. We will read God's word, pray to his divine Majesty, and regularly attend on his public worship. Here now are social accomplishments and moral virtues, completed by the performance of religious duties.

Asp. Completed! I fear that expression will scarcely abide the test of a single query. Have you then performed all your duties, with that ardent love of God, and undivided view to his glory; with that adoring gratitude to the blessed Jesus, and that child-like dependence on his Spirit, which the nature of things requires, and the scriptures of truth enjoin? If not, your duties, be they moral or religious, or both, are far from being complete; nay, they are utterly defective, and for that reason absolutely insufficient for your justification. They are clipped or sophisticated coin; and will that be current in the world of glory?

Ther. Allowing them to be defective, they are at least sincere. And though not free from all alloy, yet if they bear the image and superscription of integrity, why should they be rejected as "reprobate silver?" (Jer. vi. 30.) Why should they not obtain the currency you mention?

Asp. "Alas!" says a judicious and admired writer, "the imperfections of our best services daily forfeit the blessings of time. How impossible then is it, that the sincerity of them, amidst so many frailties and defects, should purchase the glories of eternity!"

Ther. Be your writer ever so judicious, I can confront him with others, equally capable of judging, and diametrically opposite in opinion. What says that wise and brave man, the successor of Moses, and generalissimo of the armies of Israel? Joshua, I am sure, declares himself on my side: "Fear the Lord, and serve him in sincerity," is his last solemn charge to the people. (Joshua xxiv. 14.) Even the great apostle, on a review of his ministry, makes it matter of self-gratulation, that he "had his conversation in godly sincerity." (2 Cor. i. 12.)

Asp. You have quoted the charge delivered by the servant; be pleased to recollect the protestation made by the master: "Not for thy righteousness," says Moses, "or for the uprightness of thy heart, dost thou go to possess their land." (Deut. ix. 5.) Even an earthly Canaan was not given to the Israelites, as the reward of their own, either outward obedience or inward sincerity. Much less can we expect the kingdom of immortality on account of any uprightness of our intentions, or piety of our actions.

However, as the doctrine of sincerity is the favourite and the fashionable tenet, I will conform a little to the taste in vogue. You shall have no reason to complain, that I am either a cynic or a stoic.* Let it suffice us to be sincere; only let us refer ourselves to the apostle for a description of this darling qualification; "That ye may be sincere, being filled with the fruits of righteousness, which are by Jesus Christ, unto the praise and glory of God." (Phil. i. 10, 11.)

Here are three properties of acceptable sincerity.—It must bear fruits, "the fruits of righteousness;" and bear them abundantly, so that we may be filled with them. The branch and the fruits must derive,—that its vigour, these their flavour, and both of them their very being—from the all-supporting, all-supplying root Christ Jesus. Then, instead of terminating in self-justification, they must redound to the honour of God. It is not said, these shall justify you, but "these shall glorify your father which is in heaven."

This kind of sincerity can never be too highly esteemed, nor too zealously encouraged. But this, you will observe, flows from the grace of Christ, and issues in the glory of God; therefore does but very poorly attest, either the sufficiency of human ability to perform good works, or the sufficiency of human works to win the prize of our high calling.

Ther. Do you then exclude all works? Will you make a mere nothing, both of our moral endowments, and of your evangelical obedience?

Asp. They are excluded, both the one and the other, from all share in justifying us; yet not by me, but by an authority to which there can be no objection, and from which there lies no appeal. Speaking of salvation, thus saith the wisdom of God, "Not of works—"

Ther. Works of the ceremonial law, I suppose. These, we all acknowledge, are under the Christian dispensation, as a bond cancelled or an act repealed. But sure you will allow a better office, and a nobler character to that course of obedience which is regulated by the commands of Christ.

Asp. St. Paul will allow it no such office as that for which my Theron is pleading. "Ye are saved," says the apostle. "Ye are delivered from wrath, reconciled to God, and made heirs of his kingdom. How? "By grace, through faith," (Eph. ii. 8.) Grace, like a magnificent sovereign, from the riches of his own bounty, and without any respect to human worthiness, confers the glorious gift. Faith, like an indigent petitioner, with an empty hand, and without any pretence to personal desert, receives the heavenly blessing.

Both grace and faith stand in direct opposition to works, all works whatever—whether they be works of the law, or works of the gospel; exercises of the heart, or actions of the life; done in a state of nature, or done under the influences of grace; they are all and every of them, equally set aside in this great affair.

That the bill of exclusion is thus extensive, or rather quite unlimited, appears from the reason assigned: "Lest any man should boast," Eph. ii. 9; that all pretence of glorying may be cut off from fallen creatures; that the whole honour of obtaining salvation may be appropriated to him, "who hid not his face from shame and spitting."—And is he not worthy, unspeakably and infinitely worthy, to receive this unrivalled honour as a recompense for his unparalleled humiliation?

Ther. All our good works, we allow, are recommended by Christ. They prevail for our justification only through his merits. So that we still depend upon the Redeemer; and, by this means, pay him the highest honour.

Asp. Depend upon the Redeemer! No, my dear friend; you rely upon your own pious acts, and moral qualifications. They, they are your grand recommendation. The office consigned over to the divine Jesus, is nothing more than to be (as it were) master of the ceremonies. He may have the credit of introducing your fine accomplishments with a kind of graceful air. But is this an office suited to his incomparable dignity? Was it for this that he bowed the heavens and partook of our nature? Was it for this that he became subject to the law, and obedient unto death? Only for this, that he might usher in our own endowments with a plume and a scarf? Surely, Theron, you can never entertain such low thoughts of the incarnate God, and of Christ's mediatorial undertaking.

Ther. Neither can I entertain such low and vilifying thoughts of our own virtuous attainments. They distinguish persons of eminence and worth from the sordid wretch, and execrable villain, just as the noble faculty of reason distinguishes the man from the brute.

Asp. To deny good works the merit of justifying us, is very different from vilifying them. You are going to build a new house, Theron: Pray, do you intend to hew your timber from the flimsy tendrils of the vine?

Ther. No certainly.

Asp. Because you do not think its feeble shoots proper to form the beams, and support the roof, of your intended edifice; do you therefore affront them, depreciate them, or disallow their usefulness? By no means. They may beautify your walls with their ornamental spread, and enrich the desert with their delicious fruit. This is an office suitable to the nature of the plant; and from this it receives sufficient estimation, without pretending to the honours of the oak.

* The cynic had no complaisance, the stoic was quite inflexible.

Virtuous attainments, I own, are a considerable distinction in the present state of things; and, what is a higher encomium, (I shall now outshoot you in your own bow,) they will distinguish the true believer from the hypocritical professor, even at the great tribunal. But let them be content with their province, and not intrude upon the Saviour's prerogative. To effect justification be his, to discriminate the justified, theirs. Neither let them elate their possessors with a vain conceit of themselves, who, though they were meek as Moses, holy as Samuel, and wise as Daniel, must confide in nothing but the boundless mercies of the Lord, must plead nothing but the infinite merits of his Christ.

This is the theology both of the Psalmist and of St. Paul. They derive the blessedness promised in scripture, not from the shallow stream of human accomplishments, but from the inexhaustible ocean of divine grace: "Blessed is he whose unrighteousnesses are forgiven, and whose sins are covered." (Psalm xxxii. 1.)

Ther. Will Aspasio then, like many of our modern disputants, mutilate the holy word? industriously display what seems to strengthen his argument, but artfully secrete what tends to overthrow his scheme? How could you forget, or why should you suppress the following clause, "and in whose spirit there is no guile." Was you afraid it would demolish your opinion; and point out an upright honest mind as the cause of this blessedness?

Asp. Far was I, my dear Theron, from any such groundless apprehensions, and equally far from all such delusory designs. "Shall I talk deceitfully for God?" (Joh xiii. 7.) His sacred cause does not need it, and his exalted majesty would disdain it. No, I would condemn my tongue to eternal silence, rather than speak a syllable, either to conceal or disguise the truth.

Most readily we will admit the sentence you mention, "In whose spirit there is no guile." It is evident from the context, that these words are not descriptive of a person in whose heart and conversation there is no iniquity, but of a penitent sinner, whose mouth freely confesses the iniquity of them both, confesses without any reserve or the least attempt to palliate; which, instead of invalidating, corroborates my argument, since, according to your own allegation, the highest merit consists in a free acknowledgment of sin, or a total renunciation of all worthiness.

Ther. When, therefore, we join repentance to all our other works, lament our deficiencies, and implore forgiveness, surely this must be available with a merciful God, and cannot but entitle us to the happiness of heaven.

Asp. How strange does it sound, at least in my ears, for poor miserable guilty creatures, to talk of entitling themselves to the happiness of heaven by any deeds of their own! when it is owing wholly to God's rich forbearing mercy, that they are not transmitted to hell; owing wholly to God's free preventing grace that they are enabled to think a good thought.

But not to enlarge upon this consideration, I would ask, whether those penitential exercises were attended with a hearty detestation of sin, and an utter abhorrence of the sinner? (Ezek. xxxvi. 31.) If they were, you would then renounce yourself universally. You would never think of placing the least dependence on any thing of your own, nay, you would even loathe yourself. If they were not, then your very repentance falls short, and is to be repented of. It is as if "one came to the press-fat for to draw out fifty vessels, and there were but twenty." (Hag. ii. 16.) It is, if I may continue the prophet's metaphor, and the prophet's language, "the scant measure, which," in this your spiritual traffic, as well as in the affairs of secular commerce "is abominable." (Micah vi. 10.)

Or, should your repentance be without a failure and without a flaw, I must still say to my friend, as our Lord replied to the young ruler, "one thing thou lackest." In all these acts of humiliation, you have only taken shame to yourself, whereas a righteousness is wanting which may magnify the law and make it honourable. Should God, without insisting upon this, pardon and reward, he would not act according to his glorious character, nor be at once "a just God and a Saviour." (Isaiah xlv. 21.) And if you can find this righteousness, "either in the depth, or in the height above;" in any person or any object, save only in the imputed obedience of our Lord Jesus Christ, I retract whatever I have advanced.

Ther. A preacher and an author has lately assured us, that we are to be "accepted of God, and saved by our own obedience." If so, I need not scruple to repeat my assertion, that our own duties, especially when accompanied with repentance, are a real and proper foundation for life eternal.

Asp. Then the apostle was under a great mistake, when treating of Christ and his merits, he ventured to assert, "other foundation can no man lay, save that which is laid, even Jesus Christ." (I Cor. iii. 11.)

Ther. If you will not credit a modern preacher, I can produce a decision, made by one of the most ancient and authoritative synods: "Then hath God also to the Gentiles granted repentance unto life." (Acts xi. 18.) Repentance unto life is their unanimous voice, and my unexceptionable voucher.

Asp. I can easily guess the assembly to which you refer. But I can hardly grant it the venerable name of a synod. It consisted of some Judaizing converts, who adhered with a tenacious and bigoted zeal to the Mosaic rites. However, though I might scruple my Theron's appellation, I readily acquiesce in their determination.

It is not said, those Gentiles were penitent, and therefore God granted them life. This should have been the language of the assembly, in order to establish my friend's way of thinking. On the contrary, they were dead in sin. God, of his free goodness, granted them repentance, which is both the beginning and a substantial part of true life, even of that life which is founded on justification, is carried on by sanctification, and completed in glory.

I would farther observe, that repentance is a turning of the heart. And when it is repentance unto life, it is a turning of the heart from every other object, to the great and sole fountain of good, Christ Jesus. (Acts xix. 4.)—Were men slaves to sensuality? When they repent, they are turned to Christ, for refined and heavenly affections. Were they wont to confide in themselves and their own works? As soon as they truly repent, they turn to Christ for a better righteousness; and thereby, for everlasting acceptance with God. In short, they turn from every false stay, and fly only to Christ, depend only on Christ, looking not to their own tears of humiliation, not to their own duties or graces, but "looking for the mercy of our Lord Jesus Christ unto eternal life." (Jude 21.)

Ther. Suppose it should be wrong to expect such a vast reward, as the inconceivable glories of heaven, on account of our own duties, yet to set them wholly aside, to allow them no influence at all, not so much as the least co-operation in turning the scale; this is an access on the other hand. If the former is presumption, the latter is fanaticism.

Asp. I must confess, I do not thoroughly understand what you mean by fanaticism. Neither is it of much significance to enter upon the disquisition of an obnoxious term. I would only maintain, that on us unworthy sinners, whatever is bestowed by the righteous God, is bestowed, not as a debt* to our works, but as the donation of pure grace.

Ther. I think, it is sufficiently of grace, if we acknowledge good works to be wrought by the assistance of the divine Spirit; and then admitted, together with our Saviour's merits, as a recommendation to the divine favour.

Asp. The Pharisee could make his acknowledgments for the assistance of grace: "God, I thank thee," was his language. Yet this did not exempt him from the charge of pride, nor secure him from the sin of boasting. Besides, if good works are wrought by the operation of the divine Spirit, they draw a bill upon our gratitude, not upon the bank of heaven; they render us the obliged, not the deserving party. To think or teach otherwise, is errant popery,* however it may lurk under a veil of Protestantism.

You bring to my mind a memorable story. Two persons were travelling through the deserts of Arabia. The one utterly unarmed, the other wore a sword and carried a musket. As the place was exceedingly dangerous, the latter, solicitous for the safety of his companion, makes him a present of his firearms; which was no sooner done, than a lion espies them, and advances fiercely towards them. The foremost discharges his piece, and wounds their horrid aggressor. The wound neither killing nor disabling, only enrages the monster. He seizes the unfortunate marksman, and is upon the point to tear him limb from limb. His fellow-traveller flies to his succour; snatches up the carbine, which dropt from the other's hand, and fells the ravenous beast to the ground; then, drawing his sword, stabs him to the heart, and rescues his friend.

The lion thus slain, they take off the skin, which he who slew the lordly savage claims as his own. "No," says his grateful friend, "as you did part of the execution with my weapon, I insist upon half of the shaggy spoil. I expect satisfaction likewise for the loss of my piece, which you broke in the encounter." To obtain both, he commences a law-suit against that generous associate, who not only gave him the weapon, but saved the prosecutor from the very jaws of destruction.

Ther. If I had been judge, I should, without much hesitation, have determined such a cause. Instead of costs and damages for my plaintiff, I should have transmitted the wretch to the pillory.

Asp. I believe all the world would applaud your sentence. Only be pleased to remember, that the procedure on which you

* Bestowed as a debt, is, I must allow, somewhat like jargon. But perhaps jargon and inconsistency may not be without their propriety in this place, as they tend to show the genius of that doctrine which would connect such contradictory ideas.

* Good works, says a champion for the church of Rome, are "mercatura regni cœlestis,—the price we pay, or the commodity we barter, for the kingdom of heaven.

so justly animadvert, is the very picture of our excessive unreasonableness, if we presume to write ourselves creditors, and the divine Being debtor; because he has delivered us from the bondage of corruption, and enabled us to perform the duties of godliness.

Theron paused, as somewhat struck by the representation. After a short interval, Aspasio resumed the discourse.

Believe me, my dear friend, salvation, both in the root and all its branches, is entirely of the grace. Or else believe me, for the many cogent testimonies of scripture, which most circumstantially ascertain this great truth. Election is of grace: "Having predestinated us into the adoption of children," not on account of human worthiness, but, "according to the good pleasure of his will, (Eph. i. 5.) Equally gratuitous is our effectual vocation: "God hath called us with an holy calling, not according to our works, but according to his purpose and grace," (2 Tim. i. 9.) Faith, with all its precious fruits, is owing to the same cause: "By grace ye are saved through faith," (Eph. ii. 8.) From hence springs justification, together with all its attendant privileges: "Being justified freely by his grace."* This is the origin of regeneration, and every living principle of godliness: "Of his own will begat he us by the word of truth," (Jam i. 18.) The consummation of bliss flows from the same all-supplying source: "The gift of God is eternal life," (Rom. vi. 23.) It is, in every respect, a gift, not only without, but contrary to all desert of ours.—So that the foundation is laid in the riches of grace; the superstructure is reared by the hand of grace, and when the top-stone is brought forth, when our felicity is completed in the kingdom of heaven, the everlasting acclamation will be, "Grace, grace unto it!" (Zech. iv. 7.)

This is that glorious gospel, which human learning could never have discovered; which carnal reason cannot understand; which the wisdom of this world accounteth foolishness; which the envy of the devil, and the pride of man, will always oppose.

Ther. What say you to the opinion which Ouranium so strenuously maintains, that we are justified, not by the merits of Christ imputed to us, but by Christ himself formed in our hearts? And Ouranium is none of your proud or carnal people. His writings are remarkable for their strict piety, and his life is as exemplary as his principles.

* Rom. iii. 24. Δωρεταν τη αυτη χαριτι. One of these words might have served to convey the apostle's meaning. But he doubles his assertion, in order to give us the fullest conviction of the truth, and to impress us with a sense of its peculiar importance: "Freely by his grace."

Asp. You know, Theron, I have nothing to do with the persons of men, but with the truths of the gospel. Ouranium, though eminently devout, may be mistaken: And if this is his way of thinking, he quite misapprehends the doctrine of grace.

What is written in the oracles of scripture? "The Lord justifieth the ungodly," (Rom. iv. 5.) What is implied in the maxim of Ouranium? He justifieth the holy, the heavenly, the Christ-like.—"A man is justified by faith," (Rom. v. 1,) says the secretary of heaven. He is justified by works, says the pen of Ouranium: only let them be works of a superior order, such as are internal, spiritual, and wrought by the operation of Christ on the soul.—According to this notion, every one is justified by his own love, his own purity, his own zeal. Whereas, an unerring writer has most solemnly declared, "that by one man's obedience, many myriads of sinners, even all the redeemed world, shall be made righteous." (Rom. v. 19.)

This notion, I think, is legalism in its greatest subtlety, or highest refinement. It disannuls the merit of Christ, it vacates all imputation, and makes our salvation to consist wholly in the work of sanctification. Against which, if you remember, I entered my protest in one of our first conferences.* And now, having ventured to animadvert on the tenets of others, it may reasonably be expected, that I should give an account of my own faith.—"I am justified; my soul is accepted; not because Christ has put his laws in my mind, but shed his blood for my sins; not because I myself am enabled to walk in all godly conversation, but because the Lord Jesus has fulfilled all righteousness as my surety."

Ther. I am for neither of the extremes. The middle way is most eligible. This is what sound sense approves, and the sacred system authorizes, "Whoso believeth on me," says our Lord, "shall not perish, but shall have everlasting life," (John iii. 15.) "Blessed," adds the beloved disciple, "are they who do his commandments; that they may have a right to the tree of life; and may enter in, through the gates, into the city," (Rev. xxii. 14.)

Conformably to these texts of scripture, I would neither reject our Redeemer's merits nor repudiate good works. As this shady tree, and these cooling breezes, unite their properties, to render our situation agreeable; so those two causes, acting in conjunction, exalt us to the favour of God, and constitute us heirs of heaven. God himself has joined them. And I must urge my remonstrance in our Lord's own words,

* See Dialogue II. p. 160.

“What God hath joined together, let no man put asunder.”

Asp. Would you then make impotence itself a coadjutor with omnipotence? does this humble the sinner? does this exalt the Saviour? No: it is a most injurious infringement of his mediatorial dignity. Instead of excluding, it evidently introduces boasting. In consequence of such a scheme, it would be said by the inhabitants of the heavenly world, “Thanks to our blessed Redeemer for this happiness! yet not to him only, but to our own righteousness also.

Can you imagine, that the obedience of Christ is insufficient to accomplish our justification? Must its efficacy be reinforced by the accession of our works? And what are these works of ours, that they should enhance the value, the immense value of our Redeemer’s? Maimed, tarnished, worm-eaten things: eaten by the worms of self-seeking, self-adoring, self-love; tarnished by a thousand vanities, maimed by ten thousand negligences. To join these in commission with our divine Master’s righteousness, would be infinitely more disgraceful than to tack the beggar’s rag on the monarch’s robe; would be altogether as needless as to dream of augmenting the sea by the drops of our bucket.

Ther. Worm-eaten? What reason have you to represent our acts of obedience under this sordid and shameful image?

Asp. I thought you could hardly brook this disparaging expression. It is somewhat like petty treason against the dignity of man. My reasons I would postpone to some other opportunity, when if you please we will give the cause a full hearing.

At present, to make amends for this vile slander, I will suppose your works to have no defect; nay to have all the perfection which you yourself could wish. Will you glory on this account? You are too modest, I am sure, to avow or patronize such a practice; yet, if we say or think concerning any attainments of our own, “This is the ground on which I expect to escape condemnation, and inherit life;” we do, in the most offensive, though not in the most explicit manner, glory.*

Or, will you reckon, that these services, because faultless, are in any degree meritorious? Let us hear our Lord’s decision in the case: “When ye have done,” not only some, “but all those things which are commanded you.” And where is the man, or what is his name, who, in any nation, or in any age, has done all that is commanded?

Where shall I find him? Angels, tell me where:
Shall I see glories beaming from his brow?
Or trace his footsteps by the rising flowers?

Yet even in such a case, if all this were performed, what shall we say? We are no better than unprofitable servants; we have done nothing more than what was our indispensable duty to do, (Luke xvii. 10.) And have, on this footing, just the same claim to honours and rewards, as the negro slave, after the despatch of his daily business, has upon the estate or the wealth of an American planter.

Ther. But what say you to those passages of scripture which I have quoted? You have given them a hearing, but no answer. They, I do insist upon it, expressly assert, therefore incontestably prove, an union of Christ’s merit and our own works in the business of salvation.

Asp. It is written in the book of Revelation, “Blessed are they that do his commandments.” And wherefore? Because the obedience of faith is attended with a real blessedness on earth, and demonstrates our title to eternal blessedness in heaven. It is, though not the purchase, yet the evidence of our right to the tree of life.

All this I acknowledge. But where, I beseech you, does the scripture join the obedience of Christ and the obedience of man, as mutually conducive to the justification of a sinner? The scripture utterly disavows such a copartnership, and asserts what our homily expresses, “surely, there can be no work of any mortal man (he he ever so holy) that shall be coupled in merit with Christ’s most holy act.”* The scripture steadily declares, that, in this greatest of transactions, Christ is not an accessory, but the principal; nay that he is all. “Be it known unto you, men and brethren, that, through this” illustrious and exalted “person,† is preached unto you the forgiveness of sins; and by him all that believe are justified from all things.” Through this person, without any partner or coadjutor. By him; not by him and our works jointly, but by him solely; without the concurrence of any other action or any other agent. This was typified by the high-priest, when, on the solemn day of expiation, he went into the tabernacle alone, and made the figurative atonement without any associate, (Lev. xvi. 17.) From all things: by him they are wholly, as well as solely justified;

† “Omnis causa justitiæ et salutis est materia et objectum καυχησθαι. Unde apostolus: Nam si Abraham ex operibus justificatus est, καυχησθαι καυχησθαι;” i. e. Whatever is the cause of righteousness and salvation, is a real and proper foundation for glorying. Therefore the apostle acknowledges, “If Abraham were justified by works, he hath whereof to glory.” Rom. iv. 2.

§ Homily on Good Friday.

† Acts xiii. 38. Διαστειθε, the word man is not in the original. So that I think, “this illustrious and exalted person,” is the fullest and most exact translation.

freed from every charge, whether of omission or commission, and rendered, not in part only, but completely acceptable.

I hope, therefore, you will no longer consider the supremely excellent Jesus as a partial cause of our justification. What would be the consequence, if a person should fix one foot on the bank of yonder river, and rest another on the fluid stream?

Ther. He must unavoidably fall.

Asp. And what says our divine instructor to those double-minded Galatians, who could not believe themselves safe and complete in the merits of Christ alone, but must be seeking some other foundation, on which to repose a share at least of their confidence? He says, and they are awful words; they call for my Theron's most serious regard, "ye are fallen from grace." (Gal. v. 4.)

Let me entreat my friend to beware of this error. I think it is the prevailing error of our times; and so much the more dangerous, because it is somewhat specious. To pour contempt upon the blessed Jesus, with the libertines and deists, would be shocking to a mind that retains the least reverence for sacred things. Entirely to set aside the meritorious efficacy of his undertaking, with the Arians and the Socinians, would be afflictive to a conscience that is impressed with the least sense of sin. Whereas, to erect our merits on the foundation of Christ's; to be found in his, yet not renounce our own righteousness; this is both plausible to our reason, and pleasing to our vanity; this seems to honour the divine Saviour, even while it gratifies human pride. But this is an egregious falsehood, and cannot stand: This is an abominable idol, and must be laid in the dust. Christ, like the real mother of the child, will have the whole or none, (1 Kings iii. 26.) the whole—unshared, unrivalled, undiminished glory of our salvation.

Let me again entreat my dear Theron to beware of this error. It is the main pillar in the Roman heresy, and the master-policy of the Popish Machiavilians. Christ hath merited, that we may merit, is their grand maxim, and their grand delusion. Hence come their penances and their pilgrimages, hence the hypocritical mortifications of some, and the extravagant austerities of others; this enriches their shrines, and fills their cloisters. And to those seminaries of superstition let it be banished, let it be confined. There let them raise their scaffolding, and try to enlarge the dimensions of the sky; there let them kindle their flambeaux and attempt to increase the lustre of the sun. And when they have effected this easier task, then will we Protestants follow their example, and adopt their system; then will we also think of adding our own righteousness, by way of supplement to the dignity and efficacy of our Lord's.

Ther. If we are justified wholly by our Lord's righteousness; if nothing need be added, if nothing can be added to its all-comprehending fulness, what becomes of the generally-received opinion, that Christ obtained for us only a possibility of being saved, or put us into a capacity of acquiring salvation.

Asp. It will be discountenanced and overthrown, as extremely dishonourable to the Redeemer, and no less uncomfortable to the redeemed. When Christ procured our pardon, and recovered our title to life, it was all his own doing. "Of the people there was none with him," (Isa. lxiii. 6.) In both cases his work was perfect. Hear his own testimony: "I have finished the work which thou gavest me to do," (John xvii. 4.) Should you want an explication of these words, I refer you to the comment of an apostle: "He, that is, Jesus Christ, has obtained eternal redemption for us," (Heb. ix. 12.) This was his work, and it is fully executed. He has—he has obtained eternal redemption; and left nothing for his people, but to accept the glorious purchase, and live as becomes the redeemed of the Lord.

This truth is written, as with a sunbeam, in the pages of the gospel; and sounds, as with a voice of thunder, in the songs of heaven. "Salvation to our God," they cry, "that sitteth upon the throne, and to the Lamb," (Rev. vii. 10.) Those saints in glory ascribe the whole—the whole of their salvation they ascribe to the grace of God, and to the blood of the Lamb.

Ther. Have not many of our ablest divines represented faith, obedience, and repentance, as the terms of acceptance? Christ, according to this account, procured not the blessing itself, but only the grant of easier conditions on which it may be enjoyed.

Asp. What says that sublime Being who gives the ablest divines all their wisdom? "My righteous servant shall justify many," (Isa. liii. 11.) not pave the way, or adjust the preliminaries, but despatch the very business; "shall justify." The terms of acceptance, for fallen and rebellious man, were a full satisfaction to the Divine justice, and a complete conformity to the divine law. These, impracticable by us, were consigned over to Christ. By him they were thoroughly accomplished; and by this accomplishment of them, he purchased for us all blessings. Among others, he purchased the gift of faith, the grace of repentance, and ability to yield thankful, dutiful, evangelical obedience. These, therefore, are very improperly called, the terms which are really constituent parts of our salvation.

To sum up all in a word—the whole tenor of revelation shows, that there are but two methods whereby any of the human race can be justified: Either by a perfect obedience to the law, in their own persons; and then the reward is of debt: *—Or else, because the Surety of a better covenant has satisfied all demands in their stead; and then the reward is of grace. There is no trimming or reconciling expedient. You may choose either of the two; but no third is proposed or allowed.

Ther. Was there not a different method for the ancient people of God?

Asp. None, Theron. In the state of primitive innocency, a perfect and persevering observance of the divine command was the condition of life and immortality. When, by the first grand apostacy, this became impossible, a free pardon, and gracious acceptance, through the blessed Jesus, were substituted in its stead. Which economy, like a fountain of life, was opened, when God promised “the seed of the woman to bruise the serpent’s head,” (Gen. iii. 25.) It ran like a salutary rivulet through the antediluvian world;—continued its progress along the patriarchal age;—flowed, in broader streams, under the Mosaic dispensation;—is derived down to us, abundantly enlarged, by the coming of Christ, and the ministry of his apostles;—will be transmitted with an increasing spread to the latest posterity;—nor ever cease to amplify and extend its influence, till, as the fountain is become a river, the river is augmented into an ocean; and “the knowledge of the Lord” our righteousness “fill the earth, as the waters cover the abysses of the sea,” (Isa. xi. 9.)

There was, I confess, a diversity in the administration, but no difference in the nature, of the blessing. Jesus Christ, however variously manifested, was the “same yesterday,” is the same “to-day,” will be the same “for ever,” (Heb. xiii. 8.) as it is the very same sun which gleams at early dawn, which shines in the advancing day, and glows at height of noon.

My simile reminds us of the time, and leaves a most important doctrine upon our memories. Suppose we take the admonition, and begin to move homeward.

Ther. We need be in no hurry, Aspasio. My watch tells me, that we have half an hour good. Besides, I have something farther to allege, and from a very great authority, which seems directly contrary to your notion.

Asp. Just as you please, Theron. If you choose to stay, I am all compliance with your inclination; and, would truth permit, I should be all conformity to your opinion.

Ther. You know who it is that asks, “What doth the Lord require of thee?” And neither of us need be informed, what it is that the prophet replies; “Do justice, love mercy, and walk humbly with thy God,” (Mic. vi. 8.) But I want to know what you think of this passage.

Asp. I think it is absolutely inconsistent with your scheme. This passage inculcates humility. But your scheme is the very reverse of that amiable virtue. A self-justiciary walking humbly with God, is little better than a contradiction in terms.

The Lord has said, “Ye shall be saved by grace.”* Your system replies, “No, but by our own works.—It is declared in scripture, “that the gift of God is eternal life.” It is implied in my friend’s doctrine, that this happiness is the wages of our own deeds.—“My son shall have all the glory of a sinner’s salvation,” is the unalterable decree of the Most High. “We will have a share in the honour,” is the language of your opinion.—Look, how wide therefore is the east from the west! so remote is such a strain of teaching from the practice of walking humbly with our God.

Ther. But consider, good Aspasio; have I not the prophet’s authority for my opinion? Are not his words expressly on my side? does he not mention those duties of morality and piety as the appointed method of obtaining the divine favour.

Asp. He mentions, I apprehend, a solicitous inquiry; to which he gives a satisfactory answer; then subjoins a practical improvement of the whole. The inquiry is expressed in these words: “Wherewithal shall I come before the Lord, and bow myself before the high God? Shall I come before him with burnt-offerings, with calves of a year old? Will the Lord be pleased with thousands of rams; with ten thousands of rivers of oil? Shall I give my first-born for my transgression, the fruit of my body for the sin of my soul?” (Mic. vi. 7, 8.) To which it is replied, “He hath showed thee, O man, what is good,” for this important purpose; namely, the Messiah; pointed out by all thy sacrifices, and described in the preceding chapter. Atonement for sin, and peace with God, are to be made by a better hand, and in a better way, than thou proposest. He “whose outgoings have been from of old, from everlasting,” (Mic. v. 2.) He, who is the Son of the highest, and yet

* Rom. iv. 4. Pactional debt; founded on the promise of the covenant, not springing from any worth in the obedience.

* Eph. ii. 5. This text lays the axe to the very root of spiritual pride, and all self-glorying whatever. Therefore, the inspired writer, foreseeing the backwardness of mankind to receive it, yet knowing the absolute necessity of its reception, again asserts (ver. 8.) the very same truth in the very same words.

the seed of "her that travaileth;" (Mic. v. 3.) He has undertaken, and will fully execute, this great office.

"And what doth the Lord thy God require of thee?" What temper, what conduct, what expressions of gratitude, from his people, who are reconciled through the blood of Christ, and admitted to the blessings of the new covenant.* They are to testify their thankfulness, by the alacrity, uniformity, and constancy of their obedience; or by the conscientious discharge of every moral, social, and religious duty.

If this be a true interpretation of the text, instead of establishing, it overturns your cause.—But I have another objection to your method, perhaps more weighty than the foregoing.

Ther. Pray, let me hear it.—I am not so enamoured with my notions, but I can bear to have them censured; nor so attached to my scheme, but I can relinquish it for a better.

Asp. I would illustrate my meaning, by a common experiment in optics. When objects are viewed in a concave speculum, or in the hollow of a polished spoon, how do they appear?

Ther. Inverted.

Asp. Such is my friend's system of religion. He inverts the order of the gospel: He turns the beautiful building upside down, and lays that for the foundation which should only be part of the superstructure. Not so the apostle Paul. He, like a wise master-builder, places Christ as the foundation-stone, and rears his edifice of practical godliness on that all-supporting basis.—Examine his epistle to the Romans; which is unquestionably the completest model of doctrine, and the noblest body of divinity extant in the world.

He first discovers the depravity of our nature, and the misery of our condition: He then displays the method of our recovery by Christ, and the blessings freely vouchsafed in his gospel: After which he delineates the offices of morality, and enforces them by the most engaging motives; motives drawn from the free unbounded loving-kindness of God our Saviour, and from the rich invaluable benefits of his grace;†

* Thy God is the phrase. Which denotes an interest: implies an appropriation; and is the peculiar language of the covenant.—Thy God; not made so by thy humble walking, but by an act of his own grace, previous to any obedience of thine.—According to Theron's principles, the prophet should rather have said, "Walk humbly (not with thy God, but) that he may be thy God."

† This, I think, is the best platform for an evangelical catechism. The ruin of man, occasioned by sin—his recovery, effected by Christ—his gratitude, to be expressed by way of obedience.—This plan is carried into execution by the Palatinate divines: who have formed upon it, a summary of catechetical instruction, than which I have met with nothing of the kind more clear and satisfactory; more edifying and animating; more exactly consonant to the design spirit privilege he plants as the root; from which duty blooms as the flower; godliness grows as the fruit.

The same order is observed by St. Peter in his very concise, but very accurate map, of the way to heaven: "Elect, according to the foreknowledge of God the Father, through sanctification of the Spirit, unto obedience, and sprinkling of the blood of Christ," (1 Pet. i. 2.) First, the everlasting and electing love of the Father.—Then, the enlightening and renewing agency of the Spirit; who testifies of Christ, and applies his death to the soul, purifying the heart by faith; from whence, as from a fountain of living water, flows true sanctification, and every act of filial obedience, every species of real holiness; all which, being partly defective, and partly polluted, must be sprinkled with the blood of Jesus, and made acceptable by his dying oblation.

Ther. Is this the constant method in which the sacred writers represent the gospel salvation? Do they always observe this particular order, in arranging its doctrines and its duties? Or, is it not an insignificant circumstance which goes first, provided we take in both?

Asp. To observe this order, I am persuaded, is no insignificant circumstance. It is of great consequence both to our establishment, and to our growth in grace. Is it a matter of indifference to the archer whether he send the point or the feather of his arrow foremost? Can he, in either case hit the mark with equal ease, and equal certainty.

I believe, you will find, that the sacred writers, in all their evangelical discourses, invariably adhere to this order. Nay, it took place even under the legal dispensation. When the Lord God published his law from Mount Sinai; when he wrote it with his own finger, on tables of stone; how did he introduce the precepts? how enforce their observance? Let us attend to the preamble, which is the language of love, and the very spirit of the gospel: "I am the Lord thy God, who brought thee out of the land of Egypt, out of the house of bondage," (Exod. xx. 2.) "I have already delivered thee, with a mighty hand, from the most sordid and insupportable slavery. I have promised thee, for thy possession, the delightful country of Canaan, 'a godly heritage of the hosts of nations,' (Jer. iii. 19.) Nay, I myself am thy portion; a God in covenant with thee; engaged by an inviolable contract, and with the exertion of all of the gospel, or better calculated to make mankind both holy and happy. This piece the reader may see, together with a judicious, and very valuable exposition of it, in the Latin works of Henricus Altincius, vol. i. quarto. Which, I believe, may be bought for a trifle, yet are more precious than gold.

my attributes to do thee good. Therefore keep the statutes, the judgments, and ordinances, which I am now going to establish." Could there be a more winning inducement, or a more endearing obligation to obedience?

I might point out the same strain running through the exhortations of Moses and the songs of David, the sermons of the prophets and the writings of the apostles. But this I waive, not through an apprehension of its difficulty, only from a fear of prolixity. However, you will not think me tedious if I produce one more instance from the great master of our schools. "For we ourselves were sometime foolish, disobedient, deceived, serving divers lusts and pleasures, living in malice and envy, hateful, and hating one another," (Tit. iii. 3—8.) Here he sets before us a dismal but exact picture of our depraved and undone condition. Then he presents us with a delightful view of our redemption, both in its gracious cause and precious effects. "But after that the kindness and love of God our Saviour toward man appeared; not by works of righteousness which we have done, but according to his mercy he saved us, by the washing of regeneration, and renewing of the Holy Ghost; which he has shed on us abundantly through Jesus Christ our Saviour; that being justified by his grace, we should be made heirs according to the hope of eternal life." Having thus provided for our happiness, he then promotes our holiness. "This is a faithful saying, and these things I will that thou affirm constantly, that they who have believed in God might be careful to maintain good works: these things are good and profitable unto men."

I make no comment* upon the passage; because I hope you will commit it, as a noble depositum, to your memory. Your own diligent meditation, accompanied with humble prayer, will furnish out the best exposition. Only I would just remark, that the apostle, always consistent, always uniform, marshals his thoughts with his usual exactness. Good works are not disbanded, nor yet suffered to lead the van, but made to bring up the rear.* When he mentions these fruits of the Spirit, he mentions them, not slightly as matters of small moment, but earnestly, as affairs of great importance. It is his desire and his charge, that all believers should be careful; have their hearts upon the business; should use their best contrivance, and exert their utmost endeavours, not barely to practise, but to maintain; to be exemplary, distinguished, and pre-eminent in the exercise of every virtue, because this virtue, and those works, though not the ground of a reconciliation with God, are amiable in the eyes of all, and honourable to the Christian profession. They are also a necessary ingredient in personal happiness, and the apparent means of social usefulness.

Ther. This view of the evangelical plan is, I must confess, new to me; and particularly your ordonnance of the epistle to the Romans.

Asp. If this be new, perhaps what I am going to advance may be strange. We have been talking about acceptance with God, and debating whether our own good works are the cause of this inestimable blessing. What will you say, if we can perform no good work, till we are interested in Christ, and accepted by God?

Ther. Say!—that this is razing foundations.

Asp. It is razing the wrong, the foundation falsely so called, which will certainly deceive as many as make it their trust. And is it not prudent, when we are building for eternity, carefully to examine the ground? Is it not friendly to divert a man from the treacherous sand, and lead him to the unshaken rock? For this cause I said it once, and for this cause I say it again, that we can perform no good work till we are interested in Christ, and accepted of God.

* Perhaps the reader will give me leave, though Aspasio has declined the office, to add a short expository structure upon the most distinguished parts of this very important paragraph. I. We have the cause of our redemption; "not works of righteousness which we have done, but the kindness, the love, the mercy of God our Saviour." II. The effects; which are, 1st, Justification—being justified, having our sins forgiven, and Christ's righteousness imputed; all this, without any least deserving quality in us; solely by his grace, and most unmerited goodness. 2d, Sanctification—expressed by the "washing of regeneration, and renewing of the Holy Ghost;" whose influences purify the soul, as the washing of water cleanses the body; and introduces an improvement into all the faculties of the mind, somewhat like that annual renovaton and general smile of nature, which the return of spring diffuses over the face of the earth. III. The end and consummation of all; "that we should be made heirs of the heavenly kingdom; and live, now in the assured hope, hereafter in the full enjoyment of eternal life."

* The same order is observed by St. John, Rev. xiv. 13. "Blessed are the dead which die in the Lord; for they rest from their labours, and their works do follow them." Not go before, to open the everlasting doors, and give them admittance into the mansions of joy. But they follow them, when admitted: As the robe, which, on a king's coronation day, flows from his shoulders, cannot but accompany him, wheresoever he goes. It may be pertinent, on the mention of this illustration, just to hint, that as it is not the robe of state which makes the king; so neither is it the external practice of holiness which makes the Christian. An union with Christ, an interest in his merits, and the indwelling presence of his Spirit; these, and nothing short of these, constitute the true Christian. Yet, as the royal robe is an attendant on majesty, and distinguishes the monarch; so practical godliness is inseparable from faith, and adorns the believer.

† קִיְיָ צְוָה. This is somewhat like that emphatical expression, which so often occurs in the Old Testament, וְשָׁמְרוּ לְצִוְוֹתַי "Ye shall observe to do; ye shall be very diligent to fulfil; ye shall be very exact in performing."

Ther. Produce your reasons, Aspasio. And strong reasons they must be, which are forcible enough to support such an opinion.

Asp. The case seems to speak for itself. How can a man that is evil do works that are good? Would you expect to "gather grapes of thorns, or figs of thistles?" But let us hear what our unerring Teacher says; "As the branch cannot bear fruit of itself, except it abide in the vine; no more can ye, except ye abide in me." (John xv. 4.) Nothing can be more express and full to our purpose. But that which follows is far more awful and alarming to our consciences. "If a man abide not in me, he is cast forth as a branch and is withered; and men gather them, and cast them into the fire, and they are burned." (John xv. 6.) From which it appears, that the human heart is never actuated by good tempers, that the human life can never be productive of good works, until a man is ingrafted into Christ, no more than a branch can bear valuable fruit, while it continues in a state of separation from the tree.* It appears also, that persons alienated from Christ are, and all their performances too, like broken, withered, rotten boughs—fit for nothing, but to be committed to the flames, and consumed from the earth. Both they and their services, far from being meritorious, are, in the estimate of heaven, worthless and despicably mean.

Ther. What! are all the noble deeds, performed by the advocates for morality and lovers of virtue, worthless in themselves, and despicable before the supreme Being? Worthless and despicable (grating words!) only because they are not attended with the peculiarities of your faith? Can the want of this little circumstance change their nature, and turn their gold into dross?

Asp. My dear Theron, call not the circumstance little. It is sufficient, were your works more precious than gold, to debase them into tin, into lead, into dross.—When the poor shepherd brought you, yesterday morning, a present of some wood-strawberries, bringing them as an humble expression of his gratitude, they were kindly received. But if he had offered them as a price for your house, or as the purchase of your estate, how should you have regarded them in such a connexion? No words can express the disdain you would have conceived. When Barnabas presented a sum of money to the apostles, for the supply of their necessities and the relief of indigent believers, (Acts iv. 37,) it was welcome to them, and pleasing to God. But when Simon the sorcerer offered his gold to Peter and John; offering it, not from a principle of faith, but as an equivalent for the Holy Spirit; not in order to testify his thankfulness, but rather to play the huckster with heaven, it was rejected with the utmost indignation. (Acts viii. 20.)

I leave my friend to apply the preceding instances. Only let me beg of him to believe, that if my words are grating, they are extorted by the force of truth. If I am obliged to blame what he calls good works, it is, as a great critic blames eloquence, "with the tenderness of a lover." But my censure falls only on their faulty origin and unbecoming aim. Let them spring from the grace of Christ as their source, let them propose the glory of Christ as their end; then, instead of putting a slight upon them, or giving them a bill of divorce, I would court, caress, and wed them. Whereas, if neither this end be kept in the view, nor that principle operate in the heart, I must persist in questioning the genuineness of their character, nay, in denying the very possibility of their existence. There may be a mimicry of holy actions: but it is mimicry only; as empty as the combs made by those wasps, and no better than a flame that is painted.—I have an authority for this doctrine, which I think you will not offer to controvert.

Ther. What authority?

Asp. That of our church: who declares, in her 13th article; "Works done before the grace of Christ, and inspiration of his Spirit, are not pleasing to God; forasmuch as they spring not out of faith in Christ." Faith in Jesus Christ purifies the heart. Till this be done, we have neither disposition nor capacity for holy obedience. Nay, without faith in Christ, our persons are abominable,* our state is damnable, and how can any of our works be acceptable?

Such a one, you say, is honest in his dealings, temperate in his enjoyments, charitable to the poor. I allow it all. But unless these seeming virtues are referred to the glory of the supreme Jehovah, unless they flow from faith in the crucified Jesus, they may be acts of worldly policy, of selfish prudence, of Pharisaical pride—they are by no means a pleasing oblation to the

* This discovers an error which is often committed, in our attempts to instruct little children. What is more common than to tell them, "If they will be good, God Almighty will love and bless them."—Whereas, they should rather be informed, "that they are sinners; but that God Almighty has given his Son to die for sinners; and, if they pray to him, he will forgive their sins, will make them holy, make them happy, and bless them with all spiritual blessings in Christ."

* "To the defiled and unbelieving is nothing clean." Tit. i. 15. The apostle joins defiled and unbelieving, to intimate, that without a true belief nothing is clean. The understanding and the conscience are polluted. Both the man and his doings are impure.

Lord Almighty.* Nay, instead of being acts of duty, and objects of approbation, they stand condemned in the scripture, and are breaches of the commandment. They stand condemned in that scripture, which declares, "without faith it is impossible to please God." (Heb. xi. 6.) They are breaches of that commandment, which requires, "whether ye eat or drink, or whatsoever ye do, do all to the glory of God." (1 Cor. x. 32.)

Upon the whole, if we will submit to the determination of our established church, or acquiesce in the decision of our divine Master, we must acknowledge, that there is no such thing as a good work, till we are reconciled to God, and our persons accepted in his sight. Therefore, to represent our own works as the means of reconciliation and acceptance, is both chimerical and absurd. Chimerical, because it builds upon a phantom, and takes for a reality what has no existence: Absurd, because it inverts the natural order of things, and would make the effect antecedent to the cause.

Ther. Before we quit this agreeable retreat, let me ask my Aspasio, what he purposes by running down all those works which are the produce of inward religion, and essential to true holiness: whose excellency is displayed in the clearest, and whose necessity is urged in the strongest terms, throughout the whole Bible?

Asp. I am far from running down works which are the produce of inward religion, and therefore may be justly styled, "works of faith, and labours of love." But I would caution my Theron and myself to take care that our works be accompanied with those circumstances which alone can render them truly good. Let them arise from faith, and bear witness to love; or else we shall have "thistles instead of wheat, and cockle instead of barley." (Job xxxi. 40.)

I would also persuade my friend, and I would habituate myself, not to repose our confidence in any works whatsoever; lest they prove a bruised reed, that breaks under our weight—or a pointed spear, that pierces us to the heart. We shall never be like the church, "who comes up out of the wilderness, leaning upon her beloved," (Cant. viii. 5,) so long as we bolster up ourselves with a conceit of personal righteousness. This was the error, the fatal error of the Pharisees; this the film which blinded the eyes of their mind, and sealed them up under the darkness of final unbelief.

Besides, my dear Theron, if you expect to be saved by your own duties, you will be loath to see the worst of your condition. To see the worst of your condition, will be a dagger to your hopes, and as death to your soul. You will therefore be inclined to "daub with untempered mortar," (Ezek. xiii. 10.) Instead of acknowledging the deep depravity of your nature, and the numberless iniquities of your life, you will invent a thousand excuses to palliate your guilt; and by this means erect a wall of partition between your soul and the merits of your Redeemer; which will be a greater inconvenience, a more destructive evil, than to cut off all supply of provision from an army, or even to intercept the sunbeams from visiting the earth.

Ther. Now you talk of armies, I must observe, that though I have scarce been able to keep my ground, in this argumentative action, I cannot allow you the honour of a victory, as a retreat is very different from a rout.

Asp. I would also remark, that my friend has changed the intended plan of our operations; has almost continually acted upon the offensive; while my part has been only to sustain the shock. At our next encounter, you may expect to have the order of battle reversed. I shall direct my forces to begin the charge. Put yourself therefore in readiness for a brisk attack.

Ther. You act the fair enemy, Aspasio, I must confess, in thus giving the alarm, before you make the assault.

Asp. This hostility may appear fairer still, when I assure you, that my weapons aim not at the destruction of your comfort, or the demolition of any valuable interest. Only they would be "mighty through God, to pull down the strong holds" of unbelief, and bring every self-exalting, every rebellious thought, "captive unto Christ," (2 Cor. x. 4, 5,) captive, in a professed submission to his righteousness, as well as a dutiful subjection to his commands. And when such is the tendency of the campaign, it will be your greatest advantage to lose the victory; it will be better than a triumph to acknowledge yourself vanquished.

IALOGUE VIII.

Ther. Our last conversation ended with a challenge. To decline or delay the ac-

* Might not this observation be made, with great propriety, in our infirmity and other charitable sermons? Should not the audience be exhorted to abound in acts of benevolence, from a grateful regard to the infinitely-merciful and condescending Jesus? 2 Cor. viii. 5. Should they not, before all things, be directed to make sure their interest in the Redeemer's merits? that their persons may find favour, and their aims acceptance. Eph. i. 6. Should they not be admonished, that without this believing application to Christ, whatever they do, whatever they give, is worthless in the eye of their Maker, and will be fruitless to their own souls. Heb. xi. 6. In this respect our Saviour was eminently typified by the Jewish altar: on which every sacrifice, by whomsoever brought, was to be offered, and separate from which no sacrifice, however costly, could be accepted. Exod. xx. 24; Levit. xvi. 3, 4.

ceptance of it, would look like cowardice in me, and be a piece of injustice to you, Aspasio. Therefore I am now ready to give you all the satisfaction which a gentleman can demand. Only, as the weather continues hazy, I believe my study must be the place of action.

Asp. A challenge, Theron!

Ther. What, Sir! do you bogle? would you eat your words, and play the poltroon?

Asp. Perhaps I may have an inclination to follow the example of a brother hero, who ran away from the field of battle just as his comrades were advancing to charge the enemy; and when called to an account for his behaviour, right worthily alleged, that his retreat proceeded, not from any timidity of mind, no, but from a concern for the public good; "for," quoth he, "if I had been knocked on the head to-day, how should I have been able to fight for my country to-morrow?"

You smile, Theron, at my doughty warrior, and his sage maxim. But, since you have glanced at a certain modish custom, give me leave very seriously to assure you, that, if the affair was to be determined by sword and pistol, I should reckon such a conduct, a resolute refusal at least, not at all unmanly, but the truly wise and gallant behaviour. For surely it can never be an instance of wisdom, to hazard my life at the mere caprice of a turbulent ruffian, who is a stranger to all the principles of humanity and generosity, but a slave, an abandoned slave to his own ungovernable passions. Surely it can never be an act of real bravery to expose my person, because some foolhardy practitioner in the fencing-school is desperate enough to risk his! The gentleman, the true gentleman, should exert a becoming dignity of spirit, and scorn to set his welfare on a level with that of an inconsiderate and barbarous bully.*

Ther. But honour, my Aspasio, honour is at stake. Better to lose our life than forfeit our reputation. Better to be in a grave than to be the jest of every coffee-house; and perhaps pointed at, as we pass the streets, for mean-spirited, sneaking, or, as the gentlemen of the sword so elegantly speak, white-livered animals.

Asp. Forfeit our reputation! Amongst whom, I beseech you? A few rash and precipitate creatures, the pupils of La

* Aspasio calls the person who gives the challenge a bully. And such, notwithstanding all the maxims of fantastical and false honour, he will certainly be found, when tried at the bar of reason or justice. For, if the most impetuous, irrational, and brutal ferocity, is allowed to constitute a bully, he has an indisputable title to the character, who, on account of a mere punctilio, or some slight affront, would destroy a life that might be of service to society, might be a blessing to various relatives, and is intimately connected with a blissful or miserable immortality.

Maucha's knight; the sons of chimera* and cruelty; whose applause is infamy; and their detraction the highest praise they can bestow. From every judicious and worthy person, your conduct will be sure to gain approbation, and your character esteem. When Cæsar received a challenge from Antony, to engage him in single combat, he very calmly answered the bearer of the message: "If Antony is weary of life, tell him, there are other ways to death, besides the point of my sword." Who ever deemed this an instance of cowardice! All ages have admired it as the act of a discreet and gallant man; who was sensible of his own importance, and knew how to treat the petulant and revengeful humour of a discontented adversary with its deserved contempt.

Barely to lose our life, is the smallest of those evils which attend this mischievous practice. It is pregnant with a long, an almost endless train of disastrous consequences to parents, wives, children, friends, associates, and the community. It is an infallible expedient to be deprived of the favour of the infinite God, and to be excluded from the joys of his eternal kingdom. It is the sure way to become an object of abhorrence to the angels of light, and be made the laughing-stock of devils, in their dungeons of darkness.† Shame, everlasting shame, shall be the reward of such gallantry, "the promotion of such fools." (Prov. iii. 35.)

Ther. With regard to this point, I am entirely of your opinion, Aspasio, however I may differ in other particulars.

Asp. Say you so, Theron? Would you then tamely submit to affronts, insults, and injuries?

Ther. As to the trifling affronts of a peevish, incontinent tongue, I would treat them with a superior scorn. And when thus treated, they are sure to recoil, with the keenest edge, and severest weight, upon the impotent malice which offers them. The wretch should see, that I could pity his misery, and smile at his folly. But as

* This kind of gentry are styled, in a book, with which they have little or no acquaintance, but whose maxims will be had in reverence when their names are lost in oblivion, כְּנִישָׁי "the sons of bluster, or the children of noise." Jer. xlviii. 45.

† "Let me tell you with confidence," (says an excellent person, addressing himself to one of these unhappy desperadoes) that all duels, or single combats, are murderous; blanch them over (how you list) with names of honour and honest pretences, their use is sinful, and their nature devilish." See the select works of Bishop Hall, in one volume folio, page 526, where the reader will find a happy mixture of true oratory and sound divinity; a rich vein of fancy, and a sweet spirit of piety; contemplations upon the histories of scripture (which, I think, are our prelate's master-piece) almost as entertaining and instructive, as the subjects illustrated are important and wonderful. Notwithstanding a few still or antique phrases, I cannot but esteem the works of this author amongst the most valuable compositions extant in our language.

to injuries, the case is otherwise. Should any one assault my person, it is at his peril. He would find, and perhaps to his smart,

Et nos tela manu, ferrumque haud debile dextra Spargimus, et nostro sequitur de vulnere sanguis.
VIRG.

Here the fundamental and everlasting law of self-preservation calls upon us to play the man. And I am sure, Christianity does not require us to yield our throats to the knife, or open our breasts to the dagger.

But to retire to deliberate, to sit down and indite a formal challenge, seems to me altogether as savage and iniquitous, as to assault on the highway. He that demands my money on the road, or extorts it by an incendiary letter, or decoys me into the snare by a forged and counterfeit note, is stigmatized by a villain, is abhorred by every person of integrity, and when detected is rewarded with a halter. Why should we reckon the headstrong bravo less injurious, who makes his attempt upon my very life, and thirsts with insatiable fury for my blood?

Asp. He allows you a fair chance, it is said.

Ther. A chance! Of what? Either of falling a sacrifice to his rage, or of imbruing my hands in his blood. Which is neither more nor less than reducing me to a necessity of launching into damnation myself, or of transmitting a fellow-creature to eternal vengeance. And is this an extenuation? this a mitigating circumstance? It really proves the practice so inexcusably wicked, that nothing can be pleaded in its defence. The very argument used to justify the horrid deed, inflames its guilt, and aggravates its malignity.

It is a pity but the legislative authority would interpose for the suppression of such a flagrant wrong to society, and such a notorious violation of our benign religion. Why should not the laws declare it felony to make the first overture for a duel? Since it is always more heinous, and frequently more pernicious—is always murder in the intention, and frequently issues in double destruction; the one inflicted by the stab of violence, the other executed by the sword of justice.

Might it not, at least, be branded with some mark of public infamy, or subjected to a severe pecuniary mulct? so that a gentleman of spirit and temper might have it in his power to return the compliment of a challenging letter with some such answer:—

Sir,

“However meanly you may think of your life, I set too high a value upon mine, to expose it as a mark for undisciplined and outrageous passions. Neither have I so totally renounced all that is humane, benevolent, or amiable, as to draw my sword for your destruction, because you have first been overcome by precipitate and unreasonable resentment. You have given me an opportunity of acting the gentleman and the Christian. And this challenge I accept, as a note under your hand for five hundred pounds;* which will very soon be demanded according to law, by, Sir,

“Yours, &c.”

Asp. But to resume the proper subject, the nature of our engagement; which I now recollect, and which was explained when I ventured to give what you call the challenge. As it is not my Theron, but the obstacles of his faith, and the enemies of his felicity, that I am to encounter, perhaps I shall have courage to stand my ground; and, instead of violating all the obligations of equity, honour, and conscience, I shall certainly evidence my love to my friend, may possibly promote his truest good.

Ther. I do not see how this can be effected by your late attempt. You undertook to run down all works of righteousness as absolutely unable to find acceptance with God, and equally insufficient to recommend us to his favour. It is for the credit of these, which Aspasio has depreciated, that I enter the lists.

Asp. Pray, what is the standard to which these works of righteousness must be conformed, and by which their sufficiency may be determined?

Ther. The moral law, doubtless; I know no other standard of righteousness, nor any other way of becoming righteous.

Asp. You will, I hope, ere long be acquainted with another way. At present, I agree to your proposal. We will join issue on this footing, and try the merits of our cause before this tribunal. Yourself shall be the judge. I will only ask your opinion, and refer myself to your decision. You see, I am soon weary of the military style. I had obtruded myself on a part which I was not qualified to act, and now resume a more becoming character.

Ther. If you place me on the bench, I

* Might not the refuser of a challenge be dignified with some honorary distinction, resembling the civic crown amongst the ancient Romans; since, by his cool and temperate bravery, he saves one life from the sword, another from the halter? Was some honorary distinction, on the one hand, united to a pecuniary forfeiture on the other, I cannot but think they would prove an effectual method to check the progress of this destructive evil. It would break the teeth of malice with her own weapons, and turn the artillery of revenge upon herself. Those detestable passions would be loath to indulge themselves in this horrid manner, if it was made the sure way to ennoble and enrich the object of their rage.—N.B. The civic crown was an ornament assigned to those soldiers who had in battle rescued a fellow citizen from impending death.

shall allow of no such digressions, but shall keep you close to the subject.

Asp. Has your Lordship then considered the nature of the divine law, and the extent of its obligations?

Ther. It obliges all persons, and comprises the whole duty of man. It forbids all immorality, and enjoins every virtue.—Are not these your sentiments?

Asp. They are, when somewhat enlarged.—The empire of the law, as prohibitory of evil, extends both to the outward and inward man. It takes cognizance of the actions; it judges every word. All the operations and all the dispositions of the soul come under its sacred jurisdiction. It is indeed a discernor, not only of the working thoughts, but also of the dawning intentions; and arraigns them both at its awful bar. “It pierces even to the dividing asunder of the soul and spirit.” (Heb. v. 12.) Not the inmost recesses of the breast are too deep for its penetration, nor all the artifices of the deceitful heart too subtle for its detection. Other laws forbid the unclean act; this condemns the wanton eye, and irregular desire. Other laws punish the injurious deed; this passes sentence on the unguarded sallies of passion, and the most secret emotions of resentment. So eminently true is that remark of the Psalmist, “thy commandments are exceeding broad.” (Psalm cxix. 96.) Tell me now, Theron, has your obedience been commensurate to this extensive platform of duty?

Ther. If the law be so very extensive—

Asp. Nay, my friend, you cannot suspect, that I have stretched, to an undue extent, the obligations of the divine law, since this interpretation is established by an authority too great to be controverted, too clear to be misunderstood—even by the authority of Christ himself; whose sermon upon the mount is a professed exposition of the commandments, and maintains in the most explicit manner all that I have advanced. So that if our Lord’s exposition is just, I think it will be neither rash nor uncharitable to say, there is not a man upon earth but has broke them all.

Ther. Are we all idolaters then? all adulterers? all murderers? Shocking to imagine!

Asp. It is shocking, I confess. But how much more so, if such delinquents expect justification by their own deeds?

Ther. This is no proof of your assertion, my good friend.

Asp. To be fond of gold, to be enamoured with the world, to love any creature more than the ever-blessed Creator, are instances of idolatry, (Col. iii. 5; Phil. iii. 19,) not quite so gross, but altogether as real, as to set up idols in our temples, or pay acts of adoration to senseless images.

Have you always been free from this apostasy of the affections?

Our infallible Teacher has informed us, that unreasonable anger, contemptuous language, and malevolent wishes, (Matt. v. 22,) are each a species of murder, and not many removes from the assassin’s deadly stab. Have you been always meek, always benevolent, and never chargeable with this mental homicide?

We are farther assured, that the indulgence of inordinate desire is, in the impartial estimate of heaven, as the commission of the impure deed. (Matt. v. 28.) And evil concupiscence of every kind violates that sacred precept, “Thou shalt not covet.”* Has your will been invariably upright, and warped with no irregular inclination? are you wholly unpolluted with this adultery of the heart?

I wait not for a reply. I have often heard you plead guilty to all—yes, to all and every of these charges respectively.

Ther. Where, and when, Aspasio?

Asp. In the most sacred place, and on the most solemn occasion. And not you only, but a whole multitude of self-condemned criminals. Our church, you know, has ingrafted the decalogue into her public service; and taught all her members to answer, after the repetition of each commandment, “Lord, have mercy upon us, and incline our hearts to keep this law.” Is there any sense in these words? or have we any meaning when we utter them? If we have, surely they must imply an ac-

* Rom. vii. 7. Aspasio’s observation brings to my remembrance a remarkable incident; which, as it is quite pertinent to our purpose, the reader will allow me to relate. It passed between a friend of mine, and a certain ingenious stranger, into whose company he happened to fall. The gentleman was exclaiming, at an extravagant rate, the virtue of honesty; what a dignity it imparted to our nature! how it recommended us to the Supreme Being! he confirmed all by a celebrated line from Mr. Pope.

“An honest man’s the noblest work of God.”

Sir, replied my friend, however excellent the virtue of honesty may be, I fear, there are very few men in the world that really possess it. You surprise me, said the stranger. Ignorant as I am of your character, Sir, I fancy it would be no difficult matter to prove even you a dishonest man. I defy you. Will you give me leave, then, to ask you a question or two, and promise not to be offended? Ask your questions, and welcome. Have you never met with an opportunity of getting gain by some unfair means? The gentleman paused. I do not ask, whether you made use of, but whether you have met with such opportunity? I, for my part, have; and I believe every body else has. Very probably I may. How did you feel your mind affected, on such an occasion? Had you no secret desire, not the least inclination, to seize the advantage which offered? Tell me, without any evasion, and consistently with the character you admire. I must acknowledge I have not always been absolutely free from every irregular inclination, but—Hold, Sir, none of your salvos. You have confessed enough. If you had the desire, though you never proceeded to the action, this shows you was dishonest in heart. This is what the scripture calls concupiscence. It defiles the soul. It is a breach of that law, which “requireth truth in the inner parts;” and, unless you are pardoned through the blood of Christ, will be a just ground of your condemnation, “when God shall judge the secrets of men.”

knowledge of disobedience in every particular. The criminal arraigned at the bar never falls on his knees, and craves forgiveness, till he either confesses or is convicted. This then must be the purport of our response. "We are verily guilty concerning this thing. And we humbly implore, both pardoning mercy for the past, and strengthening grace for the future."

Give me leave to urge my question a little farther. Is there a single day in which you have not transgressed, some way or other, this sacred rule?

Ther. If the law of God will dispense with no deviation, not even the first starts of thought, or the least wanderings of desire—But surely to affirm this, is to extend the law beyond all reasonable bounds. The motions of evil desire, if indulged, are undoubtedly criminal. But are they also, when restrained, breaches of duty? I should rather imagine, that such temptations are thrown in our way for the trial of our obedience—which, had they no power over our affections, would not be trials; and when they are resolutely withstood, cannot be faults.

Asp. What was the judgment of our reformers? And what is the voice of our church? We may find both in the ninth article. "Although there is no condemnation for them that believe and are baptized, yet the apostle doth confess, that concupiscence and lust hath of itself the nature of sin." It is not said, concupiscence hath then only the nature of sin when it is ripened into action; but of itself, and before it breaks out into the commission of iniquity. Of itself it is contrary to the pure nature, and therefore cannot but be condemned by the perfect law of God.

Ther. This I can truly plead in my own behalf, that it has not been customary with me to offend; at least not presumptuously, or of deliberate wickedness.

Asp. My dear Theron, do not offer to palliate your guilt. Such an opiate may stupefy, but will not cure; or rather, like opiates ill prepared, it will intoxicate the mind, and counteract the operation of every healing medicine. Besides, it is not only pernicious, but false and unreasonable. You know the use of that solar microscope, and are able to inform me of its effects.

Ther. I ought to be pretty well acquainted with these experiments; since it has long been my favourite diversion to employ a few spare hours in such agreeable speculations.

Asp. You have seen the body of an insect, accommodated to the surprising instrument. When, in this situation, the animal was pricked by a very fine needle, your eye, your naked eye, just perceived the puncture, and discovered, perhaps a speck of moisture oozing from the orifice. But in what manner were they represented by the magnifying instrument?

Ther. The puncture was widened into a frightful gash; the speck of moisture swelled into a copious stream, and flowed like a torrent from the gaping wound. An ox, under the sacrificing knife, scarce looks more bulky, or bleeds more largely.

Asp. Do you not apprehend my design?—If we, short-sighted mortals, and almost blinded with self-love; if we cannot but be sensible of our faults, how flagrant must they appear, in what enormous magnitudes, and with what aggravating circumstances, to an eye perfectly pure and infinitely penetrating!

Instead of attempting to extenuate our offences, let us make some such improving reflections: "If this holy law, which prohibits the minutest failure, from the indictment; if this all-discerning God, who sifts our conduct even to the smallest defect, be the judge; if our personal goodness, which abounds with imperfections, be our plea; what can we expect at that decisive hour, when the Lord shall "lay judgment to the line, and righteousness to the plummet?" (Isa. xviii. 17.) Surely, this consideration should incline us to adopt the wise and ardent wish of the apostle, "That we may" now, in this our day, "win Christ, and" at the last tremendous audit, be "found in him; not having our own righteousness, which is of the law," for the foundation of our hopes, "but the righteousness which is of God, by faith in Jesus Christ." (Phil. iii. 8, 9.)

Consider the law in its nobler capacity, as enjoining whatever is excellent. Can you hope, Thereon, to be justified by it, if you fall short of its demands, not barely in a few instances, but in every action of your life, and every temper of your heart?

Ther. Such a hope, cherished amidst such circumstances, would be fallacious and absurd. But I trust, I am not so very faulty, or rather so entirely abandoned, as your interrogatory supposes.

Asp. Have you duly weighed the perfection and spirituality of the divine law? It is a transcript of the unspotted purity and absolute rectitude of the divine nature. It requires an unreserved obedience to all God's commands, and a most unfeigned submission to all his dispensations; without regretting the former as a grievous yoke, or repining at the latter as rigorous treatment. It calls, not only for external duty, but also for the most upright imaginations, and devout affections. Nay, it insists upon the exercise of every virtue, and that in the highest degree: love to God, without the least lukewarmness, and love to all our neighbours, without any unkindness; a sanctity of desire, that knows no stain, and a humility of mind that is free from all elatement. In a word, it requires us to be perfect, "even as our Father which is in heaven is perfect."*

Do any of your actions come up to this exalted standard? Are any of your graces thus refined?

Ther. Am I then absolutely an insolvent before the great Lord of the universe? Have I no lamb in my fold without a blemish? nothing in my life, nothing in my heart, but what is defective and defiled?

Asp. Indeed, my friend, this is not your condition alone, but the condition of the most irreprouchable person on earth. There is none perfect, in any character, or in any work, no not one. None that obeys the divine law, uniformly, invariably, and completely.

Cast your eye upon the names which are subjoined to those beautiful prints. How elegant is the engraving! How accurate are the letters! The strokes most delicately fine! Their shape most exactly true! Let me ask you to transcribe them with your pen; and make the copy equal to the original. Preserve all the noble boldness of the Roman stamp, and all the graceful softness of the Italian touch. What! could you not execute this task, even in your present unimpaired health, and with the exertion of all your skill? How shamefully then must you fall short, if your eyes were dim with age; if your hands shook with a paralytic disorder, and your understanding was oppressed with a lethargic dulness! Such is really the case with regard to all the children of men. Our nature is depraved; our moral abilities are enervated; and our intellectual faculties clouded. And can we, in such a state of impotence, transcribe that sacred system, which is the very image of God—transcribe it into our tempers, and render it legible in our lives, without diminishing one jot or tittle of its perfect purity.

Ther. Though I fall short, there are Christians of a much higher class; Christians, I do not doubt, who have these laws written on their hearts, all whose tempers are cast into this heavenly mould.

* Mat. v. 48. Our Lord, having explained several commandments of the law, sums up the whole, and gives us the spirit of them all, in this most refined precept; "Be ye perfect, even," &c. If the reader pleases to take this passage into consideration, he will have a more satisfactory answer to Theron's objection, concerning the first motions of evil desire: more satisfactory, I mean, than was suggested in the preceding pages. There the reply turned upon human testimony; here it rests upon divine authority.

I hope, the candid reader will, on other occasions, remember this observation. And if, at any time, the strongest reasons are not assigned, let him suppose it probable, that they are omitted in one place, only to be introduced and urged, perhaps with greater advantage, in another.

Nor am I myself without hopes of making more considerable advances in holiness.

Asp. May your hopes be quickened into vigorous endeavours, and your endeavours be crowned with abundant success! What you suppose concerning very eminent Christians, I cannot wholly admit, neither do I wholly deny. They may have all their tempers cast into the heavenly mould; but then they are conformed to the sacred pattern only in part. There is a resemblance, yet not such as that clear and steady mirror (pointing to a fine glass over the chimney-piece) exhibits, but such as some turbulent and muddy stream reflects. If the breasts of these eminent Christians were formed on the model of Drusus* house, I verily think you would have a lower opinion of their acquisitions and virtue.

David, whom God himself dignifies with the most exalted of all characters, and "styles a man after his own heart;" who to a most inflamed love added a most accurate knowledge of the divine testimonies, was deeply sensible of the truth I would inculcate. After an attentive contemplation of the sublimity, the extent, the sanctity of those heavenly institutes, he breaks out into this humbling exclamation, "Who can tell how oft he offendeth?" (Psalm xix. 12.) "Was the most vigilant conduct, or the most purified soul, examined by this consummate rule, innumerable would be found the slips of the former, and glaring would the failures of the latter appear."

Ther. I cannot see the reason for degrading human nature to such an extravagant degree, and ranking human works among the refuse of things.

Asp. Do you ask the reason of this remonstrance? It is to preserve us from the mischievous error of the Pharisee, who, measuring himself, not by the true, sublime, and extensive sense of the law, but by a false, debased, and mutilated interpretation, became haughty in his own conceit, and abominable in the sight of God. Hear him trumpeting his own praise: "I am no extortioner, no adulterer." (Luke xviii. 11.) This the poor vain creature fancied was a sufficient obedience paid to the second table. See him still strutting in his own imaginary plumes; † "I fast twice in the

* When Drusus, a noble Roman, was deliberating upon a model for his new house, the architect offered to build it in such a taste that no eye should overlook any of his rooms. "You quite mistake my inclination," said Drusus, "I am for the reverse of your plan. I would have my house so contrived that every passenger may see whatever is transacted within."

† This seems to give the genuine signification of το ὑψιλον ἐν ἀνθρώποις. Luke xvi. 15, not "that which is highly esteemed," ἐπιτιμοῦ ἐνθρώπων. The proposition, taken in this sense, is neither necessary nor universally true. The meekness of Moses, the wreck; I give tithes of all that I possess." (Luke xviii. 12.) This he foolishly dreamed was a due compliance with the demands of the first table. The young ruler seems to have been under the same delusion, when he had the assurance to declare, "all these things," which are prescribed by the divine law, "have I kept from my youth up." (Matt. xix. 20.)

A more pestilent opinion it is scarce possible for the mind of man to entertain, and nothing can appear more egregiously mistaken, if we consider the vast comprehensive scope of the sacred precepts, and are convinced that they require a most exact conformity, in every particular and every punctilio.

Ther. Is there nothing valuable, then, in regularity of conduct and integrity of heart? nothing valuable in our acts of charity, and habits of virtue? nothing whatsoever that may recommend us to our Maker?

Asp. From our fellow-creatures they stand entitled to respect, imitation, and gratitude; but before infinite perfection, they must drop their claim, and lie prostrate in the dust, imploring forgiveness, not challenging a reward. We all discern a beauty and a twinkling lustre in the stars, when viewed under the shades of night. But when the magnificent source of day arises, their beauty vanishes, their lustre is darkness. Such are human accomplishments when compared with the perfect law, or beheld by the piercing eye of the supremely glorious God.

Ther. Methinks this notion confounds the difference of good and evil and by rendering all our actions blamable would render them all alike. This is levelling with a witness!

Asp. It only shows, that there are blemishes in all; whereas, some are flaw and blemish all over. Is there no difference between the leopard's spots, and the raven's foot? If I maintain that neither of those animals are perfectly white, does this imply that both are equally black?

All we perform, however specious it may seem, is very far short of our elevated rule; therefore cannot procure the divine favour, or entitle us to the kingdom of heaven. Nay, if God should enter into judgment with us, on the foot of our own performances, he would discover such defects, even in the choicest instances of our obedience, as must render them matter of condemnation,* not meritorious of applause.

fortitude of Joshua, the wisdom of Solomon, were highly esteemed among those very men to whom our Lord addressed his discourse; yet none can suppose, that the endowments of those illustrious personages were "an abomination in the sight of God."

* To this assertion St. Cyril bears a very express testimony: "Even those of our actions which seem to be performed in a right manner, could not escape

Be pleased to observe this penknife.—What can be more exquisitely keen than the edge, or more nicely polished than the blade; but how do they appear when beheld through one of those microscopes?

Ther. The edge less sharp than the woodman's axe, or rather more blunt than his iron wedge. The polish resembles a mass of coarse metal, rudely hammered on the anvil.

Asp. How very delicate is the cambric, which forms your ruffles, and gives such an ornamental air to your whole dress! Nothing can be finer than the threads, or more exact than the texture. But what is their appearance in a microscopic view?

Ther. You would take the fine threads for hempen cords; and would almost be positive, that they had been watted together by the clumsy hands of the hurdle-maker, rather than curiously wove in the artist's loom.

Asp. That lovely piece of enamel, which makes a part of your lady's pensile equipage, quite charms the spectator with the justness of its figure, and the radiancy of its colours. But—

Ther. Under the scrutiny of this searching instrument it loses all its elegance; and instead of winning our admiration, provokes our contempt. It looks like a heap of mortar plastered on by the mason's trowel.

Asp. You see then, Theron, what gross indelicacies, what bungling inequalities, this supplementary aid to our sight discovers, even in the most finished works of human art. So, and abundantly more, does the immaculate purity of God discern imperfections in our most upright deeds and most guarded hours.

I said immaculate, and I ought to have said more; for God is not only unerringly wise to detect, but infinitely pure to abhor, all contamination. Angels, and the spirits of just men made perfect, are endowed with immaculate, but the Lord is possessed of infinite purity. Have you considered this attribute of the Godhead, Theron?

Ther. I have; and not without amazement at the charming, the awful descriptions of it, which occur in the sacred writings. God is not only holy, but, as the lawgiver of the Jews very sublimely expresses himself, "glorious in holiness," Exod. xv. 11. The sacred penmen, treating of this illustrious perfection, seem to labour the important point. They indulge the loftiest flights of imagination; they employ the boldest figures of speech; and add the most glowing colours of eloquence; not without frequent acknowledgments, that all the force of language is abundantly too feeble for the unutterable subject.

cen-ure and blame, if God should examine and bring them to the test."

One of the prophets, addressing the King eternal, immortal, invisible, breaks out into this ecstatic exclamation: "O Lord, my God, my Holy One, thou art of purer eyes than" (to allow, shall I say? This is an ascription of praise unspeakably too mean for thy surpassing excellency: Thou art of purer eyes than) "to look upon evil, and canst not behold iniquity," (Hab. i. 13.) Another, wrapt into a prophetic vision, sees the seraphim veiling their faces in token of profound humiliation; and hears those sons of ardour and love, crying in loud responsive strains, "Holy, holy, holy is the Lord God of Sabaoth!"* Nay, so transcendently holy, says another devout worshipper, that all created glory is totally eclipsed in his presence: "He looketh to the moon, and it shineth not; yea, the stars are not pure in his sight, (Job. xxv. 5.)

* Isa vi. 3. The poets and writers of a bold imagination are particularly fond of machinery; of introducing celestial beings, in order to give some peculiar dignity to their plan, or some additional strength to their sentiments. With what inimitable propriety and surprising emphasis is this species of fine writing used in scripture, especially in the passage quoted above.

Let us only consider the personages. These are the seraphim; pure and active spirits, likened by the psalmist to flames of fire; styled by the apostle dominions and principalities of heaven, who excel in strength and wisdom, in every high and bright accomplishment. Their attitude. They wait around the King immortal, seated on his exalted throne. They stand; are in a posture of service; with their wings outstretched, ready to fly at the first signal. They stand not with their eyes reverently cast down, but with their faces covered, to denote the deepest self-abasement, as creatures that are conscious and ashamed of their own meanness, or as overcome with the insupportable glories which beam from uncreated majesty. Their action. They celebrate, not in cold conversation, but with rapturous songs, not with single voices but in a grand choir, (see Psalm lxxxvii. 5, 6.) the amiable yet tremendous sanctity of the Lord Almighty. Their manner of expression. Though filled and penetrated with the prodigious theme, they attempt not to describe it. Impracticable that, even by the tongue of angels! They express themselves, therefore, in the language of profound admiration, in repeated, in reiterated exclamations to the wonderful attribute: "Holy! holy! holy!" The effects of this august appearance. The posts of the door shake at the voice,—the ponderous and magnificent pillars of brass (see 2 Chron. iii. 17.) tremble like a leaf. The spacious and beautiful house is filled with tokens of the divine indignation: is involved in clouds of smoke; and joins with the trembling columns, and adoring seraphs, to tell the thoughtless world, "what a fearful thing it is to fall into the hands of the living God!" The prophet himself is struck with astonishment,—is overwhelmed with awe,—and cries out, "as a woman in her pangs."—Can any thing be more enlivened, impressive, and alarming?

If I shall not trespass upon the reader's patience, I would beg leave to add a remark concerning the word Sabaoth, which, though a Hebrew expression, is retained in that excellent hymn entitled Te Deum; and which some people, I am inclined to believe, inadvertently confound with Sabbath. The latter signifies the rest of the seventh day, and in this connexion, yields a sense not very apposite, and comparatively mean. Whereas, the former denotes armies or hosts, and furnishes us with an image truly grand and majestic, worthy to be admitted into the songs of seraphs. It glorifies God, as the great, universal, uncontrollable Sovereign, who exercises a supreme dominion over all the orders of being, from the loftiest archangel that shines in heaven, to the lowest reptile that crawls in dust; who says to a legion of cherubs, Go; and they go;—to a swarm of insects, Come; and they come;—to any, to every creature, Do this; and they do it. See Matth. viii. 9.

And "his very angels," those refined and exalted intelligences, "he chargeth with folly." (Job. iv. 18.)

Asp. Very majestic descriptions! And pray let us observe the impressions which such beamings of the divine effulgence made upon the saints of old. Moses, drawing near the cloudy pavilion, the presence-chamber of the Holy One of Israel, says, with emotions of uncommon dread, "I exceedingly fear and quake!" (Heb. xii. 21.) When Job is favoured with some peculiar manifestations of the omnipotent God, see his posture! hear his words! "I abhor myself, and repent in dust and ashes," (Job xli. 6.) How strong is the language! how deep the abasement! When Isaiah saw the incomprehensible Jehovah sitting upon his throne, and the princes of heaven adoring at his footstool, seized with a pang of reverential fear, he cried out, "Woe is me! I am undone! for I am a man of unclean lips!" (Isa. vi. 5.) When Ezekiel beheld an emblematical representation of him who dwelleth in light inaccessible; when the Ancient of Days, veiled under a human shape, appeared to Daniel; though one was a devout priest, and each was an eminent prophet, yet, overwhelmed with a mixture of veneration and terror, they both "fell down at his feet as dead," (Ezek. i. 28; Dan. x. 8, 9;) and this, not before a full display, but only before a glimpse of the Godhead, which, though partial and transient, was too dazzlingly bright for an eye of flesh to bear.

O my friend! my Theron! what figure must our mean performances, our low attainments, make before this immensely glorious God? Let us examine the behaviour and spirit of Job a little more particularly. He is one of your favourite examples, and indeed very deservedly, for in piety he had no superior and no equal—"there was none like him in the earth;" yet, when he has to do with the Maker of all things, and the Judge of all men, he pours out his abashed soul in these very remarkable professions: "If I justify myself, my own mouth shall condemn me; if I say I am perfect, it shall also prove me perverse."—(Job. ix. 20, 21, 30, 31, 32.) He declares yet farther, "If I wash myself in snow water, and make my hands never so clean, yet shalt thou," O righteous and eternal God, "plunge me in the ditch;" manifest me, notwithstanding all this care and circumspection, to be a guilty and filthy creature; yea, so very guilty and filthy, that my own clothes, were they sensible of the pollution, could not but abhor me.

This he confesses, not because he was an habitual sinner, or chargeable with any scandalous immorality, but because his mind was filled with the most affecting sense of God's inconceivable holiness and infinite glory. "For," adds the venerable sufferer, "he is not a man as I am;" but a Being of such extensive knowledge that nothing can escape his discernment, of such exalted purity that every spot of defilement is loathsome in his sight. For which reason, it is absolutely impossible that I should answer him," with reference to my own personal righteousness, or that we should come together in judgment, on any such footing, without confusion to myself, and ruin to my cause.

To all this he subjoins, what is still more memorable and exemplary. "Though I were perfect, yet would I not know my soul, I would despise my life." He supposes himself in a higher state than your most advanced Christian, "though I were perfect;" yet even in such a state, were it attainable and attained. "I would not know my soul;" not dwell upon, not plead, no, nor so much as cherish a thought of, my own accomplishments and acquirements. In the important business of justification, they should stand for eyephers; they should be thrown into shades; they should entirely disappear. Nay more, "I would despise my life:" my life, with all its most shining actions and most distinguished virtues, should be reckoned insignificant and despicable, just as insignificant and despicable, with respect to this great transaction, as a wandering spark would be, if appointed to diffuse day amidst the darkness of night, or produce spring amidst the depths of winter.

Ther. These are alarming hints, Aspasio, I must confess. A law which requires an exact and universal obedience, both in heart and life! A God of such majesty, purity, and glory, that men of the most approved integrity are overwhelmed with confusion in his presence! I shall consider them at my leisure with the attention they deserve. At present, I believe opportunity is giving us the slip. Yonder coach seems to be moving this way, and the livery looks like Philander's.

Aspasio, desirous to fix those convictions, which are of the last consequence to our faith and salvation—very desirous to fix them on his friend's mind, replied:

Asp. As your visitants are at a distance, give me leave to observe, that the wisest of men, attending to the first of these particulars, has poured contempt upon all human excellency: "There is not a just man upon earth, that doeth good, and sinneth not." (Ecc. vii. 20.) The apostle of Christ takes shame to himself on the same account, and teaches all mankind to strike the sail of self-conceit: "In many things we offend all." (James iii. 2.) David, considering the latter of these points, prays with the utmost earnestness, "Enter not into judgment with thy servant, O Lord!" and assigns this humbling reason for his petition, "for in thy sight shall no man living be justified." (Psalm cxliii. 2.) This induced Nehemiah, who had been so nobly zealous for the honour of his God, not to confide in his own valuable services, but make application to forgiving goodness: "Spare me, O Lord, according to thy great mercy." (Neh. xiii. 22.)

Had I set before you the example of the poor publican, who smote upon his breast, durst not lift up his eyes to heaven, but cried, from the bottom of a polluted heart, "God be merciful to me a sinner!" (Luke xviii. 13,) self-love might possibly have whispered, "Surely I am not to be ranked with that abominable wretch. I stand upon some better footing than such an infamous offender." With respect to the enjoyment of eternal life, we stand upon no better, upon no other. And when low as that obnoxious despised creature, we are upon the very same ground with the most exalted saints. They all appear before the Majesty of Heaven, in the same attitude of unfeigned humiliation, and with the same acknowledgments of utter unworthiness. For it is a certain truth, and admits of no exception, that to justify sinners is not the privilege of human obedience, but the sole prerogative of "the Lord our righteous."

Ther. Is not the practice of Hezekiah an exception to your rule? These, if I recollect aright, are the words of that holy king: "I beseech thee, O Lord, remember how I have walked before thee in truth, and with a perfect heart, and have done that which is good in thy sight. (2 Kings xx. 3.) You see, he puts the issue of his trial before the everlasting God, upon his own integrity and his own obedience.

Asp. These are his words, but they are not used with this view. He humbly represents before the great Sovereign of the world, how beneficial his former life had been, and how serviceable his prolonged life might be, to the best interests of the Jewish nation. He recurs to his obedience, not that he may establish his hope of eternal happiness in heaven, but that he may obtain a reprieve from the grave, and a lengthening of his tranquility on earth. Neither is this obedience gloried in by way of merit, but only pleaded by way of argument, as though he had said, "Remember, gracious God, how I have exerted my royal authority to suppress idolatry, to extirpate vice, and to promote thy true religion. Consider how greatly thy people stand in need of such a vigilant and zealous governor; and to what a miserable condition both church and state may be reduced, if thou takest away thy servant by this threatened but untimely stroke. And, for the welfare of Judah, for the honour of thy name, for the support of thy own worship, O spare me a little!"

Aspasio paused, expecting a reply. As Theron continued silent and musing, Aspasio, with a smile of benevolence, proceeded.—Come, my Theron! why so deep in thought? Have you any objection to the evidences I have produced! They are some of the most dignified characters and illustrious personages that could be selected from all ages: kings, princes, and patriots; priests, saints, and martyrs. Should these be deemed insufficient, I can exhibit a larger and nobler cloud of witnesses:—larger, for they are a great multitude, which no man can number, of all nations, and kindreds, and people, and tongues; nobler, for they stand before the throne, and before the Lamb, clothed with white robes, and palms in their hands. Ask those shining armies, who they are, and whence they came? Their answer is comprised in one of my favourite portions of scripture, one of those delightful texts, from which I hope to derive consolation even in my last moments. For which reason, you will allow me to repeat it, though it may perhaps be mentioned in a former conversation: "We are they who came out of great tribulation; and have washed our robes, and made them white in the blood of the Lamb; therefore, are we before the throne." (Rev. vii. 14, 15.)

Some of them laid down their lives for the sake of Christ; many of them were eminent for works of righteousness; all of them were endued with real holiness. Yet none of these qualifications constituted their passport into the regions of endless felicity. They had "washed their robes," had fled to the atonement, and pleaded the merits of Jesus their Saviour. Hereby they had "made them white;" this was the cause of their acquittance from guilt, and their complete justification: and therefore, on this account, their persons were accepted; they were presented without spot before the throne, and admitted to that fulness of joy, which is at God's right hand for evermore.

Ther. I have no objection to your witness. But, methinks, your doctrine is strangely debasing to human nature.

Asp. A sign, Theron, that is agreeable to the genius of the gospel; which is calculated, as the eloquent Isaiah foretold, to humble the sinner, and exalt the Saviour: *

* This corresponds with a very valuable maxim, which an eminent divine once recommended to his people, as a touchstone to distinguish evangelical truth.—"That doctrine," he said, "which tends

To humble the sinner;
To exalt the Saviour;
To promote holiness;"

That doctrine which tends to accomplish all these designs, you may embrace as sound. That which is defective in its influence on any one of them, you should reject as corrupt.

"The loftiness of man shall be bowed down, and the haughtiness of man shall be made low, and the Lord alone shall be exalted in that day." (Isaiah ii. 11.) "Man, though naturally vain, shall be made sensible of his numberless offences; shall see the defects which attend his highest attainments; shall confess the impossibility of being justified by the deeds of the law; and place all his hope upon the propitiatory death, and meritorious obedience, of the Lord Jesus Christ.

DIALOGUE IX.

THERON, impressed with the last conversation, was very desirous to resume the subject, and renew the important debate. With this view he conducted his friend into a retirement commodious for the purpose.

They enter a spacious lawn, which lay opposite to the house, and stretched itself in the form of an expanded fan. The mounds on either side were dressed in verdure, and ran out in a slanting direction. The whole, to an eye placed at a distance, bore the resemblance of a magnificent vista; contracting by slow degrees its dimensions, and lessening at last into a point, which the regular and graceful seat with all imaginable dignity supplied.

Nature had sunk the lawn into a gentle decline, on whose ample sides were oxen browsing and lambs frisking. The lusty flocks lowed as they past, and the thriving flocks bleated welcome music in their master's ear. Along the midst of this verdant slope ran a spacious and extensive walk, which, coated with gravel, and fenced with pallisadoes, looked like a plain stripe of brown intersecting a carpet of the brightest green. At the bottom, two handsome canals, copiously stocked with fish, floated to the breeze; whose waters, beheld from every front room in the house, had a fine effect upon the sight, not without a refreshing influence on the imagination. At the extremity of one stood a stately colonnade. The roof was elevated on pillars of the Ionic order; and the area slabbed with stones, neatly ranged in the diamond fashion. Several forest chairs accommodated the anglers with a seat, while the bending dome supplied them with a shade.

Corresponding, and on the margin of the other canal, was erected a summer-house, of a very singular kind.—The lower part had an opening towards the north. It was cool; it was gloomy; and had never seen the sun. It carried the romantic air of a grotto, or rather the pensive appearance of a hermit's cell. The outside was coarse and rugged with protuberant stones. Partly overspread with ivy, partly covered with moss, it seemed to be the work of ancient years. You descend, by steps of turf, through a low and narrow door. A scanty iron grate, instead of a large sweeping sash, transmits a glimmering light, just sufficient to discover the inner structure, which appeared like one continued piece of rock-work—a cavern cut, you would imagine, from the surrounding quarry. Above, hung an irregular arch, with an aspect rather threatening than inviting. Below, lay a paving of homely pebbles; in some places a little furrowed, as though it had been worn by the frequent tread of solitary feet. All around were rusticity and solemnity; solemnity never more visibly seen than through a gloom. The furniture of the same grotesque fashion with the apartment. A bench hewed, you would suspect, by nature's chisel, out of the solid stone; a sort of couch, composed of swelling moss, and small fibrous roots. From one corner trickled a pure spring, which crept with a bubbling moan along the channelled floor, till its healthy current was collected into a basin, rudely scooped from the ground. On the edge of this little receptacle lay chained a rusty bowl, and over it stood an antique worm-eaten table. On the least obscure part of the wall you discern, dimly discern, a parchment scroll, inscribed with that sage, but mortifying admonition, "Vanity of vanities! all is vanity!"

Over this recess, so pleasingly horrid, and adapted to solemn musings, arose an open and airy Belvidere. You ascend by winding stairs; and coming from the uncouth abode below, are sweetly surprised with an elegant hexagon. The ceiling lofty, and decorated with the softest, richest, almost flowing fret-work. The wainscot, in panels of oak, retained its native auburn; so beautifully plain, that, like an amiable countenance, it would have been disfigured, rather than improved, by the most costly paint. On this were disposed, in gilded frames, and to great advantage, a variety of entertaining landscapes. But none surpassed, none equalled, all were a foil to the noble, lovely views which the windows commanded. The chimney-piece, of white shining marble, streaked with veins of vivid red. Over it was carved a fine festoon of artificial, in it was ranged a choice collection of natural flowers. On a table of glossy walnut lay a portable telescope, attended with Thomson's Seasons, and Vanicrii Prædium Rusticum.*

The whole was fitted up in the highest taste, and furnished with every pleasurable ornament, on purpose to harmonize with that lavish gaiety, which seemed to smile over all the face of nature; on purpose to correspond with that vernal delight, which came breathing on the wings of every fragrant gale: I may add, on purpose to remind the beholder of those immortal mansions, which are decorated with images infinitely more splendid, with objects unspeakably more glorious; where holy beings will spend, not a few vacant hours in refined amusement, but a boundless eternity in the consummation of joy. For, to a well-turned mind nature is a preceptor; and these are her instructive lessons: To the pure in heart, even sense is edifying, and these are its delicate moralities.

The redundant waters of the canal rolled off in a spreading cascade; which, tumbling from many a little precipice, soothed the air with a symphony of soft and gurgling sounds, nor ever intermitted the obliging office,

"From morn to noon, from noon to dewy eve."

But when the fanning breezes dropt their wings, when the feathered choir were hushed in sleep, when not so much as a chirping grasshopper was heard throughout the meads, this liquid instrument still played its solo, still pursued its busy way, and warbled, as it flowed melodious murmurs.

Asp. Such, Theron, so uniform, uninterrupted, and invariable, should be our conformity to the divine law. But, alas! those sacred precepts are so exceeding broad, that the most enlarged human obedience is far from being commensurate to their extent; so absolutely holy, that our highest attainments fall vastly short of their exalted perfection. How then can we expect justification from such a consummate rule? How dare we place our dependence upon such imperfect duties? especially before a God of unerring discernment and immaculate purity.

Ther. Because mankind are incapable of pleasing their Maker, by yielding an absolute and invariable obedience to the moral law; does it follow from thence, that they cannot render themselves acceptable to him, by an universal course of sincere obedience?

Asp. I think it follows from what has been already observed. If you desire new arguments, they are at hand.

The law, says the teacher of the Gentiles, is the ministration of condemnation.* How can this be true, if it requires no more than a sincere obedience; such as is proportioned to our infirm state? If this be sufficient to justify, and entitle us to our Creator's favour, the law ceases to be the ministration

* Vanicrii Prædium Rusticum. A most elegant Latin poem; which treats of every remarkable peculiarity relating to the business of a country life, or the furniture of a country seat. It entertains us with a description of the most agreeable objects, in an easy flow of the purest language, and most musical numbers.

* 2 Cor. iii. 7. In this place, I apprehend, the apostle means the moral law, and that principally, as that alone was written and engraven on stones. Elsewhere, I believe he uses the word in a larger sense; and intends to exclude all law whatever from bearing any share in our justification.

of condemnation. It becomes (which is flatly contradictory to the apostle's doctrine) the ministration of righteousness.

The law is styled, by the same inspired teacher, "a schoolmaster to bring us to Christ.*" How can it, upon your supposition, be qualified for such an office? If a sincere obedience be the whole of its demands, it can no longer direct us to Christ, it will no longer deliver us over to a Redeemer's merit; but must draw and attach us to itself, teaching us to look upon its precepts, and our own conscientious observance of them, as the tenure of eternal life.

Do you insist upon a third proof? A third presents itself; not so much founded on argumentation, as deduced from example. How was Abraham, the friend of God and father of the faithful, justified? By a course of sincere obedience? No; but by faith in the promised Messiah. "Abraham worked not," with a view to obtain justification; but believed on him, who justifieth the ungodly.† How was David, the man after God's own heart, justified?‡ By his zeal for the Lord, and by his eminent services? No; but by a righteousness imputed; even that righteousness of the blessed Redeemer, through which "iniquity is forgiven, and sin pardoned." And can we be said to walk humbly, or can we be thought to walk surely, if, refusing to tread in the steps of these exemplary saints, we diverge into a path of our own devising?

Ther. "Of our own devising!" No, my friend; there is a milder law introduced by the gospel, condescending and merciful to our infirmities, which accepts of sincerity instead of perfect obedience.

Asp. When was this milder law introduced, and the stricter abrogated? Not upon the entrance of sin, I presume. At this rate, the original law must be the creature of a few days, perhaps of a few hours only. But can we imagine, that the all-wise and unchangeable God would ordain a system of precepts to be disannulled as soon as enacted? Not in our Lord's time, I am

* Gal. iii. 24. "Ἰδρυγῶνος," a schoolmaster; who pretends not to finish the education of youth, but directs them to, and prepares them for, higher studies or nobler employments. The law, in like manner, aims not at furnishing us with a title to happiness; but fits, disposes, and disciplines us, for the all-sufficient Redeemer.

† These two examples are, with the truest judgment, selected, and with the utmost propriety applied, Rom. iv. 1, &c. Rom. iv. 6, &c. Abraham was the most illustrious pattern of piety among the Jewish patriarchs: "In glory there was none like him," Eccles. xiv. 9. David was the most zealous and serene of their kings; "a man after God's own heart," 1 Sam. xiii. 14. If neither of these was justified by his own obedience, but each by an imputed righteousness, if the beings, who must implore it; but as sinful creatures, who must implore it; the consequence is glaring. It is such as must strike every attentive understanding, and must affect every individual person.

very certain. That holy commandment, which requires supreme love to God, and perfect charity to men, he assures us, was still in force, Matth. xxii. 37, 38, 39. Nay it is evident, from the nature of the Deity, and from our relation to one another, that it always will be in force, that it never can cease, but is necessary and everlasting.

"A milder law, condescending to our infirmities!" What can be the purport of such an institution? It must be supposed to speak the following language: "Be it known unto you, O children of Adam, that you are no longer enjoined to love the Lord with all your strength, nor to love your neighbour as yourselves. Once, indeed, I insisted upon absolute purity of heart; now I can dispense with some degree of evil concupiscence. Since Christ is come, and his gospel preached, you need not always be clothed with humility; but may feel some little emotions of pride. In short, because you are weak, I will connive, or even accommodate my demands to your enfeebled and depraved condition."

Not to urge (what must be shocking to every ear) that such a doctrine would make the Holy One of God a minister of sin, and the gospel of our salvation a patent for licentiousness; let me only ask, Does this agree with our Lord's declaration, "One jot or tittle shall in no wise pass from the law, till all be fulfilled? Matth. v. 18. Is this suitable to the perfections of the divine Legislator? "with whom is no variableness, nor shadow of turning," James i. 17. Will this consist with the avowed resolution of the Almighty Jehovah, "He will magnify the law, and make it honourable?" Isa. xlii. 21.

Ther. However you may decry what I call the milder law, St. Paul asserts it to be the Christian scheme. This he strenuously argues for as the only scheme by which any man can be justified in the sight of God.

Asp. Does he, Theron? in what epistle? what chapter? what verse? He says, addressing himself to the Galatian converts, "I do not frustrate the grace of God, for, if righteousness come by the law, Christ is dead in vain," Gal. ii. 21. From which passage, we learn two very momentous truths, that were we to derive a justifying righteousness from the law, this would not only be derogatory to the honour of grace, but subversive of its very being; that by seeking justification through our own conscientious behaviour, we make, as far as in us lies, the death of Christ a vain thing, for which there was no occasion, and of which there is no use.

To the same purpose it is written in that invaluable epistle to the Romans, "If they which are of the law be heirs," if they who trust to their own performance of the law are thereby entitled to the heavenly inheritance ; " faith is made void, and the promise made of none effect," Rom. iv. 14.—See now, my friend, the tendency of your opinion! It is not a mere speculative mistake, an error of inconsiderable consequence, but such as strikes at the fundamentals of the gospel. Instead of being the only Christian scheme, it totally overthrows Christianity itself.* For it would render the promise abortive, and supersede the necessity of faith ; it would destroy the very existence of grace, and make even the death of Christ a superfluous transaction.

Ther. This I see, Aspasio, that the method of obtaining acceptance on account of our own sincerity, is a benign expedient, such as corresponds with the compassionate nature of the Deity, and is what the apostle styles, " being justified by faith, without the deeds of the law."

Asp. How ! To be justified by faith, and justified by sincerity, the same thing ? Is it possible that these should be equivalent terms ? Let me illustrate my query by a similitude, which our present situation suggests. Sometimes an easy comparison is more convincing than a laboured argument.

From this pleasing eminence we command an extensive view of the country. Our eye connects the artless grandeur of nature with the elegant embellishments of the summer-house. Nor is the public road the least entertaining part of the scene ; because it presents us with a moving picture, with a perpetual succession of new objects. How many travellers have passed in review since we took our seat in this agreeable elevation ! Just at this instant a stage-coach bolts out of the lane, filled, I presume, with passengers that reside in the neighbourhood, or are to lodge in the next market-town. We will suppose them set down at their journey's end. An acquaintance visits them, congratulates them on their arrival ; and asks that customary question, " how they came ? " " We came," say they, " without walking a step ourselves, yet by walking, as well, and as far as we are able." Is this answer intelligible ? Are these methods of travelling consistent ? So intelligible is my friend's doctrine ; so consistent is justification vouchsafed without the deeds of the law ; and justification obtained by performing the deeds of the law as well as we are able.

* St. Paul says of those preachers who taught justification by the works of the law, " they would pervert," or (as the original word $\mu\sigma\tau\theta\upsilon\tau\omicron\varsigma\pi\epsilon\tau\omega\iota$ may be translated) subvert and overthrow " the gospel of Christ." To pervert, give a wrong turn, or a false colour, seems not to express fully the apostle's idea, nor to preserve the native energy of his argument. The Greek word is equivalent to the Hebrew $\הִכְרִית$, which we generally render exterminate, Gal. i. 7.

Ther. Without the law, signifies without the necessity of an exact and unerring conformity to it.

Asp. This is not without, but by the law, qualified in the rigour of its demands, and departing somewhat from the perfection of its precepts. Could you affirm with any propriety, that this part of the hemisphere is without the sun, because an intervening cloud has moderated its fervour and abated its glare ?

What says the apostle ? His words in another place will determine his meaning in this. If a state of acceptance with God be of works, be referable to our own obedience, whether sincere or perfect, " it is no more of grace."* Works and grace, in point of justification, are irreconcilable opposites. On this pinnacle they cannot stand together. One must supplant and overthrow the other.

But why do I speak of grace ? If my friend's opinion prevail, grace is at an end. What we took to be the gospel, turns out a covenant of works. Salvation ceases to be a free gift, and becomes a necessary payment. For " to him that worketh," that performeth what the law requires, " is the reward not reckoned of grace ;" but he may claim it as his due, it must be paid him as matter of debt ; Rom. iv. 4.

Ther. You take no notice of what I urged concerning the benignity of this scheme, and how much it magnifies the clemency of the great Legislator.

Asp. But why should clemency erect its throne on the ruins of almost every other attribute ? This method would dishonour the veracity of God, which has denounced a curse upon every deviation from his revealed will. It would depreciate the administration of his justice, which cannot but punish whatever violates his sacred precepts. It would greatly derogate from the dignity of his law, and make it a mere thing of wax to bend, and truckle, and take its form from the sin and weakness of human nature.

Ther. Will the divine law then make no favourable allowances for human infirmities, for constitutional faults, and strength of passion ?

Asp. Far be it from me to represent the law of the Most High, either more strict, or more yielding, than it really is. To avoid all possibility of such a mistake, let us hear the declaration of the law itself : " Cursed is every one that continueth not in all things that are written in the book of the law, to do them." Gal. iii. 10.

* Rom. xi. 6. The passage produced by Aspasio, refers immediately to the doctrine of election, and but remotely to the privilege of justification. However, as the former includes the latter, if that be perfectly free, this cannot be the consequence of works. The argument therefore, I apprehend, is conclusive, though the proof is not so direct.

"Every one;" without any exception of persons, without any regard to pleas, either of human weakness or violent temptation.—"That continueth not;" it is not enough to observe these holy commandments in the general tenor of our conversation. Our course of obedience must be without any intermission, from the earliest dawn of reason to the latest period of life. "In all things;" we must refrain from all the sins that are forbidden, and from every approach towards them. We must practise all the virtues that are enjoined, and in their full extent of perfection.

In a word, the law insists upon obedience, perfect in its principle, perfect in all its parts, perfect in every degree, and in each of these respects perpetual.* The least deficiency in any one particular renders us liable to vengeance; and notwithstanding any repentance for transgressions, notwithstanding all pretensions to sincerity of heart, subjects us to the curse.

Theron paused;—he seemed to be struck with surprise;—but rallying his thoughts, replied, If this be the sense of the passage; who of all flesh can be saved?

Asp. Say rather, If the extent of the divine law be so enlarged, if its demands be so high, and its sanction so awfully rigorous, then must "every mouth be stopped;—then is all the world become guilty before God; and by the works of the law shall no man living be justified."

Ther. Will not such excessively severe doctrine drive people into despondency, or even drown them in despair?

Asp. No, Theron; unless it be such a despair as is the parent of heavenly hope, and productive of those amiable twins—peace and joy: A despair, I mean, of being reconciled to our offended God, and of obtaining eternal happiness by any satisfaction or any duties of our own.

Ther. Surely, you forget the gracious manifesto published by the condescending King of heaven: "If there be first a willing mind, it is accepted, according to what a man hath, not according to what he hath not," 2 Cor. viii. 12. Is it not plain from this text, that infinite goodness will admit our honest, though imperfect endeavours; and, since we are not able to pay an unsinning, will mercifully accept our best obedience?

Asp. I do not forget, but possibly my friend may misapply, the gracious manifesto. To whom was the word of this consolation sent? To true believers, who had "given their own selves to the Lord," 2 Cor. viii. 5;

* That the law insists upon an obedience absolutely perfect, will be farther evident to the attentive reader, if he considers the tenor of St. Paul's argumentation, in his epistles to the Romans, and to the Galatians; particularly Rom. iii. 23. iv. 15. Gal. iii. 21.

who "were established in Christ," 2 Cor. i. 21; "and abounded in faith," 2 Cor. viii. 7. If you likewise, my dear Theron, acknowledge yourself a vile sinner in your worst, and an unprofitable servant in your best estate; if, in consequence of this acknowledgment, you fly for refuge to the wounds of a crucified Saviour, and rely for salvation only on his obedience unto death; then you imitate those Corinthian converts; then you may apply that indulgent declaration to yourself; and then would I venture to address you, in the elegant and cheering language of the royal preacher, "Go thy way, eat thy bread with joy, and drink thy wine with a merry heart; for God now accepteth" both thy person and thy performances.

But if you overlook the righteousness of the blessed Jesus: if you depend upon yourself and your own attainments; you are (how shall I speak it) not accepted, but accursed. In such a case you have already heard your doom denounced by the leader of the Jews, and may hear it ratified by the apostle of the Gentiles: "As many as are of the works of the law," who seek justification by their own observance of its commands, "are under the curse." Gal. iii. 10.

Ther. Under the curse! Because our attempts to obey, though faithfully exerted, are attended with defects! Is not this unreasonable and shocking? Unreasonable, that the God of justice should establish a law of such consummate perfection, as no child of Adam can, even with his utmost assiduity and care, fulfil? Shocking, that the God of mercy should thunder out so severe a denunciation on the least inadvertent breach, on every unavoidable failure? This exceeds the relentless rigour of Draco, or the tyrannical impositions of Egyptian task-masters. Draco is said to have written his laws in blood; yet he never enacted such institutions as were absolutely too strict and difficult to be observed. And though the Egyptian task-masters insisted upon the full tale of bricks, without allowing the necessary proportion of straw; yet the punishment they inflicted was incomparably less than everlasting destruction.

Asp. If God Almighty, in delivering his law to fallen mankind, intended to propose the means of their justification, your argument would be valid, and your inference unde-

* Eccl. ix. 7. Aspasio's remark discovers an ambiguity in the word accepted. If people mean, that sincere obedience shall be accepted, as their justifying righteousness, as that which constitutes their title to everlasting felicity, the proposition is extremely false. If they mean, that the sincere obedience of believers, though very imperfect in itself, shall be graciously regarded in Christ, and find favour through his all-recommending merit, the sentiment is unquestionably true.

niable. But the Supreme Legislator had a very different, a far more mysterious design. However, before I proceed to touch upon this point, let me desire to know your opinion.—For what reasons, think you, was the law ordained ?

Ther. For what reasons ? To deter men from the commission of vice, and excite them to the practice of virtue. To set before them a rule for their conduct which, if they diligently observe, they shall be rewarded with eternal happiness ; which, if they presumptuously transgress, they shall be punished with eternal misery.

Asp. If man had never fallen, this doctrine had been sound divinity, and this method a practicable scheme. But ever since the fall, such a way of salvation is somewhat like the north-east passage. As mountains of ice, and the severest rigours of winter, block up this,—so extreme impotence in man, and the utmost perfection in the law, bar up that. “The law,” saith the apostle, “is weak ;” is incapable of furnishing us with a title to the heavenly felicity ;* not through any defect in its precepts, but “through the flesh,” through the inability of our degenerate nature.

Yet I must confess you are not alone in your opinion. Multitudes have unwarily entertained the same notion ; not apprehensive that they frustrate hereby the grace of God, and render it of none effect with regard to themselves. If you examine the scriptural account, you will find it quite of another strain.

Ther. Pray let me hear the scriptural account. For whenever those divine oracles speak, I am all attention : Wherever they interpose their authority, I am all submission.

Asp. “By the law is the knowledge of sin,” Rom. iii. 20. Far from being our justifier, it is our accuser. It arraigns, and proves us guilty. It demonstrates, beyond all possibility of contradiction, that the very best among us have failed and come short of our duty ; nay, that the very best among us have done amiss, and dealt wickedly.

“I was alive without the law once,” says the apostle, Rom. vii. 9. I thought myself upright and holy ; and entitled, by virtue of these qualifications, to life eternal. “But when the commandment came,” shining in its purity, and operating with power, “sin revived :” a clear and lively sense of guilt shot, like a piercing ray, through all my soul. I saw myself chargeable with many past provocations. I felt myself subject to much remaining corruption. In consequence of which “I died :” my vain conceits were blasted ; my presumptuous hopes expired ; I could not but acknowledge myself justly liable to condemnation and death.

Ther. It had this effect on Saul, when he was a malignant and barbarous persecutor. But when people are virtuous and benevolent, what purpose does it then serve ?

Asp. A very important one ; yet such as may probably, at the first hearing, affect you with a little surprise. “The law entered,” says the apostle, “that the offence might——”

Ther. Be restrained, no doubt.

Asp. That the offence might “abound,” Rom. v. 20, is the assertion.

Ther. Surprising indeed ! Is it possible that God’s law should give countenance to sin ? nay, add spurs to the sinner ?

Asp. Let us beware of mistaking our sacred casuist. The law entered, not that the commission of sin might be authorized, but that the abundance of our sins might be manifested ; that all mankind, even your virtuous persons, may perceive the great multitude of their iniquities, the greater impurity of their hearts,* together with the utter imperfection of their highest attainments, and best services.

This end could not be answered by a law relaxed in its demands, or warping to our weakness ; only by a system of precepts every way exact, and in all degrees perfect. Whoever would represent to his neighbours the spots that sully, or the scars that disfigure his countenance, must effect the design, not by a stained, but by a pure mirror.

Ther. “The knowledge of sin, and a conviction of our exceeding sinfulness :” these are intentions which I should not have suspected.

Asp. These are not all. There is another intention of the law, equally necessary, and no less awful : “it reveals the wrath of God against all ungodliness and unrighteousness of men.” Romans, i. 18. Having set before the sinner his innumerable offences and enormous guilt, it denounces the doom which he deserves ; it unsheathes the sword of justice, and threatens the offender with everlasting destruction from the presence of the Lord.

Ther. A modern writer supposes, that God may set aside the law, in favour of frail men. I might far more reasonably suppose, that he would mitigate the law, on the same consideration. But what you urge makes me afraid to lean on so precarious a prop.

Asp. To look for comfort and salvation from this quarter, would be to lean, as the

* Rom. viii. 3. Therefore he says in another place, “If there had been a law given, which could have given life.” Gal. iii. 21. It is the same way of speaking, and intended to denote the very same impossibility, which is implied in that speech of Jehovah to Abraham, “If a man can number the dust of the earth.” Gen. xiii. 16.

* And therefore was law given them, to evince Their natural pravity.—Milton, b. 12. l. 287.

Arabian proverb speaks, "on a wave of the sea," which will not only fail to support, but will certainly swallow up the unadvised and rash dependor.

No, Theron; rather than the divine law should lose its honours, Sodom and Gomorrah were laid in ashes; the ancient world was destroyed with a deluge; the present frame of nature is destined to the flames, and all its unholy inhabitants will be condemned to hell. Nay, rather than the least tittle should pass unaccomplished, its curse has been executed on God's own Son, and all its injunctions have been fulfilled in the person of Jesus Christ.

Ther. As I dare not confide in the modern provisional salvo, so neither can I accede to your severe and terrifying notions. The laws of a wise and beneficent governor are calculated for the good of his subjects. What good, what advantage can accrue to us, from receiving such a sentence, and possessing such convictions?

Asp. Though I might mention many advantages, I shall content myself with selecting one, which is not only valuable in itself, but the introduction to every spiritual blessing. When, by the instrumentality of the law, and the illumination of the Spirit, we are brought under such convictions, then we are taught to see our danger; then we are made to feel our misery; and then we shall no longer sleep in security, but solicitously look out for deliverance, and gladly accept the sovereign remedy.

Ther. The law, according to your representation, is intended to accuse me—to convict me—to condemn me. So it becomes, instead of a salutary, a killing system.

Asp. "The letter killeth, but the spirit giveth life." 2 Cor. iii. 6. If we adhere to the literal sense, without attending to the spiritual design; if we regard only the precept and the sanction as they stand in themselves, and neither consider nor improve them as acting in subserviency to the Mediator's righteousness; they are doubtless a killing ordinance, and bind us down under a sentence of death. But, rightly improved—Hold! let me proceed no farther with the argument.

You are a sportsman, Theron, and delight in the manly recreations of the field; you must therefore have read that fine poem, which so elegantly describes your favourite diversion.

Ther. The Chase, I suppose you mean.

Asp. The same. Do you remember the large description of the royal stag chase?

Ther. Perfectly well. It is not a week since I perused the whole passage, and with as much pleasure as if it had been entirely new.

Asp. Then you can give me a summary of the agreeable narrative.

Ther. I can. But will not this chase lead us away very far from our subject?

Asp. Perhaps not so far as you imagine. I have a reason for my request.

Ther. What reason, I beseech you?

Asp. You shall soon know. Only favour me with the account.

Ther. I protest, I cannot discern the least connexion between these rural sports and the grand topic of our conversation. However, since you command, I will implicitly obey.

The stag, roused from his lair, shakes his dappled sides; tosses his beamy head; and, conscious of superior agility, seems to defy the gathering storm. You see, speaking of poetry, I have caught something of the poetical strain.

Asp. This enlivened manner excites my eagerness, and makes me more desirous to hear the sequel.

Ther. First, he has recourse to stratagem, and evasive shifts. He plunges into the copse; darts across the glade, and wheels about in doubling mazes, as though he would pursue even the foe he avoids. The full-mouthed pack unravel all his windings, and drive him from his wily arts.

Now he betakes himself to flight, and confides in his speed. He bursts through the woods, bounds over the lawns, and leaves the lagging beagles far behind. The beagles, slow but sure, trace his steps through woods, through lawns, through half the extended forest: Unwearied, still unwearied, they urge their ardent way, and gain upon the alarmed object of their pursuit.

Again he flies, flies with redoubled swiftness; shoots down the steep; strains up the hill; and takes shelter in the inmost recess of some sequestered grove. The sagacious hounds hang, with greedy nostrils, on the scent. They recover, by indefatigable assiduity, the ground they had lost. Up they come a third time; and, joining in a general peal of vengeance, hurry the affrighted animal from his short concealment.

Perplexed, and in the utmost distress, he seeks the numerous herd. He would lose himself, and elude his pursuers, amidst the multitude of his fellows. But they, unconcerned for a brother's woe, shun the miserable creature, or expel him from the selfish circle. Abandoned by his associates, and haunted with apprehensions of approaching ruin, he trembles at every leaf that shakes. He starts; he springs; and wild, and swift as the wind, flies he knows not where, yet pours all his soul in flight. Vain, vain are his efforts! The horrid cry, lately lessened, thickens upon the gale, and thunders in his ear. Now the poor breathless victim is full in view: his sprightliness forsakes him; his agility is spent. See how he toils in yonder valley with faltering limbs and a hobbling gait! The sight of their game quickens the pace, and whets the ardour, of the impetuous hounds. With tumultuous violence they rush in, and with clamorous joy demand their prey.

What can he do, surrounded as he is with insulting tongues and ravenous jaws? Despair is capable of inspiring even the timorous breast. Having nothing to hope, he forgets to fear. He faces about, and makes a resolute stand. The trunk of a sturdy tree covers his rear, and his own branching horns defend him in front. He rushes upon his adversaries, geres some, lays others grovelling on the turf, and makes the whole coward pack give way.

Encouraged by this unexpected success, his hopes revive. He rallies once again his drooping spirits; exerts the little remainder of his strength, and springs through the midst of the retiring rout. It is his last, last chance. He stretches every nerve; once more loses sight of the rabble from the kennel; and, finding no security on the land, takes to the water! He throws his burning sides into the river, sails down the cooling stream; and slinks away to the verge of some little shelving island. There finding a resting place for his feet, he skulks close to the shady margin. All immersed in the wave, excepting only his nostrils, he baffles for a while the prying eye of man, and the keener smell of brute.

Discovered at length, and forced to quit this unavailing refuge, he climbs the slippery bank. Unable to fly any longer, he stands at bay against an aged willow; stands, all faint with toil, and sobbing with anguish. The crowds that gather round him with merciless and outrageous transport, triumph in his misery. A multitude of blood-thirsty throats, joined with the sonorous horn, ring his funeral knell. The tears, till this fatal instant unknown, gush from his languishing eyes, and roll down his reeking checks. He casts one more look on the woods, the lawns, the pleasing scenes of his former delights; and, determined to die, prepares to sell his life as dear as possible.

At this most critical juncture, the royal sportsman comes up. He sees the distressed creature; and as soon as he sees, he pities! The clemency which attends the throne, accompanies even the diversions of majesty. He issues the high command. The prohibitory signal is given. The pack, though raving for blood, are checked in a moment; and not checked only, but called off from the prey. Disappointed and grumbling they retire, and leave the intended victim of their fury to enjoy his liberty, his safety, and his ease again.

I have now followed the stag, till I have tired your patience. Why did you suffer me to run on at this extravagant rate? You know I am, on these favourite topics, an everlasting talker.

Asp. Why this apology, Theron? I am sure you did not see my mouth yawn, or my head nod, while you was pursuing your subject. Besides, I intend to make reprisals, and put your attention to the same trial.

Thus the strictness of the law pursues the soul; dislodges it from every refuge of lies; and never remits its terrifying menaces, till the poor delinquent ceases from self-confidence, and fixes on Christ for his whole salvation.

The man, perhaps, is awakened into a serious concern for his eternal state. In consequence of which, he relinquishes his profane and iniquitous practices; breaks the Sabbath, and defrauds his neighbour no more. But the law quickly represents, and in a glaring light, that a negative obedience is by no means sufficient.

Upon this he betakes himself to a course of positive holiness; gets acquainted with religious people, and performs religious duties; prays in secret, and attends public ordinances; conscientiously observes the Lord's day, and regulates his behaviour by the rule of God's commandments. Now, he is ready to congratulate himself on his remarkable and hopeful reformation.

Soon he perceives, that all his proficiency is but skin-deep, a mere outside varnish, which has not penetrated the inner man. He begins therefore, to watch over the motions, and bewail the evils of his heart. He labours to subdue pride, and curb passion; to purge out filthy lusts, and to banish spiritual wickedness. Notwithstanding all his vigilance, conscience flies in his face, either for the neglect of some virtue, or the commission of some sin. The law rings in his ear that dreadful denunciation, "Cursed is he that performeth not all things."

Struck by this conviction, his wounds bleed afresh. He is obliged to seek some new balm for his sore. In order to appease an offended God, and atone for his sinful relapses, he makes many sorrowful confessions, possibly submits to voluntary sufferings. He denies himself, and bestows liberally on the poor: He sighs deeply, and mourns bitterly.—But can waters that are muddy cleanse the garment that is filthy? Wilt thou satisfy, O vain man, wilt thou satisfy for one sin by committing another? In these penitential exercises were thy thoughts steadily devout? In those acts of beneficence, was thy heart warmly affectionate? If not, such fancied reparations of past faults, only aggravate the heavy score.

What shall he do? He cannot pay: to beg he is ashamed. Fain would he enter into life, yet not be too much indebted to grace. He attempts, therefore, to compound with heaven. He binds himself by solemn, perhaps by sacramental engagements, to use greater circumspection for the future; then turns his eye to the divine Mediator not with a view of relying wholly on his righteousness, but only to obtain such a supply as may make up the deficiencies of his own. Somewhat like this was the mistake of the Galatian converts, against which St. Paul, in his epistle to that people, so solidly disputes, and so sharply inveighs.—For a while he holds fast his purposed integrity. At length, falling notoriously short in executing his part, a startling voice sounds in his ear that dreadful alarm, “Cursed is he that continueth not.” His heart sinks with discouragement, and all his resolutions hang their enfeebled heads. He has tried every method that he can devise, and has found every method ineffectual. All his expedients are a spider’s web, and his hope is as the giving up of the ghost.

His soul, pursued by the law, and haunted by terror, is brought to the gates of death, or the very brink of despair. And now the King of kings, now the Lord our righteousness, appears for his rescue. Now is accomplished that gracious declaration, “O Israel, thou hast destroyed thyself, but in me is thy help.” Hos. xiii. 9. Driven from every false refuge, and drawn by the blessed Spirit, he comes weary and heavy laden to Christ. Convinced of the sin of his nature, the sin of his life, and the sin of his best duties, he renounces himself in every view. This is all his salvation, and all his desire, that he may win Christ, and be found in him. Did that poor afflicted woman say, “If I may but touch his garment, I shall be whole?” With equal ardour does this enlightened sinner cry, “If I may but have fellowship with the glorious Immanuel, in his merits, and in his benefits, I am alive from the dead, I am happy for ever.”

Having seen a glimpse of the transcendent excellency of the Redeemer’s person; having received a taste from the inexhaustible fulness of his grace; O how he longs for brighter manifestations! how he thirsts after more plentiful draughts!—None that come to Christ are cast out. He that awakens these ardent desires, in his due time gives the desired blessings. After various conflicts a comfortable and established faith is wrought in the penitent’s soul. He believes, that the Son of the Most High died in his stead, and was obedient for his justification; believes, that all the unsearchable riches of the adored Mediator’s life and death are his portion.*

* See this work of grace, and procedure of conversion, more copiously displayed, in a valuable little

By this faith, his heart is purified; his heart is quickened, he is fitted for every good work. Though temptations assault him, he derives strength from his Saviour; “resists the devil and is faithful, unto death.” Though corruptions defile him, he flies to the “fountain opened for uncleanness.” Zech. xiii. 1; makes daily, hourly application of the blood of sprinkling, and goes on his way, rejoicing in God his Saviour.

Ther. Your discourse puts me in mind of Absalom’s procedure when Joab refused to make him a visit. The Prince ordered his servants to set on fire the General’s corn—2 Sam. xiv. 30. This stratagem had its intended effect. The apprehension of danger drove him, when the respectful invitation would not lead him, to a personal interview. You seem to suppose that the law was delivered with such a design—to lay us under a necessity of flying to the atonement of Christ.

Asp. I do, Theron. And for this opinion I have a far better authority than my own supposition. We are assured by unerring wisdom, that “Christ is the end of the law.” Rom. x. 4. It points invariably to him; it terminates wholly in him; and then obtains its first, its principal purpose, when sinners are brought to their divine Redeemer for righteousness and strength; for that righteousness which entitles to heaven, that strength which capacitates for obedience.

“The law hath concluded all mankind under sin,” Gal. iii. 10; yet not with an intention that any should be discouraged now or perish for ever; but that every one may see his inexpressible need of a Saviour’s death, and a Saviour’s obedience; that, being thus prepared both to value and receive so precious a blessing, the promise of justification “by faith in Jesus Christ, may be given to them that believe.”

Let us advert to this grand aim of the law. Then we shall see goodness, unquestionable and sovereign goodness, in forming its constitution so sublimely perfect, and making its threatenings so inflexibly severe. Exclusive of this wholesome severity, we should supinely disesteem, perhaps wantonly reject, the grace of the gospel. The prodigal son would never have returned to his father, in that humble, submissive, supplicating posture, if he had not found his circumstances utterly ruined, and felt himself piece, entitled, “Human Nature in its Fourfold state,” by Mr. Thomas Boston, page 227, which, in my opinion, is one of our best books for common readers. The sentences are short, and the comparisons striking. The language is easy, and the doctrine evangelical. The method proper, the plan comprehensive; the manner searching, yet consolatory. If another celebrated treatise is styled, “The whole duty of Man,” I would call this the whole of Man; as it comprises—what he was originally—what he is by transgression—what he should be through grace—and then what he will be in glory.

perishing with hunger. No more would the conceited sons of Adam, disclaiming all pretence to any merit of their own, and with nothing but the halter* of self condemnation about their necks, fall down at the feet of a merciful Redeemer, if they were not instigated by the sharp goad, or rather driven by the flaming sword of the law.

Ther. Has the law, then, nothing to do with our temper and conversation? Is it no longer to be considered as a system of duties? no longer to be regarded as a rule of life?

Asp. When it has forced the lines of self-righteousness, and driven us to Jesus Christ, that only citadel of safety, for acceptance and salvation, then it serves as a rule for our conduct; then it shows us, like a friend and a guide, how to order our conversation, and adorn our profession; how to glorify God, and express our gratitude to Christ. But till it has accomplished the fore-mentioned end, it thunders vengeance, it flashes terror; it is, as Moses speaks, a "fiery law."†

And is it, my dear Theron, a fiery law? Then let it constrain us to take shelter in that meritorious obedience, which will be, to our guilty souls, "as the cold of snow in the time of harvest." Prov. xxv. 13. Is it a law which "worketh wrath?" Let it endear to our affections that inestimably precious gospel, which "preacheth peace by Jesus Christ." Acts x. 36. Is it "the ministration of condemnation?" 2 Cor. iii. 19. O let it quicken our flight to that all-gracious Surety, who was condemned at Pilate's bar, that we may be acquitted at God's tribunal!

To all this agrees our celebrated Milton, whose divinity is as faultless as his poetry is matchless. You will give me leave to quote a few of his beautiful lines, which recapitulate, as it were, the whole preceding conversation; and while they recapitulate the conversation, confirm the doctrine. This will make you some amends for my late tedious harangue, this will tip the lead with gold.

So law appears imperfect; and but giv'n
With purpose to resign them, in full time,
Up to a better covenant; disciplin'd

† Fiery law, Deut. xxxiii. 2. I dare not affirm that this is the exact import of the original, nor do I presume to determine the precise signification of a phrase so remarkably difficult. But as this is our received version; as it suggests a very useful truth, and a truth, which, in the present age, is peculiarly needful to be inculcated, I am inclined to acquiesce in the common rendering.

IALOGUE X.

Asp. AGAIN, Theron! must we never lay aside the weapons of controversy?— You put me in mind of the resolute Athenian, who, having fought with distinguished bravery on the field of Marathon, pursued the vanquished Persians to their fleet. At that very instant, a galley full of the enemy's troops was putting off to sea. Determined, if possible, to prevent their escape, he laid hold of the vessel with his right hand, which was no sooner fixed, than chopped off by the sailors. The warrior, not at all discouraged, seized it with his left. When that also was cut away, he fastened his teeth in its side; and never quitted his gripe, till he resigned his breath.*

Ther. I have been considering the case of imputed righteousness, and am by no means satisfied as to the propriety of the phrase, or the truth of the doctrine, especially in the sense which you espouse. Objections arise, more substantial and weighty than any that have hitherto been urged; and which, if I mistake not, you will find it a more difficult task to answer.

Asp. I must do my best. And if my best attempts prove unsuccessful, I shall say, with the gallant Iphicrates, when overpowered by the eloquence of his antagonist, "My adversary is the better actor, but mine is the better play."

I say better; for to you, Theron, I will freely own, what to another person I should not be so willing to disclose,—That I receive no comfort, but from the habitual belief, and daily application, of this precious doctrine. Whenever I read the most correct and beautiful writings that proceed in the contrary strain, I feel my spirits heavy, I find my prospects gloomy, and not one ray of consolation gleams upon my mind. Whereas, much meaner compositions, which breathe the savour of this evangelical unction, seldom fail to quicken my hopes, to brighten my views, and put into my mouth that piously-alert profession of the Psalmist, "I will run the way of thy commandments, now thou hast set my heart at liberty." Psalm cxix. 32. Though I am far from laying any considerable stress upon this observation, farther still from advancing it into the place of an argument, yet I may be permitted to mention it in the confidence and familiarity of friendship.

* The Athenian's name was Cynægrus. The author who relates this extraordinary story, is Justin. If the reader should think it a rhodomontade, I believe he will not judge amiss. And I promise myself, the same good sense will enable him to distinguish between what is hinted by way of pleasantry, and what is urged by way of argument.

Ther. An opinion proposed with so much modesty, and so nearly connected with my Aspasio's comfort, has doubtless a claim to my serious attention. Otherwise, it might possibly provoke my railery. For you must know I am no great admirer of inward feelings. I cannot think them a very solid method of demonstrating your point. It must be enforced by better reasons, if you would gain it access to my heart.

We must place, you say, a dependence upon the Lord Jesus Christ, in all that he has done and suffered. What he has done and suffered, you add, is our only justifying righteousness; and to place our dependence on it, is the only method to obtain pardon of our sins, and life eternal.

Asp. I have said it, Theron, and I abide by it. This being the righteousness of God, is—

Ther. Give me leave, before you proceed farther, to propose a query. Does the righteousness of God signify the active and passive obedience of Christ?

Asp. Righteousness is a conformity to the law, in heart and in life. As the Son of God voluntarily made himself subject to the law, perfectly fulfilled its precepts, and suffered to the utmost its penalty; this, I should imagine, furnishes us with the truest and noblest signification of the phrase.

Ther. What if I or others should imagine quite the reverse?

Asp. I thank my friend for his admonition. It is indeed unreasonable that my bare imagination should pass for orthodoxy and truth. Let us then inquire after better proof.

When the divine name, in the sacred phraseology, is added to a substantive, it expresses some very extraordinary property. "The trees of the Lord," Psal. civ. 16, denote those stately and magnificent forests, which the hand of the Most High planted. "The mountains of God,"* are those prodigiously large elevations of the earth, which none but an almighty arm could establish. The righteousness of God likewise means a righteousness of the most supereminent dignity; such as is worthy to be called by his name, and may justly challenge his acceptance. And where shall we find this, but in the conduct and person of his blessed Son? This has a most unexceptionable claim to the exalted title; being, as a masterly critic explains the phrase, "a righteousness devised by God the Father, from all eternity; wrought out by God the Son, in the person of Jesus Christ; applied by God the Holy Ghost to the sinner's soul."

Ther. This doctrine of yours, if I rightly understand it, would make remission of sins but one half of our justification, and something else necessary in order to obtain eternal life; which is just as rational as to suppose, that though one cause may expel darkness, another must supervene in order to introduce light.

Asp. The nature of justification, and the nature of condemnation, are two opposites, which will mutually illustrate each other. What is implied in the condemnation of a sinner? He forfeits eternal life, and is doomed to eternal death. What is included in the justification of a sinner? It supercedes his obligation to punishment, and invests him with a title to happiness. In order to the first, there must be a remission of sins; in order to the second, an imputation of righteousness. Both which are derived from Christ's mediation in our behalf; and both take place when we are united to that divine head: So that we do not derive them from two different sources, but ascribe them to one and the same great all-sufficient Cause.

Your comparison, though intended to overthrow, I think fully establishes the sentiment. When yonder bright orb makes his first appearance in the east, what effects are produced? The shades of night are dispersed, and the light of day is diffused. To what are they owing—Each to a separate, or both to the same origin?—Every one's experience will answer the question. Thus, when the "Sun of righteousness" arises in the soul, he brings at once pardon and acceptance. Remission and salvation are under his wings. Both which constitute the "healing of the nations," Mal. iv. 2.; and both owe their being to Christ's obedience, embraced as active, and not rejected as passive.

Ther. This, I know, is the fine-spun theory of your systematic divines. But where is their warrant from scripture? By what authority do they introduce such subtle distinctions?

Asp. I cannot think the distinction so subtle, or the theory so finely spun. To be released from the damnatory sentence, is one thing; to be treated as a righteous person, is evidently another. Absalom was pardoned, when he received a permission to remove from Geshur and dwell at Jerusalem; but this was very different from the recommencement of filial duty and parental endearment. 2 Sam. xiv. 24. A rebel may be exempted from the capital punishment which his traitorous practices deserve, without being restored to the dignity of his former state, or the rights of a loyal subject. In Christianity likewise, to be freed from the charge of guilt, and to be regarded as a righteous person, are two several blessings, really distinct in themselves, and often distinguished in scripture.

Ther. Where are they distinguished? in what texts of scripture? This is what I called for—your scriptural warrant.

* This is the import of the original מְרִיטוֹת אֱלֹהִים. Psal. xxxvi. verse 7, Hebrew; verse 6, English.

Asp. What think you of Job's reply to his censorious friends? "God forbid that I should justify you." Job. xxvii. 5. That he forgave them, there is no doubt. Yet he could not justify them; could not allow their reflections to be equitable, or their behaviour charitable.

What think you of Solomon's supplication? "Then hear thou in heaven, and do, and judge thy servants; condemning the wicked, to bring his way upon his head; and justifying the righteous, to give him according to his righteousness." 1 Kings viii. 32. To condemn, in this passage, evidently signifies, to pronounce guilty, and obnoxious to punishment. By parity of reason, to justify, must denote, to pronounce righteous, and entitle to happiness.

What says Solomon's father? "Enter not into judgment with thy servant, O Lord! for, in thy sight, shall no man living be justified!" Psalm cxliii. 2. A man might be pardoned, if judged according to the tenor of his own obedience. But no man could be declared righteous, in consequence of such a trial: this were absolutely and universally impossible.

From all which passages I conclude, that to be justified is different from, is superior to, the bare remission of sin.

Ther. All these instances are derived from the Old Testament; the New, if I mistake not, speaks another language. Consider the case of the penitent publican. What does he request? "God be merciful to me a sinner!" What does he obtain? "He went down to his house justified." Luke xviii. 13, 14. If, then, the petition and the grant may be deemed correspondent, pardon and justification must be reckoned equivalent.

Asp. The Old and the New Testament are, in their style and contents, exactly correspondent. Echo, in yonder cloisters, does not more punctually reverberate the speaker's voice, than those divine books harmonize with each other.

Yet it will not follow, from the publican's request and the publican's blessing, that pardon and justification are the same: Only that God's bounty frequently exceeds our prayers, and is larger than our expectations; or that the blessing which was implored, and the blessing which was vouchsafed, are inseparably connected, and always accompany each other.

St. Paul mentions "a justification of life;" not barely an exemption from the sentence of death, but such a justification, as gives a title (Rom. i. 18.) to the reward of life. The words are very emphatical. We shall injure the dignity of their meaning, if we understand them in a more contracted sense. Towards the close of the same chapter, we have another passage rich with consolation and full to our purpose: "Grace reigneth through righteousness unto eternal life." Rom. v. 21. Here is pointed out the prime source of all our blessings—infinity free and triumphant grace: the meritorious cause—not any works of man, not any qualifications of our own, but the perfect righteousness of our Lord Jesus Christ: the effect or end of all—which is not barely an absolution from guilt, but an instatement in life; a life of holy communion with God in this world, to be crowned with an eternal fruition of him in another.*

Let me produce one text more, which just at this instant occurs to my memory. You will find it in the apostle's defence of himself before Festus and Agrippa. He opens, as it were, his apostolical commission, and repeats the words of his royal Master: "I send thee" to ignorant and enslaved, guilty and ruined creatures "to turn them from darkness to light, and from the power of Satan unto God; that they may receive forgiveness of sins, and inheritance among all them which are sanctified by faith that is in me." Acts. xxvi. 18. The great preacher of the Gentiles, or rather the supreme Lord of all preachers, has distinguished between remission of sins and the inheritance of saints; between the pardon that delivers from hell, and the justification that entitles to heaven. So that the former does by no means constitute the latter; but is connected with it, as a link in the same sacred chain; or included in it, as part of the same glorious whole.

Ther. Admitting your distinction to be proper, is not the satisfaction made by the death of Christ sufficient of itself to obtain both our full pardon, and our final happiness?

Asp. Since my friend has started the question, I may venture, with all reverence to the divine counsels, to answer in the negative; it being necessary that the Redeemer of men should obey, as well as suffer in their stead. For this we have the testimony of our Lord himself. "This commandment," says he, "have I received of my Father, that I should lay down my life," (John x. 18.) "Thus it becometh us," adds he in another place, "to fulfil all righteousness." (Matth. iii. 15.) To which his apostle subjoins, that, if we reign in life, it must be not only through those sufferings which expiate, but also through that righteousness which merits. (Rom. v. 17.)

Ther. Our Lord's testimony relates only to a positive institution, and is quite foreign to our purpose. I have often been disgusted at such strained applications of scripture. The partizans of a system wrest the sacred book. They deal with divine truth, as the tyrant Proustes served those unhappy creatures who fell into his merciless hands. Is a text too short to suit their design? Our Procustean expositors can stretch it on the rack, and lengthen its sense. Is it too full to consist with their scheme? They can lop off a limb, secrete a sentence, or contract the meaning. Is this to reverence the great God? Is this to treat respectfully his holy word?

* Accordingly, eternal life is called the hope, not of forgiveness but of righteousness, Gal. v. 5. And it is bestowed, not barely because of absolution, but because of righteousness, Rom. viii. 10.

Asp. I have been grieved, I assure you, and disgusted at this practice, as well as yourself; a practice not only very irreverent, but very injudicious also. It really prejudices the cause it would unfairly recommend. Such a support is like "a broken tooth, or a foot out of joint," (Prov. xxv. 19.) not only unserviceable, but hurtful; an obstruction, rather than a furtherance. However, I am not conscious of committing any violence on this passage, or of forcing it into my service. The circumstance you object, rather strengthens than invalidates the conclusion. If it was so requisite for our blessed Mediator to observe a positive institution, how much more necessary to fulfil those moral precepts, whose obligation is unalterable and everlasting?

Besides, it should be considered whether Christ's sufferings were a complete satisfaction to the law. Complete they were with regard to the penalty, not with regard to the precept. A distinction obvious and important. From whence arises the following argument, which, for once, you will allow me to propose in the logical form.

By what alone the law was not satisfied, by that alone sinners could not be justified:

By Christ's sufferings alone, the law was not satisfied.

Therefore, by Christ's sufferings alone, sinners could not be justified.

But when we join the active with the passive obedience of our Lord, the efficacy of the one, with the perfection of the other, how does our justification stand firm, in the fullest sense of the word. We have all that the law demands, both for our exemption from the curse, and as a title to the blessing.

Ther. Does not the scripture ascribe the whole of our salvation to the death of Christ? delivering it as a never-to-be-forgotten maxim in Christianity, That "we have redemption through his blood, (Eph. i. 7.) "are brought near through the blood of Christ," (Eph. ii. 13.) nay, that "we are justified," (the very point under debate) "through his blood," (Rom. v. 9.) Would the inspired writer have assigned these various blessings to this one cause, if it had been a price inadequate to the purchase, or a means insufficient to accomplish the end?

Asp. This part of our Lord's meritorious humiliation is, by a very usual figure, put for the whole. The death of Christ includes, not only his sufferings, but his obedience. The shedding of his precious blood was at once the grand instance of his suffering, and the finishing act of his obedience. In this view it is considered, and thus it is interpreted, by his own ambassador, who, speaking of his divine Master, says, "He was obedient unto death, even the death of the cross." (Phil. ii. 8.)

By the same figure, faith is sometimes said to be a lively, influential persuasion, "that Christ died for our sins," (1 Cor. xv. 3.) At other times, it is represented as a firm practical belief, that "God hath raised him from the dead," (Rom. x. 9.) Neither of which can, without the utmost contrariety to the analogy of Scripture, be taken in the exclusive sense. Each act must be understood, not separately, but jointly; each as implying both, or reciprocally inferring one another.

In like manner, when the scripture ascribes our justification to the death of Christ, we are not to think that it would set aside, but imply his obedience. It is not because his active obedience has no concern in procuring the blessing, but because his bitter passion was the most conspicuous, and the completing stage of his ever-glorious undertaking. Then, and not till then, he could truly say, "Father, I have finished the work thou gavest me to do." (John xvii. 4.)

Ther. According to your account, then, it should be possible for a man to have all his sins done away, yet not attain to complete justification. Which is as contrary to sound sense and true divinity, as to imagine that crookedness may be removed and the object not become straight.

Asp. No, Theron. According to my account, it is impossible that the active and passive obedience of our Redeemer should be disjoined. To whomsoever the one is imputed, from him the other is not withheld. They were undivided in Christ the illustrious head, and they are undivided in their application to his mystical body. As Christ in suffering obeyed, and, in obeying, suffered; so, whoever receives Christ as an atonement, receives him also as a righteousness.

This has been observed before; and if this be real fact, what an inestimably precious gift is the gift of Christ! Never was the most Sovereign remedy so admirably suited to any malady, as this is adapted to all our wants. In him may we be found, living and dying! How safe, how happy then!—Let me not weary your patience, if I repeat a passage from our excellent Dr. Lightfoot, which, though artless and remarkably simple, has very much affected my mind, and, I hope will leave some valuable impression on my friend's. "Justification," says that judicious divine, "is a man's being interested in all Christ's righteousness. And if any thing is to be longed for, sure that is to be interested in all Christ's righteousness."

Ther. You do not weary my patience, neither do you satisfy my doubts. For you take no notice of the absurdity objected, and the comparison that enforces it.

Asp. Your comparison, my dear friend, is not founded on a parallel case. Neither sense nor philosophy find a medium between the removal of crookedness, and the succession of straightness. But reason discerns an apparent, and revelation maintains an important difference, between the pardon of guilt and a title to life. This has already been proved from scripture, and is, to me at least, evident from the very nature of things. For if a king, in favour of some condemned malefactor, revoke the sentence of death, this is one very considerable act of clemency. But if he pleases to make the pardoned criminal a partaker of his kingdom, or an heir of his crown, this surely is new, and a much higher instance of royal bounty.

If you insist upon a similitude, the word of God, which always speaks with consummate propriety, will furnish us with one. Zechariah illustrates the doctrine of justification. He represents the sinner by a person arrayed in filthy garments. His pardon is described by taking away this sordid apparel. By which benefit, he ceases to be defiled, yet is he not hereby clothed, yet is he not hereby justified: This is an additional blessing, signified by putting on "change of raiment," (Zech. iii. 4, 5.) and wearing beautiful robes. Here the circumstances tally. The two constituent parts of justification are severally displayed, and strongly marked. Here we have the removal of filth, and the robe of righteousness; that which frees us from being abhorred, and that which renders us accepted; which, though distinguishable in themselves, and distinguished by the sacred writer, are always united in the divine donation.

Ther. This notion is founded on a chimerical covenant, that Christ would take upon him the obedience due from man, of which there is not the least intimation in holy scripture.

Asp. That Christ undertook every thing necessary to redeem lost sinners from guilt and condemnation, every thing necessary to procure for attainted rebels a fresh title to life and glory; this cannot be reckoned chimerical. This must be as real, as that lost sinners are redeemed, or attainted rebels restored: every proof of the one proves and establishes the other. This is what we call a covenant, and, from its benign nature, the covenant of grace.

Without undertaking this, I see not how our Lord could sustain the character of a surety; nor without fulfilling it, how he could execute the office of a Redeemer. And I believe you yourself will be at a loss to show, with what kind of justice the eternal Father could "lay our iniquities," (Isa. liii. 6,) on the innocent Jesus, unless he had consented to be answerable for our guilt.

Ther. This is not answer to my objection. I said, and it has been asserted by a very eminent and able pen, that there is no intimation of any such covenant in the whole scriptures.

Asp. What then can be the meaning of those remarkable words in the prophecy of Zechariah? "The counsel of peace shall be between them both."* Here, I think, the covenant is mentioned, and the parties are specified. "The council of peace," if I mistake not, signifies the mysterious and unsearchable contrivance, formed for the recovery of ruined man—formed and carried into execution by the Lord Almighty, or God the Father, and that illustrious person who is to "build the temple and bear the glory." A character which none can claim, a task to which none is equal, but the blessed Jesus only.

In the 40th psalm, the conditions of the covenant are circumstantially recorded, which were, the incarnation and obedience of the eternal Son: "A body hast thou

* Zech. vi. 12, 13. These two verses contain a brief, but very fine description of the Redeemer: of his person, his office, and his glory: together with the all-gracious cause, and ever-blessed fruit of our redemption.

His person: He is the man; or, as the Hebrew imports, the "real," but at the same time, the "illustrious man;" whose name is the branch, being the new origin of a new race: the father of a spiritual seed, who are children, not of the flesh, but of the promise. A branch that shall spring, not from a common root, not from any human planting, but "from under himself," being born of a pure virgin, and by the power of his own Spirit, he shall be both stock and stem to himself.

His office: it is to build the temple, the church of the elect which is the house of the living God, in which he dwells, and by whom he is worshipped, laying the foundation of this spiritual edifice in his cross, and cementing it with his blood. Which he shall rule as a king after having redeemed it as a priest: uniting the sacerdotal censor with the regal diadem, and being a priest upon his throne. Hence proceeds his glory: for he stands not, like other priests, offering daily the same oblations; but having, by one sacrifice, obtained eternal redemption for us, is set down at the right hand of the Majesty on high.

What is the cause of these great events? What, but that most sacred and august convention, the counsel of peace? which was settled between them both; between the Lord Jehovah on one hand, and the man whose name is the Branch on the other. Called a council, from the entire consent which actuated each party, and the transcendent wisdom displayed in the whole scheme. "The council of peace," because of its sovereign efficacy to make peace with an offended God, peace in the accusing conscience, peace among people of jarring tempers and discordant principles.

prepared me. Lo! I come to do thy will." (Heb. x. 5, 7.) The accomplishment of these conditions is alleged and pleaded by our great Mediator, in the introduction to his last solemn prayer. (John xvii.) What he implores, in the process of his supplications, may be looked upon as the recompense* decreed him by the Father, and stipulated in this magnificent treaty. Implores, did I say? It is very observable, that our Lord makes a demand, rather than a request. The expression is not ερωτω but βελω,† a word of authority, not of supplication. He claims what by the Father's engagement, and by his own obedience, was become his unquestionable right.

Here are the parties of the covenant, the conditions of the covenant, the performance of the covenant, and the reward, which, by virtue of such performance, is merited, is claimable, is due. All this, I should imagine, amounts to an intimation, and somewhat more than an intimation of the covenant.

Ther. This you call the covenant of grace; but if we are justified by Christ's fulfilling of the law, we are justified by works. So that, before you can strike out such a way of salvation, you must contradict yourself; and, what is more adventurous, you must abolish that fundamental principle of the gospel, "by the works of the law shall no flesh be justified."

Asp. We are, I grant it, justified by works. But whose? The works of Christ, not our own. This is very far from contradicting ourselves, equally far is it from abolishing what you call the gospel-principle, which, though an undeniable truth, is not an evangelical doctrine; because it only shows us our miserable state, and the utter impossibility of relieving ourselves. Whereas, nothing is genuine gospel, but what speaks comfort, and administers recovery.

Between the covenant of works, and the covenant of grace, this, I apprehend, is the difference:—By the former, man was indispensably bound to obey, in his own person: By the latter, the obedience of his surety is accepted, instead of his own. The righteousness required by both, is not sincere, but complete; not proportioned to the abilities of fallen man, but to the purity of the law, and the majesty of the Law-giver. By this means, the glory of God, as an awful sovereign, and the glory of his law, as an inviolable system, are entirely preserved and illustriously displayed. The salvation of sinners neither clashes with the truth, nor interferes with the justice of the Supreme Legislator. On the contrary, it becomes a faithful and just procedure of the most high God, to justify "him that believeth on Jesus." (1 John i. 9.)

Ther. When you make this difference between the two covenants, where is your authority from scripture? Which of the sacred writers have taught us, that though one demanded personal, the other is content with vicarious obedience?

Asp. Which? The first three. The most eminent historian, the most enraptured poet, and the most zealous preacher. I need not inform you, that I mean Moses, David, and Paul.

The testimony of David has been already recited. Moses gives us a concise, but very instructive account of the second covenant. With whom, according to his representation, was it made? Not with Adam, or any of his posterity, but with the Lord Jesus Christ, in the room and stead of both. None of the articles are proposed to a poor, impotent, ruined creature; but the whole is consigned over to the interposing Saviour, significantly described by "the seed of the woman." It is not said, "Thy best endeavours, O Adam! thy true repentance and sincere obedience, shall retrieve this fatal miscarriage; but, "the seed of the woman shall bruise the serpent's head," Gen. iii. 15; the Son of the Most High, by taking thy nature, submitting to thy obligations, and suffering death for thy sins, shall fully repair thy loss.

Christ, we see, undertook to execute the conditions. Christ was our representative in this great transaction. For which reason he is styled by St. Paul, "the second man," 1 Cor. xv. 48; and "the surety of a better covenant," Heb. vii. 22. Our help being laid upon one that is so mighty, upon one that is so faithful, the covenant is said to be "in all things well ordered and sure," 2 Sam. xxiii. 5; admirably well ordered indeed, for the comfort of the Christian, and the security of his salvation. "It is true," may he argue, "I cannot fulfil the conditions, and it is equally true, that this is not required at my hands. The Lord Jesus Christ, of his adorably rich goodness, has performed all that was conditional; and has established for me and for his people a valid title to the promises, the privileges, and"——

Ther. "Has thereby released me from all obligation to duty." Farewell then to our own obedience: No more occasion for any holiness of life. Nay, the sluice is opened for an inundation of ungodliness. Fine divinity truly! Should I not rather say, downright Antinomianism!

Asp. No, my friend, "Christ came not to destroy the law, but to fulfil;" Matth. v.

* This recompense is specified and promised in another authentic copy of the same grand treaty, recorded. Isaiah xlix. 1—6.

† Not I beg, but I will. John xvii. 24. Sic volo, sic jubeo.

17. He has fulfilled it to the very uttermost in his own person. He has also merited for us those supplies of the Spirit, which alone can enable weak corrupt creatures to yield faithful and acceptable obedience. Though our Lord Jesus died, and was obedient "for the ungodly;" though he finds us ungodly when he justifies us; yet he never leaves his people in this abominable state. "On the contrary, he "teaches them to deny all ungodliness and worldly lusts," Tit. ii. 12.

Pray, let us consider the tenor of this covenant, since you are so very apprehensive of its consequences. "I will put my laws into their minds, and on their hearts will I write them," Heb. viii. 10. "They shall discern such a beauty and glory in my precepts, as will engage their desires, and win their affections; so that it shall be no longer their burden, but their delight, even their meat and drink, to do the will of their Father in heaven."—This, this is one of the privileges purchased by our great Mediator. And it seems wondrous strange, that the purchase of an estate for you or me, should be reckoned the sure means to deprive us of the possession, or debar us from the enjoyment.

How often is this weak surmise urged as an argument? all whose plausibility is owing to a palpable mistake, or an egregious fallacy; to a supposed separation of things which are absolutely inseparable—I mean our justification and our sanctification.* You are a philosopher, Theron. Try, if you can separate gravity from the stone, or heat from the fire. If these bodies and their essential properties are indissolubly connected, so are a genuine faith and a conscientious obedience. To suppose them disunited, is as contrary to sound divinity, as it would be contrary to true philosophy if you should talk of a burning substance that has no warmth, or of a solid substance that has no weight. Never therefore, my dear friend, repeat this stale objection; never propagate this ungrounded † clamour; nor adopt a cavil which is altogether as unphilosophical as it is anti-evangelical.

Ther. We digress from the point. My principal objection is not satisfied. I was observing, that, according to your manner of stating the affair, salvation is no longer free, but founded upon works. They are the works of the law, though Christ performs them. To maintain that we are justified by these works, is to confound the difference between the law and the gospel.

Asp. Though we should admit your premises, we cannot acquiesce in your conclusion. The same righteousness by which we are justified, is both legal and evangelical: Legal, in respect to Christ, who was made under the law, that he might obey all its commands: Evangelical, in respect to us, who work not ourselves, but believe in the great Fulfiller of all righteousness. This is much of the same nature with that other momentous distinction in divinity—salvation is freely given, yet dearly bought: Freely given with regard to us; dearly bought with regard to Christ. So we are justified by works, if you look forward to our Surety; we are justified without works, if you cast a retrospective view on ourselves.

Theron was silent.—Aspasio, after a short interval, renewed the discourse. I know not whether my friend is yielding to my arguments, or searching after objections; deliberating upon a capitulation, or mustering his forces for a fresh sally. However, let me take this opportunity of dropping a hint, and suggesting a caution.

The grand reason which inclines some people to reject this comfortable doctrine lies concealed, if not in an absolute disbelief of our Lord's eternal glory and Godhead, yet in unsettled apprehensions of it, or an habitual inattention to it. If our Saviour was not really God, as some writers, unhappily mistaking themselves, endeavour to persuade the world, it would be a reasonable practice, and entirely consistent with their scheme, to disavow the imputation of his righteousness: Because, upon such a supposition, his obedience was no more than bounden duty; in which there could not be the least pretence to merit, and which could be profitable to none but himself. Whereas, if we verily believe him to be the incarnate God, his submission to the law becomes an act of voluntary humi-

* See Isa. xlv. 24; 1 Cor. i. 30; 1 Cor. vi. 11; where these blessings walk hand in hand, and never were, never will, never can be parted.

† This puts me in mind of what Theodorus replied to Philocles; who was often insinuating, that he preached licentious doctrine, because he enlarged with peculiar assiduity upon faith in Jesus Christ; and frequently chose such texts as, "Believe in the Lord Jesus, and thou shalt be saved."

"I preach salvation by Jesus Christ; and give me leave to ask, whether you know what salvation by Christ means?"—Philocles paused. He began to blush; would have eluded the question, and declined an answer. "No, said Theodorus, "you must permit me to insist upon a reply. Because, if it be a right one, it will justify me and my conduct; if it be a wrong one, it will prove that you blame you know not what; and have more reason to inform yourself, than to censure others."

This disconcerted him still more, upon which Theodorus proceeded; Salvation by Christ means, not only a deliverance from the guilt, but also from the power of sin. "He gave himself for us that he might redeem us from all iniquity; redeem us from our vain conversation," as well as deliver us from the wrath to come. "Go now, Philocles, and tell the world, that by teaching these doctrines, I promote the cause of licentiousness. And you will be just as rational, just as candid, just as true, as if you should affirm, that the firemen, by playing the engine, and pouring in water, burnt your house to the ground and laid your furniture in ashes."

liation Which circumstance, together with the transcendent dignity of his person, render his obedience, not meritorious only, but inexpressibly and infinitely meritorious.

As the blood of Christ is called God's "own blood," (Acts xx. 28.) so the obedience of Christ was performed in the person of that adorable Mediator, "who is God over all," (Rom. ix. 5.) He acted through the whole course of his life, and suffered death at the last, not merely as a man, but as God-man; as Jehovah Jesus; Emmanuel. Let me entreat you to remember, may let me entreat you never to forget this all-important article of our faith. And may the Spirit of wisdom give us an understanding to know the weighty, the extensive influence, of so glorious a truth!

Ther. Far be it from me to derogate from the dignity of our Saviour's person, or to depreciate the merits of his mediatorial office. Place them as high as words can reach, exalt them as far as thought can soar, I stedfastly believe you will still fall short, immeasurably short, of their real worth. But this consideration seems to increase the absurdity of your notion: For if Christ's righteousness, his very righteousness be imputed, then the true believers are altogether as righteous as Christ himself; whereas, if you maintain that his righteousness is imputed only as to its effects, you will keep clear of this rock.

Asp. This, I apprehend, will be like keeping clear of Scylla only to fall foul upon Charybdis. What are the effects of the Mediator's righteousness? Pardon of sin, justification of our persons, and the sanctification of our nature. Shall we say, these effects, these benefits are imputed? To talk of their imputation, I think, is an affront to sound sense; as, I am sure, to be put off with their imputation, would be a fatal disappointment of our hopes. All these benefits are, not imputed but imparted; they are not reckoned to us, but are really enjoyed by us: ours they are, not barely in the divine estimation, but by proper and personal possession.

Yet it does by no means follow, that believers are altogether as righteous as Christ himself, unless you can prove, that to be the receiver is, in all respects, the same as to be the author and finisher. (Heb. xii. 2.) The righteousness of Christ arises wholly from himself, the source of ours subsists in another. Christ's righteousness is originally and absolutely his own; whereas it is made ours in a way of favour and gracious imputation. Circumstances these, which create a material difference, which yield room for a vast pre-eminence.

Ther. But if Christ's perfect obedience be accounted ours, methinks we should have no more need of pardoning mercy than Christ himself.

Asp. Yes; because, before this imputation, we were sunk in guilt, and dead in sins; because, after it, we are defective in our duty, and in many things offend.

Ther. Does not this doctrine render the intercession of our Saviour superfluous? What occasion have they for an advocate with the Father, whose righteousness has neither blemish nor imperfection?

Asp. They stand in need of an advocate, first, that they may be brought home to "the Repairer of their breaches," (Isaiah lviii. 12.) and made partakers of his righteousness by a living faith: next, that their faith may be preserved, notwithstanding all opposition, stedfast and immoveable; or rather, may be carried on victorious and triumphant, even to the end.

Ther. You say, "Christ performed all that was conditional;" then he repented for us, and believed for us. This must be admitted in pursuance of your principles: But this is so wild a notion, so contrary to reason and scripture, that to mention it is to refute it.

Asp. Christ performed whatever was required by the covenant of works, both before it was violated, and after it had been transgressed. But neither repentance nor faith were comprehended in this institution. It knew nothing of the one, and it would not admit of the other. It was not therefore necessary, neither indeed was it possible, for our spotless and divine Lord to repent of sin or believe in a Saviour. But he did unspeakably more, "He put away sin by the sacrifice of himself." (Heb. ix. 26.) He is himself the Saviour of all the ends of the earth: and he has power to bestow that blessed Spirit, which worketh faith, and produceth repentance.

Ther. However, from what you have advanced, this will unavoidably follow.—That a man is to be justified under the character of a notorious transgressor of the law, and justified under the character of a sinless observer of the law. And what is this but a glaring inconsistency?

Asp. Not at all inconsistent, but absolutely needful, if we consider those distinct branches of the divine law, the perceptive and the penal; both which, in case of guilt already contracted, must necessarily be satisfied. Not at all inconsistent, but perfectly harmonious, if we take in the two constituent parts of justification—the acquittance from guilt and a title to life. The former supposes us to be transgressors of the law; and such the highest saints in the world are. The latter requires us to be observers of the law; and such must the inheritors of heaven be. Much less is this inconsistent, if we consider believers in their personal and relative capacity; as they are in themselves, and as they are in their Surety. Notorious transgressors in themselves, they have a sinless obedience in Christ. The consciousness of that will be an everlasting motive to humility; the belief of this, an inexhaustible source of joy.

All this is no more inconsistent than the union of a gloomy contexture and a light-some splendour, in those detached clouds which float amidst the firmament. In themselves, they are a louring and dark collection of vapours; by the impression of the sun-beams, they are fair and bright as the polished silver.

Ther. After all, the imputation taught in scripture is not the imputation of Christ's righteousness, but of our own faith. Agreeably to the apostle's express declaration, "Abraham believed God, and it was imputed to him for righteousness." (Rom. iv. 3.)

Asp. This objection admits the thing in dispute, though it controverts the way and manner of obtaining it; admits the necessity of some active, positive righteousness, in order to our justification. In this particular, I am glad to agree with my Theron; and in this particular, I believe the generality of serious people agree with us both. Whenever their consciences are awakened, and seek to establish the hope of eternal life, they constantly turn their eyes to some righteousness, which they apprehend may, either in whole or in part, answer the demands of the law. Some look to their own sincere obedience; others call in to their succour works of supererogation. My friend would assign this office to his faith.

Ther. Is this a proper answer to my objection, Aspasio? The text is point-blank against your tenet. You do wisely therefore not to confront, but to elude the evidence.

Asp. I did not intend it for an answer; only as an occasional observation, which nevertheless has a pretty close connexion with the subject. Neither would I use so mean a subterfuge, as to elude an argument which I could not confute. If my friend had allowed me leisure to explain myself, this should have been my reply.

That a man is not justified by works, is a position most clearly demonstrated, and a doctrine most zealously inculcated by St. Paul. That faith is a work* exerted by the human mind, is equally certain. Unless, therefore, we would render the apostle inconsistent with himself, we must understand the passage in a qualified sense. Why should we not suffer him to be his own interpreter? why should we not take the narrative of his experience for a comment on his doctrine? He declares, that the ground of his own comfort, the cause of his own justification, was not the grace of faith, but the "righteousness which is of God by faith;" Phil. iii. 9; not the act of believing, but that grand and glorious object of a sinner's belief, "the Lord our righteousness."

Besides, what was that faith of Abraham to which the apostle refers, and which he proposes as the invariable model of our justification? It was faith in the promised seed—in Jesus Christ the righteous.* It was a firm persuasion, that this illustrious person should spring from his loins, and be the author of forgiveness, acceptance, and salvation to himself, and to a multitude of believers numberless as the stars of heaven. Let us tread in these steps of the holy patriarch, and we shall ascribe little, ascribe nothing to our faith, but all to the infinitely excellent obedience of our Redeemer.

Ther. Sure, Aspasio, you will not presume to correct inspiration! The inspired writer makes no mention of a Redeemer's obedience. He says expressly and positively, "It," that is, Abraham's faith, and not any thing else, "was counted unto him for righteousness."

Asp. True, Theron; as those windows are reckoned, are counted the lights of your house. Why? Because they illuminate? No; but because they afford a passage to the illuminating rays. Through them, the first and best of elements is diffused into all your habitation. So "we are saved by grace through faith," by grace imputing, through faith accepting, the righteousness of Jesus Christ. Grace is the magnificent source of this nobler light, faith is the means of transmitting it into all the faculties of the soul.

When our Lord declares to the diseased woman, "Thy faith hath made thee whole," Matth. ix. 22, how are we to understand his words? That the patient's belief, and not the agency of Christ, wrought the cure? To suppose this, would be extremely derogatory to the power of our great Physician. And if we ascribe justification to the act of believing, this will be equally derogatory to the obedience of our great Mediator. In the former case, Christ and his omnipotent operation were all in all. In the latter case, Christ and his infinite merit are all in all. In both cases, faith is the only eye to discern, or the hand to receive, the sovereign good.

I would farther observe, that faith is very particularly distinguished from the righte-

* So it is called by Him, who knew what was in man, and what were the differences of things; "This is the work of God, that ye believe on him whom he hath sent," John vi. 29.

* Compare Gen. xv. 6, 6, with Gal. iii. 16.

ousness which justifies. We read of the righteousness which is by faith, which is of faith. Rom. ix. 30. Phil. iii. 9. This form of expression puts an apparent difference between the evangelical faith and the evangelical righteousness; since whatever is by another, and of another, cannot, without the greatest violence to reason and language, be reckoned that other.—If faith was the cause of our acceptance with God, then we should be justified by a righteousness which is confessedly imperfect: For who has ever attained to the highest degree of this virtue? or whose faith is not mixed with an alloy of unbelief? If faith itself was the matter of our justification, I see not how boasting could be excluded; how the law could be magnified; or what reason the apostle could have to account all things, but the righteousness of Christ, meaner than dross. Phil. iii. 8.

Say not, that we presume to correct inspiration: we only interpret the inspired word in an harmonious consistency with itself. This sense is agreeable to the prevailing doctrine, and to the current language of scripture. To the prevailing doctrine; which is “a believing in him who justifieth the ungodly.” Sift and examine this expression, “him who justifieth.” You will find that the work is Christ’s; Christ’s and no other’s. The Holy Ghost assigns not the least share, not so much as a co-efficiency, to any other cause. Faith, therefore, if it presumes to arrogate this exalted prerogative, or if it pretends to the least part in this important business, is a sacrilegious usurper. To the current language; as when God is called our father; Gen. xxi. 42, 53; our hope; Psalm lxxi. 5. Jer. xiv. 8; our joy. Psalm xliii. 4. In these places, the act is undoubtedly put for the object: So, in the passage before us, the act must denote the object of faith. It is to be understood, not absolutely, but as some divines speak, objectively, instrumentally, relatively.

Ther. In the name of wonder, what can you mean by this heap of harsh and obscure expressions? Let me entreat you, Aspasio, to speak in your own style, not in the dialect of Aquinas. I have an irreconcilable aversion to these scholastic terms: They are the barbarisms of divinity: I know but one use they are fitted to serve; that is, to perplex and puzzle a cause you cannot maintain: Somewhat like the liquor which a certain fish, when closely pursued, is said to emit, by which the water is darkened, and the foe eluded.

Asp. This, Theron, is the meaning of our uncouth phrases: It is not faith itself which justifies; but that righteousness which faith continually views, which faith delightfully apprehends, and on which it finally terminates.

To be plainer still; we are justified by faith, in the same manner as we are fed by the hand, or as we are said to drink of a cup. Neither the hand nor the cup are the cause of our sustenance, but the instruments; one of conveying it, the other of receiving it.* If an apostle affirms, “We are justified by faith;” faith itself declares, “in the Lord I have righteousness.” Put these passages together, and you will have the true sense of our doctrine, and the true doctrine of the gospel.

When Themistocles fled from the malice of his own countrymen, what recommended him to the protection of king Admetus?—Not his name; that was obnoxious.—Not his actions; they had been hostile.—But the person of the young prince, whom the distressed refugee caught up in his arms; and charged with these credentials, presented himself to the royal parent.† So faith recommends to God, and justifies the soul, not for itself or its own worth; but on account of what it presents, and what it pleads.

Ther. Is not this a fanciful distinction, and an excessive refinement? Has it any foundation in scripture?

Asp. It is implied in almost all the representations of Christ, and all the descriptions of faith, which occur in the sacred writings.

Christ is likened to clothing; and believers are said to “have put on Christ,” Gal. iii. 27. Now it cannot be the act of putting on, that covers our bodies, or keeps them warm; but the commodious garment which is wore.—He is compared to bread: “I am the bread of life.” John vi. 35. Shall we say, it is the act of eating which strengthens the constitution, and recruits our spirits? No surely; but the food eaten and digested. Christ was typified by the “cities of refuge,” Num. xxxv. 13, and sinners, by the obnoxious manslayer; who, if he fled to one of those privileged abodes,

* Though I am entirely of Theron’s mind, and can by no means admire our scholastic divines, or their logical terms, yet, a remark from Pareus, couched in this style, is so pertinent to the purpose, and so full an explication of the point, that it would be an injury to the cause, not to make it a part of my notes. And some readers, I apprehend, not much acquainted with this old-fashioned dialect, may be well enough pleased to view a specimen; may like it, as they do the rust of a medal, merely for its uncouthness and antiquity.

“Faith justifies,” says my author, “not effectually, as working an habitual righteousness in us, not materially, as though it were itself the constituent cause of our justification; but it justifieth objectively, as it apprehendeth Christ; and instrumentally, as it applieth his righteousness.”

† This, saith Plutarch, was a custom peculiar to that country; was reckoned the most solemn method of supplicating favour; and seldom met with a repulse. To which I may add, it is a custom that Christians should imitate, in all their addresses to the God and Father of our Lord Jesus Christ. When thus used, thus improved, it will never fail of success.

and there remained, was safe. No prosecution against him could be valid. He had nothing to fear from the avenger of blood. In this case, was it the bare act of flying that screened the criminal? By no means. This conveyed him to a place of security. But the place itself was his sanctuary, his asylum, his safeguard.

Faith is styled a receiving of Christ: "As many as received him, to them gave he power," or granted the privilege, "to become the sons of God." (John i. 12.) The office of faith is, according to this definition, not to contribute its quota, much less to deposit the whole sum, but to take and use the inestimable gift.—Faith is called "a looking unto Jesus," Heb. xii. 2. in allusion, I suppose, to the famous expedient provided for the wounded Israelites. Num. xxi. 8. Our crucified Lord was prefigured by the brazen serpent; our guilt by the stings of the fiery serpents; and our faith by looking to the miraculous remedy. Did the healing power, I would ask, reside in the mere act of viewing? No; but in the emblem of a dying Saviour, elevated on the pole, and ordained for the recovery of the people. Here all the efficacy was lodged. From hence it was all derived. The action of the eye, like the office of faith, was only to fetch home, and apply the sanative virtue.

Once more: faith is represented, as "laying hold" on God our Saviour; Isa. xxvii. 5; "leaning" upon our Beloved, Cant. viii. 5; "cleaving" to the Lord, Acts xi. 23. Please to take notice of yonder vine. Its shoots are weak, and its branches are flimsy. Being absolutely unable to support themselves, they are furnished with a very remarkable set of clasps; which, like so many fingers, lay hold on the pegs of the wall, or fasten themselves to the poles within their reach. Without such a provision, the boughs must lie prostrate on the ground, and be exposed to the insults of every foot; whereas, by this kind contrivance of nature, so creeping a plant will climb into the air and enjoy the breeze; so feeble a plant will stand out the winter, and defy the storms.—An instructive admonition to sinners; and no contemptible illustration of faith, especially in its principal and most distinguishing employ. Thus let us apprehend the blessed Jesus, hold us fast by our adored Redeemer, cleave to his ineffable worthiness, as those twining tendrils, by repeated circumvolutions, adhere to their substantial supporters; then shall we rise, by "merits not our own," from the most abject and miserable condition, to a state of everlasting honour and joy.

Ther. Some people, I believe, would hardly forbear smiling at the peculiarity of your diction, and might be inclined to call your discourse ranting, rather than reasoning. For my own part, I must acknowledge, that as all your peculiar phrases are derived from the scriptures, I hear them with reverence, rather than any disposition to sneer. Was my friend delivering a Latin oration, it would be a sufficient warrant for any of his expressions to prove that they came from the Ciceronian mint: And will it not be, at least, an equally sufficient authority for any modes of speech used in a theological essay, to allege that they bear the stamp of the Bible?

Though I make no objection to your language, I have yet another scruple with regard to your doctrine.—Do the ancient fathers adopt or inculcate this imputed righteousness? If it was so important an article of our faith, surely it could not be unknown in those early ages which were so near the apostolical fountain. It would not have been omitted by those zealous preachers, who chose to endure all the rigours of persecution rather than renounce their holy profession.

Asp. I think it were sufficient to answer this question by asking another. Do the apostles, does the holy Spirit of God speaking in scripture, inculcate this doctrine, or display this privilege? If so, we need not be very solicitous for any farther authority. "To the law and to the testimony," (Isa. viii. 20.) is our grand, our final appeal. Amidst all the darkness and uncertainty, which evidently run through the writings of the best of men, this is our unspeakable happiness, that "we have a more sure word of prophecy, to which we do well to take heed." (2 Pet. i. 19.)

However, to be a little more particular: It cannot be expected that we should find many passages in those pious authors, very strong and very explicit upon the point; because in their days it was not so professedly opposed, and therefore could not be so exactly discussed as in the latter ages. Nevertheless, they have left enough behind them to avouch the substance of what we assert, "That a man is not justified by any works, duties, or righteousness of his own, but only by faith in Jesus Christ." I cannot say that I have charged my memory with their very words, and for that reason must not attempt at present to make any citation. But, when a proper opportunity offers, and their works are before me, I may possibly produce a few of their testimonies.

In the mean time, I can mention a set of writers, whose attestation will, I imagine, carry as much weight with my friend, as the united voice of the Greek and Latin fathers.

Ther. Who are they?

Asp. Our venerable reformers. The homilies composed by those excellent divines, are as express to my purpose as they are unexceptionable in their evidence. This is their language: "The true understanding of this doctrine, We be justified freely by faith without works, is not, that this our act to believe, or this our faith in Christ, doth justify us, for that were to count ourselves to be justified by some act or virtue that is within ourselves. But the true meaning thereof is, that although we hear God's word, and believe it; although we have hope and faith, charity and repentance, and do never so many good works; yet we must renounce the merit of all our virtues and good deeds, as things that be far too weak and insufficient to deserve remission of sin, and our justification. We must trust only in God's mercy, and that sacrifice which our High Priest and Saviour Jesus Christ, the Son of God, offered for us upon the cross."

The homily subjoins a very opposite illustration, which may conclude our discourse with perfect propriety, and I hope with equal efficacy. "So that as St. John Baptist, although he were never so virtuous and godly a man, yet in the matter of forgiving sin, he did put the people from him, and appoint them unto Christ, saying thus unto them, "Behold!" yonder is the "Lamb of God, which taketh away the sins of the world," even so, as great and as godly a virtue as the lively faith is, yet it putteth us from itself, and remitteth us unto Christ, for to have only by him remission of sins, or justification. So that our faith in Christ, as it were, saith unto us thus, It is not that I take away your sins, but it is Christ only? and to him only I send you for that purpose, forsaking therein all your good words, thoughts, and works. And only putting your trust in Christ.*

Ther. If there be any tolerable sense of the notion under debate, I think it must be understood as follows:—Christ's performance of the law of his mediation, or, in other words, his unerring obedience to the moral law, and the spotless sacrifice of himself to the vindictive justice of God; these are the only valuable considerations on account of which the gracious God restores guilty creatures to a state of acceptance with his divine majesty.

Asp. I am far from denying your proposition: I rejoice in the propriety of my Theron's sentiments. May his faith, which is thus far advanced, be carried on by grace, till it is completed in glory! That unerring obedience, and that spotless sacrifice, are indeed the only valuable, they are also the truly, or rather the infinitely valuable consideration, which has fully merited for us the remission of sins, and the enjoyment of life; and this not only from the gracious, but even from the just, the faithful, the righteous God.

But then, they must be imputed, in order to furnish us with a claim, and invest us with a right to the purchased privileges. Suppose them not imputed, and what becomes of our interest in them? They are like a medicine prepared but not applied. Suppose them imputed, and they lay a firm, an apparent, a rational foundation, for every pleasing hope, and for every heavenly blessing.

Ther. I fear I have acknowledged too much.—My thoughts fluctuate. My mind is unsettled. I would not withstand the truth, I would not disbelieve any doctrine of the gospel. Yet, what shall I say? While I listen to your reasoning, I am half a convert. When I recollect the objections, I revert to my first opinion.

Of this, however, I am convinced, that human righteousness is insufficient for our justification. Here your arguments have carried their point. I shall henceforth place my hopes of everlasting happiness, not upon any works of my own, but upon the freeness and unbounded beneficence of the Supreme Being, pursuant to that maxim of Scripture, "The gift of God is eternal life."

Asp. You do right, Theron, to expect eternal life, as the gift of God, not as the wages of your own obedient service. But be pleased to remember, that all the gifts of grace, though perfectly free to sinners, are founded upon a grand and inestimable price paid by their Saviour. Are they entirely absolved from guilt? It is because Christ gave his life for their ransom? Are they heard with acceptance when they pray? It is because their exalted High Priest intercedes in their behalf.—Are they completely justified, and instated in endless bliss? It is because their Redeemer's consummate obedience is the glorious equivalent for this and every other blessing.—Therefore, when you mention eternal life as the gift of God, you should not forget to add with the holy apostle, "through Jesus Christ our Lord." (Rom. vi. 20.) Well, my Theron, what say you farther? Is your quiver emptied? Are your scruples satisfied? May I interpret this silence as an act of assent?

Ther. Observe how the ranunculuses on yonder gay parterre have contracted their spreading tufts, and the tulips have closed their expanded cups, while all the neighbouring flowers have shut their ivory doors, or drawn their velvet curtains. Such is the state of my thoughts. They are all bent inwards, collected in themselves, and pondering upon your discourse, which has inclined me, before I was aware, to contemplate rather than talk. You will excuse my thoughtfulness, Aspasio; or, if it wants an apology, you must blame yourself, for, had your reasons been less cogent, my attention had been more disengaged.

Asp. My dear Theron, I shall only wish, in allusion to your own simile, and in the language of the best of books, that these truths may "distil as the dew," upon your mind, (Deut. xxxii. 2.) and "lie all night upon your branches." (Job xxix. 19.) This, I am persuaded, is the only way to have all your comforts "green before the sun," and all your virtues "flourish as an herb:" whereas, under the influence of any other faith, I am afraid they will be as the garden that is visited with a drought, or as the leaves that are smitten with a blast.

Ther. I shall attentively consider, both your doctrine, and your arguments; which, that I may execute with more ease, and to better purpose, be pleased to sum up, in a few words, the substance of what has passed. This done, it will be time to withdraw. The flowers, you see, are our monitors. They have folded up their robes, and veiled their beauties: A custom which they seldom use till the rising damps render it unsafe for their master to be among them, and the surrounding gloom renders it difficult for his eye to distinguish them.

Asp. You could not oblige me more, than by giving me such a command. We trust for salvation,

Not on our own external duties. This were to build our house upon the sand; which, when the rains descend, when the torrents pour, when the winds blow with tempestuous violence, will certainly fall, and bury the builder, with all his vain hopes, in irretrievable ruin.

Not on the sincerity of our hearts. This, if opposed to Christ, and made the rival of his merits, will be a "despised broken idol." Despised by the infinitely sublime and majestic Ruler of the world. Broken, with regard to the stress we lay, or the confidence we repose, on so deceitful a prop. No more able to stand in the judgment of the great day, than Dagon was able to maintain his station before the ark of the Lord God of Hosts. (1 Sam. v. 3, 4.)

Not upon our faith. This is often weak, as the rickety child: sometimes quite faint, like a person in a deep swoon; always imperfect, like every other performance of ours. Alas! to what afflicting fears, to what grievous despondency should I, for my part, be perpetually liable, if my own faith was the ground of my justification? Blessed be the Father of mercies! we have a surer support. Not upon faith, not upon faith, but upon its gracious Author, and glorious object, is the hope of Israel founded. Yet,

Not upon our Lord's righteousness, considered only as passive; but upon his active and passive obedience united: all that he did in conformity to the commands of the law, and all that he suffered, in submission to its penalty. Both which, immensely dignified by his divine nature, are a basis for our faith which nothing can shake, are a foundation for our alliance, which can never be removed. Nothing else, in any creature, or in all worlds, could expiate the least sin. This not only expiates all sin, but gives a title to every blessing—to the blessings of grace and of glory, of evangelical holiness and everlasting happiness.

DIALOGUE XI.

Asp. I HAVE often purposed, and as often forgot, to ask my Theron what picture he was so attentively surveying, when I stole unperceived upon him in this favourite arbour.*

Ther. I was indulging a pensive pleasure, in viewing the ruins and contemplating the fate of Babylon—that renowned and opulent city! once the residence of the Assyrian monarchs, and capital of one of the greatest empires in the world. The draught I held in my hand represented some of its remains. And indeed this was the very last subject which employed my thoughts. In the morning my son brought me his observations upon the scene, which I have just now been revising.

For I frequently set him to exercise his judgment or display his fancy on remarkable passages which occur in history. He was lately commissioned to determine a controversy between the illustrious Leonidas and the less celebrated Pædaretus. This was the point in debate.—Which of them discovered the truest generosity of spirit, and the most heroic love of their country? The former, who willingly sacrificed his life in its defence? or the latter, who, when he was candidate for a seat among the three hundred, and lost his election, instead of being chagrined or dissatisfied, went home, unfeignedly rejoicing, "that there were found in Sparta, three hundred men, more worthy than himself?" The task of this day was, to give a descriptive picture of those wonderful ruins.

Asp. Pray let me have the pleasure of hearing the young gentleman's performance.

Ther. It will be too long, and too puerile; tire your patience, and offend your taste.

Asp. I do not use to make either of these complaints, when I am entertained with Theron's compositions; and, as the son has so much of his father's genius, I am not at all apprehensive of any such disappointment. We have a most agreeable situation, and more than an hour's leisure: I must therefore repeat my request.

Ther. It is true, I have retouched the sketch, which may render it somewhat more tolerable. And since you persist in your demand, I will read the paper. Only desiring some allowance for a little luxuriance of imagination, which, in young writers it may be advisable to indulge rather than repress, as age and judgment will probably come with the pruning knife, and make the proper retrenchments. I must farther observe, that contrary to the custom which prevails in our schools, I generally choose to have him express his sentiments in English; because it is in this language he must communicate his own, and become acquainted with the ideas of others; because, to acquire some good degree of propriety and fluency in this his native tongue, will be incomparably more serviceable, than to speak Latin with the Tarentine elegance, or to write it with the Ciceronian copiousness.

Is this Babylon? the glory of kingdoms!
the beauty of the Chaldean excellency!

Where once the gorgeous east, with richest hand,
Shower'd on her kings barbaric pearl and gold.

How is she fallen! fallen from the height of magnificence into the abyss of confusion! What was once the object of universal admiration, is now a spectacle of astonishment and horror.

The palace, where majesty sat enthroned, like some terrestrial deity, is a heap of rubbish; no longer distinguished by an air of superior elegance, but by stronger and more melancholy marks of departed dignity.* Where the nobles of that sumptuous court trailed along the marble pavement their robes of purple and embroidery, there the crested snake hisses, or the fierce venom-adder glides.

How changed is the hospitable hall, and how disgraced the room of state! The first afforded a constant and cordial reception to the welcome guests; in the last the great king gave audience to his cringing, his adoring vassals. Now thorns overrun the circumference, and "desolation sits in the threshold of them both!" Where are the roofs of ivory, painted with vermilion and adorned with sculpture? the radiant roofs, whose lamps of burnished silver, pendent in many a blazing row, yielded light as from another sky? Swept from their foundations, they lie clotted with defiling dirt, or clasped with tangling briars. Music no longer pours her harmony through the spacious and extended apartment; but the night-owl, nestling in some cleft of the ruins, screams her harsh and portentous dissonance. Joy no longer leads up the sprightly dance amidst the lustre of that artificial day; but the solitary bat flits in silent circles, or flaps her sooty wings. All those gay delights, let the sons of sensuality hear the tale, and take warning from the catastrophe!—all those gay delights are extinguished, like one of their feeblest tapers, which, having illuminated for a while the festive assembly, shone itself to the edges of the exhausted socket, and, in a moment flashed into stench and darkness.

The walls, though cemented with bitumen,* and consolidated into the firmness of a flint, are become like the broken bubble. There was a time when the inhabitants, confiding in the strength of their bulwarks and the multitude of their towers, looked down with fearless disdain on the army of besiegers. But now the prophet's threatening is most terribly fulfilled: "The fortress of the high fort of thy walls hath he brought down, laid low, and brought to the ground, even to the dust," Isa. xxv. 12.—Where are the gates, the grand and glittering gates,† which admitted the triumphant hosts, or poured forth their numerous legions against the day of battle? Not one trace remains to tell the inquisitive stranger, "Here the spacious avenues opened; here the massy portals rose. Commodious walks, in which the clustering merchants raised the busy hum, and planned the schemes of commerce; ample streets, in which industry drove the toiling car, or smote the sounding anvil, are shrouded with matted grass, or buried beneath the rankest weeds. Silence, in both places, a sullen silence reigns; and inactivity, a death-like inactivity slumbers.

What is become of those hanging gardens, which, for curious contrivance and stupendous workmanship were never equalled in any nation under heaven? Terraces that overlooked the tallest houses! Parterres exalted to the clouds, and opening their flowery beauties in that strange region! Groves, whose very roots were higher than

* Benjamin, a Jew of Tudela, in his Itinerary, written about the year of our Lord 1170, tells us, "That he was upon the place where this city formerly stood, and found it wholly desolated and destroyed. Only some ruins of Nebuchadnezzar's palace were still remaining, but men were afraid to go near them, in reason of the many serpents and scorpions that were therein the place."

* The walls were built of brick, and cemented with a glutinous kind of slime, which binds more firmly than any mortar, and soon grows harder than the bricks or stones themselves.

† There were no less than an hundred gates, all of solid brass. Hence it is, that when Jehovah promises to make Cyrus master of Babylon, he speaks in this very remarkable and particularizing manner, "I will break in pieces before thee the gates of brass," Isa. xlvi. 2.

the tops of the loftiest trees!—they are now smitten by a dreadful blast. Their beauty is decayed, like a withered leaf. Their very being is gone, “like the chaff of the summer threshing floors, which the wind carrieth away, and its place is nowhere found.” Dan. ii. 35. What was once the favourite retreat of a queen, and the admiration of the whole world, is now a nest for poisonous reptiles, and a kenel for ravenous beasts.—The traveller, instead of expatiating with delight where this pensile paradise flourished, is struck with horror, keeps at a trembling distance, and, surveying the rueful spot, cries out, “Righteous art thou, O Lord, and true are thy judgments!”

Here stands an obelisk, maimed by the stroke of revolving years, like a mountain-oak shattered by the flaming bolt. Another, all unhinged and quite disjointed, seems to tremble before every blast that blows. There the pyramid,* firm as the solid rock, and stable, one would have thought, as the everlasting hills, wrenched from its mighty base, is tumbled headlong in enormous ruin, and has crushed many a structure by its fall.—See yonder the triumphal arch, which exhibited through its extensive and beautiful bend an advantageous view of the firmament. It was once the graceful memorial of some celebrated victory; it is now converted into a trophy of a very different kind. Just retaining two uneven, battered, ragged stumps, it serves to recognise the destructive ravages of time. Spires that pierced the clouds, and shot into the skies, are levelled with the trodden soil. On pinnacles, to which the strong-winged bird could hardly soar, the grovelling worm crawls, and the sordid snail leaves her slimy tract. Baths that contained the translucent wave, and were so often perfumed with odoriferous unguents, are choaked with filth: the grand colonnade that surrounded them is shivered to pieces, and the elevated dome that covered them is dashed to the ground. The public aqueducts, which conveyed cleanliness and health along their crystal currents, are degenerated into a stagnating lake, while croaking vermin swarm among the weeds, and noisome exhalations steam from the mire.

August and stately temples that seemed to affect the neighbourhood of heaven,† are sunk to the very dust.—Who can point the spot where the consecrated victim bled, or the sacred fire glowed? where the sceptered image lifted its majestic head, or the venerating crowds bowed the suppliant knee? Degrading are those splendid vanities, and cast (according to the denunciation of the sacred oracles) “to the bats and to the moles.” Isa. ii. 20. All is low; low as the spurious dignity of the idols they complimented; low “as the straw that is trodden down for the dunghill,” Isa. xxv. 10.

Sepulchres, the once venerable repositories of the dead, awful mansions destined to everlasting concealment, are cleft and rent asunder. They disclose the horrid secrets of the pit, and frightfully yawn upon the blasted day. Possibly some ravenous creature lurks within, that has already rifled the tomb of its hero, given the putrid bones a new grave, and waits only for the approach of night to repeat his funeral dirge in yells. Inscriptions, designed to perpetuate some illustrious character, or eternalize some heroic deed, are blended in the promiscuous mass. In vain would the prying antiquary search for a legible or consistent sentence; in vain attempt to find the memorable names of a Nebuchadnezzar or a Nimrod. These, though engraven on plates of brass, or cut in blocks of marble, are lost amidst the stupendous lumber, as prints on the unsteady sand are effaced when returning tides smooth the furrowed beach.

Here and there a straggling cypress rises, as it were, with funereal solemnity amidst the waste.‡ Somewhat like the black plumes nodding over the mournful hearse, they augment the sadness of the scene, and throw a deeper horror on all below. No human voice is heard, nor human face seen, amidst these desolated heaps; too dreary even for the roam of hoary hermit, or the cell of gloomy monk. Abandoned they are, totally abandoned, to the dominion of solitude, or else to the unmolested resort of shaggy monsters, and feathered hags, which stun the midnight hours; these with their importunate shrieks; those with their execrable howls.

See to what a despicable, what an abhorred state, the proudest monuments of earthly grandeur, and the most costly apparatus for earthly felicity, may be reduced!

very strong traces of that arrogant boast, “Let us build us a city and a tower, whose top may reach to heaven.” Gen. xi. 4.

* Alluding to that prodigious instance of profuseness, ostentation and idolatrous madness, “The golden image set up in the plain of Dura, whose height (that is the height of the statue and pedestal taken together) was threescore cubits.” Dan. iii. 1.

† Rauwolf, a German traveller, who passed that way in the year of our Lord 1571, says, “This country is so dry and barren, that it cannot be tilled, and so bare, that I should have doubted whether the potent Babylon did stand there, if I had not known it by several ancient and delicate antiquities, that are still standing hereabout in great desolation.”

* Strabo calls the temple of Belus a pyramid, lib. 15.

† A tower in the temple of Belus, and dedicated to his worship, was very high. It consisted of eight piles of building erected one above another. It arose to the elevation of six hundred feet perpendicular, and is thought, by the learned Bochart, to have been part of that superb work which was begun when the whole earth was of one language; but miscarried, or rather was providentially defeated, by the confusion of tongues. In this structure, there were doubtless

A pregnant and alarming proof, that, for lasting honour, or real happiness,

“They build too low, who build beneath the skies.”

Asp. I very much approve the choice of your subject. The ruins of Persepolis would have given us a view of magnificence in abasement: The ruins of Palmyra might have showed us elegance in the dust: But the ruins of Babylon display, at once, magnificence and elegance under an eclipse, Scripture and revelation in their glory.—The utter destruction of this city, which was absolutely unequalled in every instance of dignity, and seemingly invincible by any enemy, must certainly have been looked upon as the most improbable of events. Nevertheless, its utter destruction was decreed by Jehovah, and denounced by his prophet, several ages before the execution took place. The awful sentence was not only denounced, but recorded, and is still remaining, in the public archives of our religion.

Ther. Where is this sentence recorded, and remaining?

Asp. In the prophecy of Isaiah; and not only recorded, but in the most circumstantial manner, and with a minute detail of the horrible desolations. These are the words of the inspired writer: “Babylon, the glory of kingdoms, the beauty of the Chaldees’ excellency, shall be as when God overthrew Sodom and Gomorrah. It shall never be inhabited; neither shall it be dwelt in from generation to generation; neither shall the Arabian pitch tent there; neither shall the shepherds make their fold there. But wild beasts of the desert shall lie there, and their houses shall be full of doleful creatures; and owls shall dwell there, and satyrs shall dance there, and the wild beasts of the islands shall cry in their desolate houses, and dragons in their pleasant palaces.” Isa. xiii. 19—22.

In the two first sentences is comprised the most finished picture of prosperity and grandeur. “The glory of kingdoms;” beyond every other royal seat, spacious, ornamented, and wealthy; revered by many conquered and tributary dominions as their mistress and their sovereign. The beauty of the Chaldees’ excellency:” the Chaldeans, who excelled all the nations of the earth in riches, in splendour, and in power, even they gloried in this wonderful city. This was the highest honour of the most illustrious, and chief strength of the most victorious people: fairest, where all was conspicuously fair; noblest, where all was supereminently noble. Yet this distinguished, this crowning city, shall, at the blasting of the breath of Jehovah, be totally, totally destroyed, even “as when God overthrew Sodom and Gomorrah.”

In describing the overthrow, the prophet is equally admirable, and rises, by a most judicious gradation, into all the pomp of horror: q. d. “Now, indeed, it is thronged with citizens; but the hour is coming, when it shall be entirely depopulated, and not so much as a single inhabitant left. Lest you should think that, in process of time, it may be re-edified, and again abound with joyful multitudes, it shall never be inhabited more; no, never be dwelt in any more, from generation to generation, but shall continue a dismal waste through all succeeding ages: A waste so dismal, that none of the neighbouring shepherds shall make their fold, or find so much as an occasional shelter for their flocks, where kings, grandees, and crowds of affluent citizens, reposed themselves in profound tranquillity. Even the rude and roving Arabian shall not venture to pitch his tent, nor be able to procure for himself the poor accommodation of a night’s lodging, where millions of polite people basked in the sunshine of profuse prosperity. In short, it shall neither be habitable nor accessible but “a dwelling place for dragons, an astonishment and a hissing.” (Jer. li. 37.) What was once the golden city, (Isaiah xiv. 4.) and the metropolis of the world, shall be an everlasting scene of desolation and horror; a fearful monument of divine vengeance, and an awful admonition to human pride.”

All this is foretold in Scripture; and though to human appearance impossible, though to human apprehension incredible, was, in the appointed time, most minutely accomplished. The memorials and evidences of the accomplishment remain to this very day. They are so authentic, that the most inquisitive curiosity cannot doubt; and so incontestible, that the most bigoted incredulity will not deny. And should not this teach us to reverence the authority, to admire the wisdom, and confide in the promises, of that heavenly volume?

I know you are not fond of compliments, Theron. Therefore, instead of speaking my opinion of your son’s performance, I will endeavour to return your favour. You have entertained me with an account of the most memorable ruins extant in the material world. Let me present my friend with a picture of ruins no less remarkable, far more deplorable, and unspeakably interesting to us all. I shall give it in the colouring of a great master, whose works this very day I happened to be perusing.

The passage displays a doctrine of the utmost importance in the Christian scheme, and by one of the finest pieces of imagery to be met with in elegant writing. I think it may be looked upon as a practical improvement of Eugenio’s declamation. It pleased me so much that I transcribed it; and I make no apology for reading it, because I shall expect your thanks. Only let me hint, that it considers the human soul as originally a habitation of God through the Spirit, and then, speaking of its fallen condition, proceeds :

“ That he hath withdrawn himself, and left this his temple desolate, we have many sad and plain proofs before us. The stately ruins are visible to every eye, that bear in their front (yet extant) that doleful inscription—HERE GOD ONCE DWELT. Enough appears of the admirable frame and structure of the soul of man, to show the divine presence did sometime reside in it; more than enough of vicious deformity to proclaim he is now retired and gone. The lamps are extinct, the altar overturned; the light and love are now vanished, which made the one shine with so heavenly brightness, the other burn with so pious fervour. The golden candlestick is displaced, and thrown away as a useless thing, to make room for the throne of the prince of darkness. The sacred incense, which sent, rolling up in clouds, its rich perfumes, is exchanged for a poisonous, hellish vapour; and here is, ‘ instead of a sweet savour, a stench.’ The comely order of this house is turned all into confusion; the ‘ beauties of holiness’ into ‘ noisome impurities;’ the ‘ house of prayer to a den of thieves;’ and that of the worst and most horrid kind; for every lust is a thief, and every theft is sacrilege. Continual rapine and robbery is committed upon holy things. The noble powers which were designed and dedicated to divine contemplation and delight, are alienated to the service of the most despicable idols, and employed into the vilest intuitions and embraces, to behold and admire lying vanities; to indulge and cherish lust and wickedness.

“ There is not now a system, an entire table of coherent truths to be found, or a frame of holiness, but some shivered parcels. How many attempts have been made since that fearful fall and ruin of this fabric, to compose again the truths of so many several kinds into their distinct orders, and make up frames of science or useful knowledge! and, after so many ages, nothing is finished in any kind. Sometimes truths are misplaced, and what belongs to one kind is transferred to another, where it will not fitly match; sometimes falsehood inserted, which shatters or disturbs the whole frame. And what with much fruitless pains is done by one hand, is dashed in pieces by another; and it is the work of a following age to sweep away the fine-spun cobwebs of a former. And those truths which are of greatest use, are least regarded; their tendency and design are overlooked, or, they are loosened and torn off, that they cannot be wrought in, so as to take hold of the soul; but hover, as faint ineffectual notions, that signify nothing. Its very fundamental powers are shaken and disjointed, and their order towards one another confounded and broken: So that what is judged considerable, is not considered; what is recommended as eligible and lovely, is not loved and chosen. Yea, the truth which is after godliness, is not so much disbelieved, as hated, held in unrighteousness; and shines as too feeble a ‘light,’ in that malignant darkness, which ‘comprehends it not.’ You come amidst all this confusion, as into the ruined palace of some great prince, in which you see here the fragments of a noble pillar, there the shattered pieces of some curious imagery; and all lying neglected and useless amongst heaps of dirt.— He that invites you to take a view of the soul of man, gives you but such another prospect, and doth but say to you, ‘ Behold the desolation,’ all things rude and waste. So that, should there be any pretence to the divine presence, it might be said, ‘ If God be here, why is it thus? The faded glory, the darkness, the disorder, the impurity, the decayed state in all respects of this temple, too plainly show, ‘ The great inhabitant is gone.’ ”*

Ther. Your painter, I must own, is a master in his profession; and seems to have a peculiar talent for a night-piece.—But why, I beseech you, so much of his shades and solemnity? Has he no colours but the dark? no lineaments but the sour? Could he not allow us one bright tint, one smiling feature, when he was copying the noblest being in this sublunary world?—Is it for the honour of the great Creator to give such a deformed draught of his most finished workmanship?

Asp. It reflects no kind of dishonour upon the architect of Babylon, that its palaces are fallen, its edifices demolished, and its walls levelled with the ground. They might have been built with the exactest symmetry, and once embellished with every graceful ornament, notwithstanding the stroke of violence, or the sap of years, have now reduced them to heaps of rubbish. The human soul, when recent from the inspiration of the Almighty, was bright with knowledge, amiable with virtue, and, in every respect excellent. But how—to speak in the language of the mourning prophet, a language never more pertinent than on the present occasion—“ how is the gold become dim! how is the most fine gold changed!”

Ther. Man’s soul is rational and eternal; is the offspring of the Deity, and capable of resembling its Maker.

Asp. What Milton allows to the fallen

* See Mr. Howe’s treatise entitled The living temple.

archangel, I can readily allow to fallen man :

He had not lost
All his original brightness.

The grand and distinguishing faculties of the soul remain. Just as when a fountain is poisoned, the waters continue to flow ; but flow no longer with health, flow rather with death in the stream. These very faculties, unless renewed and regulated by the influence of religion, must be our present misery, and will prove our everlasting curse. "The soul," you say, "is rational, is eternal." And do not even the devils possess the powers of reason? Is not their existence also of an endless duration? Yet are they, of all creatures, the most execrable and the most miserable.

You call the human soul the offspring of the Deity ; and you call it properly. Must we not then adopt the prophet's exclamation, "How art thou fallen, O Lucifer, son of the morning!" (Isa. xiv. 12.) How art thou degenerated, O man, son of the Most High ! Thy glorious original serves only to set forth, with more glaring evidence, thy deplorable apostasy."

Capable, you add, of resembling its Maker. This, I acknowledge is a valuable prerogative : In this the infernal spirits have no share. But this capacity will always lie dormant, will never awaken into act, never be established in habit, unless Almighty grace intervene.

Ther. The most celebrated philosophers of antiquity frequently exhort their readers to follow nature as a certain guide to true excellence. Many eloquent writers of our own country enlarge upon the dignity of human nature, and from this topic derive very forcible arguments for a correspondent dignity both of sentiment and behaviour. Upon what can those principles of the ancient sages, and of our later moralists, be founded?

Asp. Indeed, Theron, I am at a loss to tell. If they have any foundation, it is merely imaginary ; not laid on truth, nor confirmed by experience. According to my apprehension, they invert the order of things ; they take that for a postulatum which ought to be ranked among the desiderata, and make an axiom of a mere figment.

Had man continued as he was created, to act according to nature and according to the law of God, would have been one and the same thing. For which reason we find no precepts of religion, no delineation of morality, given to Adam in paradise ; because religion and morality were engraven on his heart ; or rather, they resulted from the very bent and tendency of his perfect frame. But since the fall it is quite otherwise.

Ther. Have not many of the ancient worthies been living confutations of your opinion? wise philosophers, judicious lawgivers, and steady ministers of justice? their desires refined, their affections benevolent, their whole conduct upright.

Asp. I cannot forbear wondering, that you should instance in lawgivers and ministers of justice ; since the very institution of their office presupposes the depravity of mankind. Was human nature agitated by no irregular or vicious inclinations, the barrier of laws would be as needless in civil societies, as the vast banks of Holland are needless in our upland counties.

But this, you will say, is a digressive observation ;—your question requires a positive answer. And it is easy to answer—that the painting is beyond the life. If my author has been too free with the dark, my friend has been too lavish of the glittering colours. Those famous men might aim, perhaps, at the excellency you describe. Not one of them came up to the mark ; or, suppose they did, this would not invalidate my tenet.

Ther. This would not invalidate your tenet ! Then demonstration carries no conviction.

Asp. Pray, who is your greatest favourite among all the renowned persons of antiquity?

Ther. Socrates.—He stands at the head of the class ; and was, indisputably, the wisest and the best of the heathen world.

Asp. I think so too. Be pleased, however, to recollect the story of the physiognomist, who pretended to discover the disposition of the mind by the cast of the countenance. The professor of this occult science undertook, you know, to exercise his skill upon Socrates ; and pronounced him, after an examination of his features, lascivious, passionate and morose. This judgment, so extravagantly wide of the truth, was bringing a storm of ridicule and resentment upon the poor fortune-teller ; when the ingenuous philosopher interposed, and owned the description to be exactly true ; that such was his natural temper ; and if his conversation had been of a different turn, it was owing to the aids of philosophy. So that, even in your most finished character, there was no innate dignity. All was adventitious.

Ther. If corruption was derived unto all men, from their forefather Adam, methinks all should be equally corrupt. But this is contrary to known fact. Some we see naturally loving and lovely, gentle in their manners, and subject to no inordinate appetites.

Asp. Some persons may be of more composed, or, if you please, of less dissolute manners, than the generality of other people. Thanks to a better temperature of their constitution, or a more watchful care in their education. But show me the unregenerate man, who is subject to no inordinate appetites. One vile affection may check another, or a sense of decency may hold the curb upon all. But it is one thing to have the wild beast in the heart chained; another, to have him expelled, or the lion transformed into a lamb.

Ther. Have we not often observed heroic courage, and a generosity of spirit, where the education has been none of the strictest? To what can we ascribe these laudable qualities, but to the innate virtue and nobleness of the temper, working without any auxiliary succours?

Asp. Virtue, Theron, is a complete assemblage, not some disjointed shreds, of laudable qualities. Those you mention, if not accompanied with the whole circle of amiable accomplishments, are no more to be called virtue, than two or three scattered fragments of an edifice are to be honoured with the appellation of a house. How often are those very persons, with all their fortitude, slaves to ignoble pleasures, or in bondage to the basest lusts? A most infallible indication that they have no uniform generosity nor any real courage. Desire of fame may prompt to many such acts as dazzle the superficial eye, which yet are far, very far from genuine virtue.

Ther. Do you then attribute the Grecian politeness, and the high Roman spirit, all the gallant actions of their heroes and generals, to a desire of fame?

Asp. There is reason to suspect, that they derived their origin from some improper motive: And no motive was more artfully instilled, or more assiduously cherished, than the spirit of ambition. View their crowns, their statues, their triumphal solemnities; read their orators, their historians, their poets. The former were the school, the latter were the masters, to inculcate this grand lesson.

Let us consider the Romans a little more attentively; and not amidst the dregs of their community, but in their very best ages, when their republic subsisted, and their Scipios flourished. Many great and shining deeds were undoubtedly performed; but did they spring from a reverential regard to the Supreme Being, from obedience to his will or zeal for his honour?

If this principle should be thought too refined, did they proceed from a love to their fellow-creatures? In case neither of these motives* actuated their conduct, it can never be placed to the account of virtue.—Had benevolence been their leading principle, why such inhumanity to Carthage? why must that opulent city be laid in ashes, and her numerous citizens be put to the sword? Were they enemies to mankind, or a nuisance in the world? You well know, that they were only too industrious, and too powerful; by which means, they would be in a condition to eclipse the magnificence of the Roman name, and dispute the prize of sovereignty with the Roman state. For this crime—a crime in Ambition's eye absolutely inexcusable—even Cato's upright soul shall doom them to utter destruction, and Scipio's gentle hand shall execute the horrid decree.

Is this virtue? Does virtue ravage countries, from the mere wantonness of pride or lust of pre-eminence? Does virtue destroy millions of lives, only to aggrandize a particular people, or extend the dominion of some favourite empire? If this were virtue, Brutus thought too honourably of her character when he termed her an empty name. I am sure my Theron has juster notions of things. He need not be informed that true virtue, far from personating the rapacious harpy, acts as a father to others, as a father to all; and like him who is both its pattern and its author, "goes about doing good."

Ther. The most elegant came, if plunged into yonder basin while the waters are curled by the breeze, will appear both crooked and coarse. I cannot but think the accusers of human nature examine her state with a prejudiced understanding, which has the same perverse effect upon their judgment as those ruffled waves have upon the sight. Or else they contemplate her condition with a melancholy mind; which, like a jaundiced eye, gives every object a distempered aspect, darkens the cheerful, discolours the beautiful, and hangs even the sun in mourning.

Asp. Rather let this be the comparison to illustrate our point, view the meanest piece of earth through the prismatic glass, and it will appear, not beautiful only, but perfectly splendid. Remove the delusory medium, and all the sophisticated finery vanishes. The indigo, the orange, the violet are gone, and leave nothing to be seen, but a rude unornamented lump of clay. So, if we consider human nature according to the partial representations of self-love, or contemplate it in the flattering mirror of some popular writings, it may seem re-

* A zeal for the honour of God, and a concern for the good of our fellow-creatures, are the true sources of virtue. 1 Cor. x. 24, 31. When our actions flow from these principles, reason will put a query upon them, and revelation will expunge them from the list of virtues. They may be specious in themselves; they may be costly to the performer; they may even be serviceable to others; but can no more deserve the title of virtue, than the activity of our firemen, in extinguishing the flames on some insured house, can merit the name of charity.

gular, holy, excellent: But, if we behold it under the light, the unerring light of revelation, its fancied charms disappear; it stands clothed with deformity, and is a spectacle of commiseration, if not of horror.

Ther. What reason have you to father such a notion upon the sacred writings? The sacred writings inform us, that man was made "after the image of God." This, sure, could not be so dishonourable and depraved a pattern as your discourse would insinuate.

Asp. Far, very far from a dishonourable pattern! The image of God is the consummate standard of all perfection. In conformity to this admirable exemplar, our first parents were created; and in this admirable condition they continued, till, by transgression, they fell—fell from the most holy and happy state, into guilt, condemnation, and ruin. Therefore when this fatal catastrophe had taken place, the sacred historian varies his style, and with a remarkable peculiarity, as well as propriety of speech, says "Adam begat a son in his own* (not in the divine) likeness." That every reader may advert to this melancholy, but important truth, it is marked more strongly still, it is enforced by a very emphatical repetition: "After his own image," Moses adds (Gen. v. 3.); as contradistinguished to the image of God, mentioned in a preceding verse. Which expressions are evidently intended to denote the difference between the state in which Adam was created and Seth was begotten.

Ther. Pray let me have a succinct, but full account of this tragical story, since all your orthodox divines lay such a mighty stress upon the doctrine of the fall.

Asp. God, having formed the human body out of the ground, animated the structure with a living soul; and transcribed upon this soul the image of his blessed Self. All was light in the understanding, all was rectitude in the will, and nothing but harmony in the affections.—Man, thus endowed, was placed in the delightful garden of Eden, and furnished with every accommodation which was necessary to support his being, or desirable to gratify his senses. He was constituted lord of this lower creation; and, amidst numberless indulgences, received only one—easy—negative command, "not to eat of the tree of the knowledge of good and evil." From this he was to abstain, as a pledge of his subjection, and as an exercise of his obedience. Bliss and immortality were to be the reward of duty; misery and death the punishment of disobedience: "In the day thou eatest thereof, thou shalt surely die," (Gen. ii. 17.), was the sanction of the divine law.

How equitable! how gracious the terms! Yet neither the goodness of God could induce him to keep them, nor the authority of God deter him from breaking them. Unreasonably discontented, even with such advantageous circumstances, and presumptuously aspiring to be like the Most High, he hearkened to the suggestions of the evil spirit. In a word, he violated the precept, and incurred the penalty. God was just, and man was undone. He lost his uprightness,* became subject to mortality, and, as the nervous original expresses it, "died the death."

Ther. True, he became subject to many bodily infirmities, and to the necessity of final dissolution. But what has this sentence, or what have these sufferings to do with your notion of universal depravity in the mind? The death which the Almighty Legislator threatened, can be opposed only to the life which the Almighty Creator gave.

Asp. Be it so.—The Creator gave, and man possessed, a life incomparably more excellent than that which the pulse imparts, or the beasts enjoy. He possessed a divine life, which, according to the definition of the apostle, consisted "in knowledge, in righteousness, and true holiness." (Eph. iv. 24; Col. iii. 10.) This, which was the distinguishing glory, and the supreme felicity of his nature—this, alas! was extinct.

His understanding, originally enlightened with wisdom, was clouded and overwhelmed with ignorance.—His heart, once filled with religious veneration, and warmed with heavenly love, became alienated from God his Maker. His passions and appetites, instead of moving on in orderly array, according to the beautiful measures of truth and duty, grew mutinous, shook off the government of reason, and ran wild into the most lawless extravagancies.—In a word, the whole moral frame was unhinged, disjointed, broken.

Ther. What cause have you to suppose, that all this misery was either included in the threatening, or introduced by the fall?

Asp. The ignorance of fallen Adam was palpable: witness that absurd attempt to hide himself from the eye of Omniscience among the trees of the garden.—His aversion to the all-gracious God was equally plain; otherwise he would never have fled from his Maker, but rather have hasted,

* This is affirmed, not of Cain, but of Seth, the most excellent of Adam's children, and father of the holy seed.

* ———innocence, that as a veil
Had shadow'd them from knowing ill was done,
Just confidence, and native righteousness.
Milton, b. 9. l. 1054.

and on the wings of desire, into the place of the divine manifestation.

A strange variety of disorderly passions* were evidently predominant in his breast.—Pride, for he refuses to acknowledge his guilt, though he cannot but own the fact.—Ingratitude, for he obliquely upbraids the Creator with his gift, as though it had been a snare rather than a blessing: “The woman whom thou gavest me.”—Want of natural affection; for he endeavours to cast all the blame upon the weaker vessel, and to acquit his obnoxious self, by impeaching the wife of his bosom.—The female criminal acts the same unhumbléd part; neither takes shame to herself, nor gives glory to God, nor puts up a single petition for pardon.

As all these disasters ensued upon the breach of the commandment, they furnish us, I think, with the best key to open the meaning of the prohibitory sanction. They prove, beyond any argument, that spiritual death, and all its consequences, were comprehended in the extent of the threatening.

Ther. How could one act of disobedience produce such destructive effects? erase the fair image of the Godhead, and stamp the monster, stamp the very devil in its stead?—and so small an act of disobedience too!

Asp. The prohibition, if you please, was small, not so the transgression. It was committed against the clearest knowledge of duty, and the strongest obligations to obedience. It argued ingratitude for the richest favours, and unbelief of the most solemn declarations. It was an act of the most horrid presumption in the creature, and of the most impious rebellion against the Creator.

As to the smallness, or rather the gentle and benign import of the command, this aggravates beyond measure the crime of disobedience. Alluding to the words once addressed to the Syrian general, we may justly expostulate, “O thou Adam, if thy Lord had bid thee do some great thing, (2 Kings v. 13,) in submission to his high authority, and out of gratitude for his unspeakable goodness, oughtest thou not to have done it? How much more, when he says to thee—Freely eat of all except this single tree. Thousands, thousands of honours, privileges, and gifts be thine, only one acknowledgment of thy subjection mine; and that the easiest which thy heart can wish, or even thy fancy conceive.”

You ask, how could one act of disobedience produce such destructive effects?—I answer, the reality of the fact, in numberless instances of material nature, is plain to a demonstration, while the manner of operation remains an impenetrable secret. Every child perceives the former, Newton himself is at a loss for the latter. For which reason, I have always thought it better to believe what God has taught, than attempt to explain what God has concealed. Let us forego this curious, perhaps fruitless inquiry, and substitute a remark, which naturally arises from the subject, and may considerably edify our minds.

Ther. Edify! Is it possible to render this dishonourable and afflictive notion edifying? Can any generous fruit spring from such a penurious soil?

Asp. Sampson, I believe, had no expectation of finding any thing valuable in the relics of his slain lion; but, to his agreeable disappointment, “there was honey in the carcase.” (Judg. xiv. 8.) If our doctrine appear ghastly as the one, it may yield a benefit sweet as the other.

From hence we may learn, (what, when rightly learned, is more serviceable than all the sciences) the extreme malignity of sin. When volcanos open their tremendous jaws, and disgorge a fiery inundation, they confine their fury to a single territory. When famine lifts her mildew'd hand, and destroys the supports of animal life, she is content with ruining a kingdom or a nation. When war drenches his sword in blood, or the pestilence impregnates the air with poison, they also, even they observe some limits, and never make the whole compass of nature the scene of their ravages. But sin levelled its blow at the whole human race. Sin poured contagion, and spread destruction through all countries and all ages. One single act of sin brought confusion and a curse upon the material, and miseries, infinite millions of miseries on the rational world. How then should we fear this most pernicious of all evils! with what carefulness guard against its insidious allurements! with what resolution fly from its killing caresses!

Ther. I must observe, that you take for granted what remains to be proved. For, supposing your account true with regard to Adam, yet how does this affect his children? Why must all his posterity be contaminated because their forefather has play'd the prodigal? Such a heavy charge against the whole body of mankind will not be admitted without very cogent proofs.

* Milton, speaking of the unhappy pair, and describing the consequences of their fall, says,

—Nor only tears
Rain'd at their eyes; but high winds within Began to rise; high passions, anger, hate,
Mistrust, suspicion, discord, and shook sore
Their inward state of mind; calm region once,
And full of peace; now tossed and turbulent!
For, understanding rul'd not, and the will Heard not her lore! but in subjection now
To sensual appetite, who from beneath
Usurping over sovereign reason claim'd
Superior sway.—Book 9, l. 1121.

Asp. The proofs are cogent ; perhaps irrefragable.—Reason offers to turn evidence in the case. Reason, in concurrence with revelation, demands, “Who can bring a clean thing out of an unclean?” (Job. xiv. 4.) If the fountain be polluted, how can the streams be pure? and if the root is corrupt, it is impossible to conceive how the branches should be sound, or the fruit good.*

The scriptural testimonies are almost innumerable. They pour their evidence from every quarter, and constitute not two or three only, but a whole cloud of witnesses. “God made man upright,” says the royal preacher; the human nature, in its primitive state, was without any wrong bias; but at and ever since the first transgression, they have found out and followed many perverse inventions, (Ecc. vii. 29.)

Ther. I do not deny but multitudes of people, seduced by bad example, or betrayed by their own inadvertency, have departed from the rule of duty; have, as the wise man affirms, tried many foolish experiments to acquire happiness, and devised as many idle excuses for their folly. But this is no such irrefragable proof that they were originally bad: It only implies, that, not taking proper heed to their ways, they warped from their native uprightness. As yonder tulips, though perfectly beautiful at present, if not attended with the necessary cultivation, will degenerate into homely flowers, and at length be no better than tawdry weeds.

Asp. No, my friend. Iniquity is not an adventitious thing, caught from example, or contracted by carelessness. These may increase, but these do not occasion the moral malady. A sinful disposition is as early as our being, the very mould in which all our faculties are cast. David bears very express testimony to this humbling truth: “Behold!” (He sets his N. B. upon the passage. It is a sad but certain fact; such as should never depart from my memory, nor ever be omitted in my confessions: and is much to be regarded by every reader:) “I was shapen in wickedness, and in sin did my mother conceive me,” (Psal. li. 5.) As though he had said, “Alas, Lord, this crime, though extremely horrid, is but a little part of my guilt. I have not only sinned in practice, but I am totally and universally corrupt in my very nature.”

* Milton has anticipated Theron's objection; and in Adam's soliloquy, very judiciously solved it.

—Ah! why should all mankind,
For one man's fault thus guiltless be condemn'd,
If guiltless but from me what can proceed
But all corrupt, both body and mind depriv'd:
Not to do only, but to will the same
With me? How can they acquitted stand
In sight of God?—Book 10. l. 321.

This he acknowledges, not to extenuate his offence, but to lay open his excessive vileness. And indeed it is not possible to form a right judgment of ourselves, or to be duly humbled before God, unless we add the deprivation of our nature to the transgressions of our life. Just as it is impossible to discern what monstrous and voracious animals lie hid in the ocean, if we only glance an eye upon the surface of the waters.

Ther. This, you know, was written by the royal penitent under the pangs of severe remorse. Does not a sense of his enormous iniquity, together with the apprehension of divine wrath, make his hand shake, and lead him to aggravate features? Or, suppose it were true of the adulterous king, is it equally applicable to others, who have escaped such gross pollutions.

Asp. It is no exaggerating draught, but a faithful delineation, and exactly represents every child of Adam. It was written with the utmost deliberation; and therefore is introduced with that call for peculiar attention, “Behold!” And though David was scandalously criminal in his intrigue with the wife of Uriah, yet, the general tenor of his life was not only irreproachable, but exemplary. Who so zealous for the house of his God, or so devoted an admirer of the divine word? His heart was an altar, ever flaming with heavenly love; and his tongue a trumpet, to sound the praises of Jehovah through all generations. And if he had reason to make his abasing confession, who is the person that can think himself aggrieved by sharing in the imputation?

One of our most eminent martyrs,* when he heard of any malefactor condemned to suffer an ignominious death, used to lay his hand upon his breast and say, “the seeds of all those villainies which brought that unhappy wretch to the gibbet were sown here. And, if they have not sprung up into the same detestable deeds, unto divine grace, unto divine grace alone be all the glory!”

Ther. Your martyrs had honest hearts, but not always the clearest heads. I admire their zeal, and reverence their memories; but I can no more receive their opinion as an oracle, than I can be persuaded to worship their relics.

Asp. I have no intention to palm Popery on my friend, nor any desire to calumniate the human species. If it be disingenuous and sinful to asperse a particular character, how much more unjustifiable to traduce our nature in general.

My account, dark and disgusting as it is, stands confirmed by a higher authority than any private opinion. It is confirmed from an universal survey of mankind, taken by the eye of the Creator himself, and left upon record in the books of revelation. "The Lord looked down from heaven, upon the children of men, to see if there were any that did understand, and seek after God." What is the result of this grand inquiry? It must, without all peradventure, be infallibly true; because God's inspection is too keen to be eluded, and his judgment too impartial to be biassed. This is the report, made by the infinitely wise Observer—"They are all gone aside, they are all together become filthy* there is none that doeth good, no not one." (Psal. xiv. 2, 3.)

Ther. This, I apprehend, is the character of those besotted creatures, those most egregious of all fools, who say, "There is no God." To them the psalm relates, and to them the abandoned character is appropriated. They have it, if I may so speak, cum privilegio.

Asp. It is meant, rather of practical than of speculative Atheists, who say, not explicitly with their mouths, but implicitly in their hearts, "There is no God," who live as if there was no all-seeing Eye to take cognizance of their present conduct, no Supreme Judge to call them to a future reckoning. And I dare appeal to yourself, though perhaps the fondest of fathers, whether this instance of "foolishness is not bound up in the hearts of our children?"† nay, whether it be not natural to us all, both in youth and manhood, to forget our Creator?

In this case, Theron, there is no monopoly. Your right and mine are too strongly established by experience, and too clearly expressed in the preceding scripture, to admit of any controversy. If there were any that understood—they are all gone out of the way—There is none that doeth good—no not one. Could any conveyancer in Europe have contrived a form of words more fully to ascertain our unhappy title?

Ther. There may be some texts in scripture which seem to countenance your assertion, but these refer to the worst of men, in the worst of times. And can you, with any justice, ascribe the properties of a few reprobates to the whole species?

* The two original words are metaphorical expressions taken from wines that are become sour, and meats that are in a state of putrefaction. I believe it is impossible to find images more strongly expressive of a total depravity, and of the utmost degeneracy.

† Prov. xxii. 15. Let none think, that by foolishness the sacred writer means only those silly tricks, which discover a weakness of understanding in children. Solomon's fool is not the idiot, but the sinner; and the folly stigmatized throughout the Proverbs, denotes, not a failure in the intellectual, but in the religious and moral character.

The words in this passage are peculiarly forcible. Foolishness is in the heart, implanted in the very nature—sunk deep into the inmost faculties; and not only sunk deep, but adheres almost inseparably—is wrapt, tied, and bound, twines like the ivy, and is rooted like the oak.

Asp. This very passage, and others of a like import, are adopted by St. Paul, and applied both to Jews and Gentiles, with this professed design, "that every mouth may be stopped, and all the world may be found guilty before God." Rom. iii. 19. Which evinces, I should think, beyond all doubt, the universality of its extent.

If, to the universality, we add the antiquity of this fact, it will bear the two grand characteristics of truth. Far from being a novel opinion, it was received as a maxim, in the early age of Job: "What is man, that he should pretend to be clean? and he that is born of a woman, that he should presume to be righteous? Righteous before the infinitely just and holy One! Behold! he putteth no trust in his saints," though the most exalted of all intelligent beings. "Yea, the heavens," those brightest parts of the material creation, "are not clean in his sight. How much more abominable and filthy is man?"* who drinketh iniquity, Job xv. 14—16. though loathsome to God, and worse than poison to his own soul; yet drinketh it like water, without any hesitation or the least fear, with an eager and profuse delight.

This, you will observe, was alleged in a dispute, carried on with no small vehemency, yet is admitted on all hands as unexceptionably true. Be pleased also to take notice, that the charge is not confined to some very notorious sinners, but is laid against the whole body of mankind. Whatever figure they make, each in his own conceit; they are all described in the words of God, as beings insatiably athirst after evil, from objects that we cannot endure to behold, or cannot behold without abhorrence.† Such is man by nature! People must have eyes very different from mine, to discern any dignity in this draught.

Ther. As to innate dignity, we will let it pass. But this I must insist upon—and several writers of the first repute are on my side—That we enter the stage of life in a state of indifference either to good or evil; That the affections are like a balance nicely poised, and preponderating neither one way nor the other: The whole soul, like a sheet of fair paper, is equally susceptible of straight or crooked lines, and will as readily receive the amiable features of an angel, as the hideous deformity of a devil.

Asp. With regard to your first illustra-

* The immaculate purity of the blessed God, and the utter depravity of fallen men, are points of so great importance in the scriptural system of divinity, that they are inculcated no less than three times within the compass of this single book, and by much the same noble contrast of striking images: chap. iv. 17, 18; xv. 14—16; xxv. 4—6.

† The original words have two significations; one is used to signify that abominable practice which the Egyptians could not bear to see, Exod. viii. 25. 16. 5. Bib. ver. 26. Eng. Bib. The other denotes an object too squalid to be viewed without loathing.

tion, the simile I think, confutes the sentiment. For to be in suspense whether we shall love the Lord our God, the giver of all good and the source of all perfection, this surely must be condemned as an irreligious temper.—This is a criminal halting between God and Baal; a neutrality, which is no better than hostility.

I fear the writers you mention pay but little deference to the inspired volume. Our escutcheon is very differently blazoned in that office of spiritual heraldry. "A transgressor from the womb,"* is one of our hereditary titles. Transgressors we are by strong internal propensity, even before we transgress in outward act.

Observe the young hawthorn plants, which have unfolded their green leaves, in yonder nursery, but have scarce learned to spread the gay blossom. Is there in those an equal aptitude to produce the luscious juicy grape, or their own coarse and husky berry? By no means. They will (unless grafted with some generous cyon) certainly, universally, constantly bear the same harsh fruit with their parent tree: So certainly will the human mind, if not renewed by the spirit of Christ, branch out into ungodly tempers, and bring forth wicked practices.

Ther. The nobleman mentioned by Xenophon,† when overcome by an alluring temptation, devised, for his excuse, the notion of two souls, one that inclined him to vice, another that prompted him to virtue. This was a moderate caricature,‡ compared with my friend's. He will allow nothing regular or graceful in the human heart. You have metamorphosed the master-piece of the creation into such a deformed object, as may justly render him a terror to himself. Can there be a grosser libel upon the Creator, or a greater discouragement to our fellow-creatures?

Asp. If this be a distorted piece, what will you call the following description? "God saw that the wickedness of man was great upon the earth; and that every imagination of the thoughts of his heart was only evil continually." Gen. vi. 5. This, perhaps, may be reckoned a more monstrous drawing still: Yet it came from that hand which painted the canopy of the skies, and touched all the pictures of nature into such inimitable perfection.

Pray let us examine the most distinguish-

* Isa. xlvi. 8. A truth so apparent and undeniable, that Seneca could not but discern it, though he was an unenlightened heathen; could not but acknowledge it, though he was one of the proud Stoic sect. "Hac conditione nati sumus, animalia obnoxia non paucioribus animi quam corporis morbis." De Ira, lib. 2. c. 9.

† Cyropæd. lib. 6.

‡ A term used by the Italian painters, to signify a resemblance horrid or ridiculous.

ing features in this draught. Not barely the works of his hand, or the words of his tongue, but the "imagination of his heart," are evil. The contagion has spread itself through the inner man. It has tainted the seat of his principles, and the source of his actions.* Is there not, you will say, some mixture of good? No, they are only evil: There is no hopeful tendency: Not so much as a little leaven of piety, that may have a chance to diffuse itself, and meliorate the whole lump. But are there no lucid intervals? No happy moments, when virtue gains the ascendancy? None; he is only evil continually. The usurpation of sin is total, and its tyranny perpetual.

What I have advanced, therefore, is no libel upon the Creator's benignity; because it is the very echo of his own determination. Neither is it so properly discouraging, as humbling and alarming to our fellow-creatures: Humbling, to make us sensible of our ruin; alarming, to make us desirous of a recovery.

Ther. Is not the description which you have produced peculiar to the men of that wicked generation, whose guilt was as unparalleled as their punishment?

Asp. It is applicable both to them and their successors. The wisdom of God repeats the charge, and fixes it upon the race which survived the flood.† The depravity of human nature continued, nor could the waters of an universal deluge purge it away. So deep, alas! is the stain, and so incorrigible the virulence of original corruption, that it will yield to nothing; to nothing will it yield, but to the "washing of regeneration, and renewing of the Holy Ghost." Tit. iii. 5. Till this takes place, every heart of man must wear the prophet's stigmatizing motto, "Deceitful above all things, and desperately wicked."

Ther. This passage, I am informed, is not rightly translated, especially in the last expression. The Hebrew original does not bear so hard upon the human character as the English version.

Asp. You allow then that the heart is deceitful. And of this we have a glaring

* The original is very nice in its structure, and no less emphatical in its meaning. The heart, or grand principle—the thoughts of the heart, or the various actings of that principle—the imagination of the thoughts, or the produce and result of those actings; namely, desires and affections, counsels and purposes; Not one, a few only, or the greatest part, but all these are evil.

† Gen. viii. 21. Where, I think, the particle is used in the adversative, not the casual signification; and should be rendered though, rather than for—Where it seems likewise, that the forbearance of the righteous God is ascribed to the great atonement; typified by Noah's burnt-offerings, and expressed by St. Paul in his epistle to the Ephesians; who probably alludes to this passage, "The Lord smelled a sweet savour, and the Lord said in his heart, I will not again curse the earth any more for man's sake, though the imagination of man's heart be evil from his youth, Eph. v. 2.

proof in the conduct of Hazael. He thought it impossible that he should ever perpetrate such horrid barbarities as the prophet foresaw. "Is thy servant a dog, that he should do this great thing?" 2 Kings viii. 13. Yes, Hazael; however thou mayest imagine thyself gentle as a lamb, thou art fierce as a dog, and savage as a tiger: Which was most terribly demonstrated by the event.

Suppose we translate the other word somewhat more accurately, the little alteration will be of less service to your cause. Instead of "desperately wicked," you may, if you please, read, "deplorably disordered," Jer. xvii. 3. This is the exact import of the phrase. It is a metaphor derived from a very distempered body, in which the whole head is sick, and the whole heart faint: "From the crown of whose head to the sole of whose feet," there is nothing but consuming disease and enfeebling languors.* The rules of civility may set a specious varnish on the conversation, but until grace, sanctifying grace, administers the remedy, the most civilized heart will be like the pale emaciated cheek, that is poorly enlivened with paint.

Ther. What say the writers of the New Testament? Is not their way of thinking more liberal and benign? If human nature wore so hideous an aspect under the legal dispensation, since the coming of our Lord, and the publishing of his gospel, one may expect an improved and more pleasing face of things.

Asp. Human nature, in every period of time, and under every dispensation of religion, is still the same. It was the Spirit of Christ who indited the Old Testament; and he cannot vary from himself in the declarations of the New.

I am very much inclined to believe that all the bodily diseases which our divine Physician healed, during his abode on earth, were so many emblematical representations of spiritual disorders, which, like certain family distempers, may be said to run in the blood of all mankind. Will you give me leave, Theron, to explain myself? I do not like to engross the discourse. Yet I would willingly enlarge upon this subject.

Ther. By all means. The laws of argument, separate from the indulgences of friendship, give you a warrant to urge whatever may support your cause. Besides, I will be glad to hear your sentiments upon a point so curious.

Asp. The poor leper, covered with noisome sores, is the very picture of a polluted sinner. Was the one, for his contagious impurities, separated from the society of his fellow-citizens? So shall the other, for his abominable uncleanness, be banished from the beatific presence, unless he be cleansed by the blood, and justified by the righteousness of Jesus.

You pity the condition of that unhappy creature who was born blind. His eyes rolled, but rolled in vain, to find the dawning ray. Such is the benighted state of the human mind, till Almighty goodness command the scales of ignorance to fall off, and pour heavenly day through all the intellectual faculties. Then, and not till then, we begin to know the holiness, the justice, the adorable excellencies of God. We see the sublime purity of his law, and the extreme depravity of our own hearts. We are brought acquainted with the transcendent glories of our Redeemer's person, and apprehend that most comfortable mystery of his substitution in our stead. We discern the ineffable perfection of his merits, and the divinely rich freeness of his grace.* Truths incomparably more delightful to the soul, than all the delectable scenes of creation are to the sight.

The paralytic's enervated limbs too truly represent the impotence of our nature. Was he unable to grind at a mill, to run in a race, or to turn himself on his bed? So unable are we to "fight the good fight of faith," to exercise the graces of Christianity, or even to turn ourselves unto God. Do not you, my friend, experience something of this inability? For my part, I must lay my hand on my breast, and daily, hourly confess, "The palsy is here. Though not altogether dead in sin, (blessed be Christ Jesus, and his quickening Spirit!) yet how languid is my zeal, how enfeebled my industry, in the great affair of everlasting salvation!—I would fain believe, and with a full assurance of faith, the promises of the unchangeable Jehovah. But how often do I stagger through unbelief!—I would fain love, and with the warmest gratitude, my ever-merciful and most beneficent God. But, oh! what coldness benumbs my affections! I wish to be humble in every thought, heavenly in all my desires, and wholly resigned to the divine will. But, alas! my sufficiency for these things is like the flaccid sinew, or the withered arm."

It would be endless to particularize all the maladies, which were emblems of our misery, and the triumphs of our Lord's power. Let me only remark, that their bodies were afflicted with a single disorder, our souls labour under a complication of

* Isa. i. 6. Agreeable to this doctrine, and consonant to this metaphor, is the confession of our Liturgy, "There is no health in us."

* This, and the preceding particulars, are lessons of the last importance in the Christian school. The knowledge of them deserves to be most solicitously sought, both by attentive contemplation, and by earnest prayer. For to know them is to be truly wretched; to be influenced by them, is to be substantially happy.

evils. They felt their affliction, and were desirous, importunately desirous of relief. We are, till awakened from above, insensible of our calamitous case. We add, to all our other indispositions, a stupifying lethargy, or an extravagant delirium.

Ther. Such allegorical expositions of Scripture are pretty enough; but, I presume, you yourself cannot reckon them demonstrative. For my own part, I must appeal from the surmises of fancy to the verdict of reason.

Asp. I cannot think that the allegorical sense, when soberly introduced, is unworthy of our regard, or without its weight. However, I have no design to preclude your appeal. Will the avowed, will the reiterated decision of an apostle, satisfy my friend, and be admitted as the verdict of reason? St. Paul has declared of himself, "In me, that is, in my flesh," or unrenewed nature, "dwelleth no good," (Rom. vii. 18,) no good temper, not so much as any good desire. Elsewhere he affirms, that the "carnal mind," or unregenerate soul, "is not subject to the law of God," nay, is an enemy, or rather enmity itself. (Rom. viii. 7.) Against what?—Against sin? That were a noble antipathy.—Against the world? That were a laudable disaffection.—No! but against God and his law. Amazing perverseness! to be enmity against God, who is boundless benignity and consummate goodness; enmity against his law, which is the transcript of his amiable perfections, and the faultless model of all virtue.

Ther. This, I suppose, is the character of Saul the Pharisee, not of Paul the apostle; descriptive of his condition when he was "a blasphemer, a persecutor, and injurious."

Asp. It relates not to himself alone, but is applicable to all who continue in a state of nature. The blessed author of our being, speaking of mankind in general, says, that "he is even flesh," mere flesh, altogether flesh;* his very soul and all its powers are wholly enslaved to fleshly appetites. The beneficent Restorer of our happiness pronounces the same sentence in the very same words: "That which is born of the flesh, is flesh." (John iii. 6.) The faculties which men receive by their natural birth have a carnal bias, incline to nothing but sordid pleasures and ignoble pursuits. Our Saviour reinculcates the admonition, and illustrates it by a very remarkable allusion. You cannot forget his answer to a procrastinating disciple, "Let the dead bury their dead," (Matt. viii. 22,) intimating, that as many as are un sanctified by the Holy Ghost, though possessed of an animal, are destitute of the divine life; are no more fit for the kingdom of heaven, for its converse or its joys, than a pale corpse in the coffin, or dry bones in the charnel-house, are qualified to transact any secular business.

St. Paul sets the seal of heaven to this momentous truth, in various passages of his epistles. From a multitude let me select one, and recommend it to your serious consideration: "You that were sometime alienated, and enemies." The Colossians, and all mankind, were alienated from the living God; had no true knowledge of him; and, what is worse, had no sincere desire after him. Nay, they were not only strangers, but enemies; in a state of hostility to his holy nature and heavenly will. What can express a greater degeneracy? Nothing, unless it be the following clause: "By a mind intent upon wicked works; a mind, not only averse to all good, but passionately prone to all evil.

Ther. A few picked passages, of a figurative import, and artfully clogged by some dexterous interpretation, may seem to support your cause.

Asp. Ah! Theron, there is no need to use slight of hand. He that runs may read this doctrine in the sacred authors. It is interwoven with the whole series of their historical, and makes a professed part of their practical writings.

What is more common with the inspired penmen, than to express a profligate course of life by "following our own imaginations, and walking in our own ways?" When immorality and licentiousness were predominant in Israel, knew no restraints, and kept no bounds, how does the unerring historian describe this horrible state of things? "Every one did that which was right in his own eyes."† Nothing can more strongly imply the extreme depravity of mankind than such a phraseology, which makes it one and the same thing to pursue our natural inclinations, and to act the abandoned sinner.

* Gen. vi. 3. The word flesh, by which the all-wise Creator characterises man, signifies, in the sacred writings, whatever is dishonourable in itself, provoking to God, or introductory to the ruin of man. The works of the flesh are a compendium of all iniquity. Gal. v. 19—21. To walk after the flesh, is the very reverse of walking in the Spirit, diametrically opposite to the divine law and true holiness. Rom. viii. 4. To be carnally minded, or to have the influence, the savour, the relish of the flesh (φρονημα σαρκος) predominant in our minds, is the spiritual death of the soul, and a presage of eternal death, both in body and soul. Rom. viii. 6.

* Col. i. 21. Τη διανοια εν τοις σελτοις τοις πνευματις "mente, malis operibus intenta." An eminent critic would thus point, and thus translate the words; and assigns, for his alteration, the following reason; "Mens enim dicitur esse in eam quam semper cogitat, ad quam cupidine fertur et inclinatur." DAVENANT in loc. Let the words be pointed and translated, either in this or the received manner, they speak the language, and confirm the sentiments of this whole Dialogue.

† Judg. xviii. 6.—See also Psalm lxxxi. 12. Eccl. xi. 9. Acts xiv. 16.

St. Jude cannot write a few lines but he must touch upon this subject, must teach this humbling lesson: "Sensual," he says, "not having the spirit," (Jude 19.) According to his estimate, not to be actuated by the power of especial grace, is to remain under the dominion of sensuality. If we may credit this servant of Christ, every man, while unrenewed by the divine Spirit, is governed by flesh and sense. Can any man then pretend to be originally free from the influence of corruption?

St. Paul exempts not himself, no, nor any of the highest saints, from the opprobrious charge: "We all walked according to the desires of the flesh, and of the mind."—Which desires in us, as well as in the idolatrous heathens, were base, sordid, and contaminating. Inasmuch that we who are Jews by birth, who are sons of God by our new birth, even we were "by nature the children of wrath." (Eph. ii. 3.) And if liable to wrath, then doubtless subject to depravity, and chargeable with sin.

Ther. What says St. James? You have suppressed, and I had almost forgot his testimony, though it is so very pertinent to my purpose, and so very explicit in my favour: "Men, who are made after the similitude of God." The similitude of God signifies, in the sacred books, those moral endowments which distinguish the possessor both from the brute and the devil. And if men are made after this image, if they are created with these endowments, where is your doctrine of original sin?

Asp. I began to flatter myself that your objections were exhausted. But since I am mistaken in this particular, surely it must be as great a mistake to imagine that our apostle would maintain an opinion so repugnant to the afore-mentioned texts, and so contrary to universal observation. Do not you perceive the very reverse true with regard to your own children? Why do you address them with such tender entreaties, such warm exhortations, such repeated arguments? Why do you allure them to duty by promises, and deter them from transgression by threatenings? Is all this regimen, all this discipline, necessary for creatures that bear the holy image of God?

They "made after the similitude of God?" Then they have no need of the renewing influences of the Holy Ghost, in case they live; and no need of the atonement of Christ's blood, in case they die. Would James, the Lord's brother, assert such an egregious error, as not only opposes a single article, but undermines the whole constitution of Christianity? sets aside the sanctification of the divine Spirit, and the propitiation of the Redeemer's death?

Impossible for him to assert! Impossible, I should think, for us to suppose!

St. James speaks of a fact that is past; speaks of men collectively as they were all included in their first parent. The passage, I apprehend, should be translated, not men that "are," but men that "were" created, &c. The scripture considers Adam as the common parent of us all; nay more, considers us all as existing in our great progenitor; which is so far from overthrowing, that it establishes the point in debate. For if we were all created after the similitude of God, in and with Adam; it must follow, that we all fell from our conformity to God in and with Adam. And if so—let me for once retort my friend's interrogatory,—Where is not original sin?

I am very sure it runs through our Liturgy; is an essential part of our Articles; and most strongly delineated in our Homilies. Shall I produce some of those testimonies, which are as clear as they are copious?

Ther. No more of your testimonies, good Aspasio. Inform me rather what advantages can accrue from your inculcating, or my adopting, such a doctrine. Suppose it were undeniably true, disagreeable truths, like disagreeable objects, should be consigned over to obscurity, not obtruded upon our view. On such an occasion, the reply of Themistocles should be mine. One of the literati of Greece offered to communicate an elaborate and curious invention, by means of which his memory should be so wonderfully strengthened, as to retain whatever he read or heard. "My friend," replied the hero, "you quite mistake the way to serve me. I want to learn the art not of remembering, but of forgetting."

Asp. If to forget our disease, were a likely method to restore our health, I should readily concur in your hero's way of thinking. As this will hardly be allowed, I cannot but judge it more advisable to remember our disease, that we may inquire after a remedy.

Ther. Where is this remedy to be had?

Asp. Not on earth, but from heaven. The schools of science cannot discover it. The courts of kings are unable to procure it. The college of physicians know not how to prescribe it. But the gospel of our salvation prescribes, prepares and dispenses it. The language of Christ in his holy word is, "I will bring her health and cure,"

* Jam. iii. 7. That this is the precise signification of the participle γὰρ ὄντων; may be gathered from 1 Tim. v. 9. where γὰρ ὄντων is translated having been; and must necessarily refer, not to the present, but to the past condition of the widow.

(Jer. xxxiii. 6.) And the beginning of our cure is, to be sensible of our disorder.

Hence we are taught to be humble. To review the catalogue of our actual transgressions, is a mortifying employ. But that which lays the soul in the lowest abasement, is the conviction of inbred iniquity. This strikes at the root of human vanity, and cuts asunder the very sinews of self-conceit. Blindness in the understanding, impotency in the will, disorder in the affections,—these are not visitants, but inhabitants; * congenial with our frame, and ingrained in our constitution. How then, O! how can we be vain of our moral beauty, who have an hereditary defilement cleaving to all our faculties? Surely this must banish the Pharisee from our breast, and inspire us with the sentiments of that sincere penitent, "Behold, I am vile! (Job. xl. 4.); must teach us the language of the abashed leper, "Unclean! unclean!" (Lev. xiii. 45.)

Ther. I should think it would make us melancholy rather than humble; serve no other purpose than to introduce an afflictive sense of extreme wretchedness.

Asp. Did we intend to rest here, your apprehensions would be just; but we urge the doctrine of original corruption as a preparative for the Redemption of Christ.

It is observable, that very few applied to the blessed Jesus in the days of his flesh but the sons and daughters of affliction. The levee of that Prince of Peace was crowded by the lame, the blind, the diseased. These being sensible of distress, and longing for relief, fell as humble supplicants at his feet, while others, who were firm in their health, and gay in their spirits, rejected him with contemptuous scorn. When we perceive "the plague of our heart," and feel those worse than ulcerous sores which overspread our nature, we also shall ardently seek to "the Lord our healer." When we find ourselves subject to the curse of the law, in bondage to the tyranny of Satan, and liable to everlasting damnation, then the divine Physician, and the divine Redeemer will be precious indeed: whereas, if we remain insensible of our misery, the gospel, which is saving health to the contrite soul, will be an unaffected story to our ears: We may hear it, we may read it, as an amusing narrative; but shall not receive it as a sovereign remedy.

Ther. Not receive the gospel, Aspasio! I hardly understand what you mean. I often study the gospel; I believe it to be a divine revelation, and endeavour to follow its directions. I look upon it as containing the most refined system of morality; as enforcing every virtue, by the strongest motives, and recommending all by the most perfect example.

Asp. To which you should add—as revealing that great Mediator, who has fulfilled all righteousness, to effect our justification; who has also the fulness of the Spirit, to accomplish our regeneration. Otherwise, what you mention is infinitely short of the gospel. It brings no glad tidings to fallen creatures. It administers no succour to ruined sinners. It is like writing a copy for the blind, or setting a task to the disabled; which would rather be an insult on their impotence, than a relief of their distress.

The first particular I wave at present. Only let me ask your opinion of the last; which is a grand doctrine, and a very distinguishing privilege of the gospel: I mean the doctrine and the privilege of spiritual regeneration; exclusive of which, all your endeavours to possess virtue, and practise morality, will be no better than endeavours to fly without wings, or to run without feet.

While unimpressed with a sense of our original depravity, we shall probably sit down contented with some superficial reformation, and not aspire after a renewal of the heart. Civility will pass for sanctity, and a temperate disposition for a gracious habit. Why is the new birth, why are all the saving operations of the blessed Spirit, disregarded by some, derided by others? Because these persons are insensible of their utter inability to all good and of their abject slavery to all evil. Therefore they see no reason for this divine agency, or for that universal change.

You also, my dear friend, while unacquainted with your natural corruption, cannot apprehend either the reasonableness or the necessity of being "renewed in the spirit of your mind," (Eph. iv. 23.) But when experience has taught you the former, you will want no arguments to convince you of the latter. Can creatures who are blind in their understandings, discern the things which belong to their eternal peace? Can creatures who are dead in sin, exercise the graces or discharge the duties of a Christian life? Can creatures whose hearts are enmity against God, either delight to do his will here, or be meet for his beatific presence hereafter?

Under the influence of such convictions, that new birth which the gospel of Christ promises, which the Spirit of God produces, will appear as necessary for your state, and be as welcome to your soul, as these gentle dews are necessary for the languishing herbs, and welcome to the thirsty soil.

Ther. The dews, though refreshing to the flowers, may be too chilly for our constitutions. And see! the star of evening,

* Called therefore $\eta \sigma \iota \chi \alpha \sigma \tau \alpha \epsilon \nu \epsilon \mu \sigma \iota \alpha \mu \alpha \rho \tau \iota \alpha$, "sin that dwelleth in me," Rom. vii. 17 by proclaiming the approach of night, has given us a warning to quit our labour. Some other time we must resume this inquiry; for I am by no means satisfied that your theory agrees with experience.

Asp. I fear I have already kept you out too long. Let me just observe as we go in, that the doctrine, however disagreeable in itself, is conducted to an advantageous issue. It is productive of a much more substantial consolation, than history assigns to the great but exiled Marius. When he fled with his ruined circumstances, to linger out the poor remains of life among the ruins of Carthage, what was his chief support? "Contemplating," says the historian, "that famous city in the dust, he was the less afflicted with his own downfall."

We have not been put off with such cold comforts, such negative benefits. The belief of original sin has a tendency to make us humble, to show us our need of Christ, to create in us a hunger and thirst after the renewing influences of his Spirit, and the justifying merit of his righteousness. So that it must be owing to our own perverseness, or our own negligence, if we do not levy a tax upon our loss, and rise even by our fall.

DIALOGUE XII.

THE SUN was fiercely bright, and the sky without a cloud. Not a breath fanned the woods, nor a gale curled the stream. The fields, exposed to all the fiery beams, were like a glowing hearth. The little birds, overcome by the potent influence, lost, for a while, their tuneful notes. Nothing was heard in the garden but the drowsy hum of bees, and the moan-like buzz of winged insects. All nature seemed to languish: The flourishing meads looked sickly: the gayest blossoms began to fade; the sprightliest animals, if not reposed under some cooling shelter, panted for breath, and hung their drooping heads, amidst the all-surrounding blaze and the unsufferable heat. Aspasio disappeared ever since dinner, and none could tell whither he was gone. Theron, as soon as the tea equipage was removed, took his way to the wood. Desirous of the thickest shade, he hastened to the centre. A serpentine walk composed the avenue; which, after several windings, delivered him into a large circular area, not covered with a Grecian or Roman temple, unmeaning imitation of pagan idolatry, but surrounded with aged and princely oaks; the coalition of whose branches threw over the grassy plat a majestic, rural dome, and their unpierced foliage "imbrowned the noontide hours,"

In the midst, and elevated on a square base, was a statue representing the venerable Elijah on his bended knees, with hands stretched out, and eyes lifted up to heaven. His attitude, his air, his every feature, were a most lively comment on those strong energetic expressions of scripture, "take hold on God," (Isa. lxiv. 7.) "Wrestle with the Almighty;* Pour out your hearts before him." (Psalms lxii. 8.) On one side of the pedestal were engraven the priests of Baal, in frantic emotions calling upon their senseless deity, and gashing themselves with unavailing wounds. On the other was exhibited, in basso-relievo, the adoring Tishbite's altar; his victim burning with fire from the Lord, even while the water ran from every limb, and overflowed the trench below.

A remote cascade tumbled from a craggy rock. The stream, after having wasted its silver foam in a winding progress, straggled into this grand arbour. Here it just appeared gliding down a gentle slope, with a flaunting air, and a prattling noise. Impressed, as it were, with the unexpected solemnity of the scene, it seemed to check its wanton waves, and turned aside into a more sequestered path. As some heedless trifler, who bolts unawares into the royal presence, stands struck with reverence and awe, or retires with precipitance and confusion.

The deep gloom, shedding a kind of night even while the sun glared in the sky; not a whisper stirring among so many millions of leaves; and all their warbling natives hushed in silence,—the sonorous toll of the distant cascade, and the tinkling chime of the nearer rill,—the profound adoration, and fervent devotion, which lived in the lineaments of the impassioned stone: all these circumstances rendered the place prodigiously august and striking. Not much unlike the ancient oratories, where holy people retired from the giddy ring, and the bustling crowd, to ennoble their minds, with sublime contemplation, where they bid a temporary adieu to the tumultuous world, its gay impertinence and solemn dullness, in order to maintain a more uninterrupted communion with that mighty Being, who "sitteth upon the circle of the earth, and the inhabitants thereof are as grasshoppers before him.†

* Col. iv. 12. Ἀγωνίζομαι ἐν ταῖς πρῶσι θεοῦ.

† Isa. xl. 22. What a noble image is here, and what an exquisitely fine contrast! God, the great God, sitteth on those lofty and immense heavens, which, at an inconceivable distance, surround this pensive globe. From that most sublime and magnificent throne, he looks down upon the inhabitants of the earth, who, in all their pomp and splendour, amidst all their admired works and boasted acquisitions, are mean and impotent in his sight,—mean and impotent as the poor insects which wander over the parched heath for sustenance,—which spend all the day in idle insignificant chirpings; and at night take up their contemptible habitation on a blade of grass.

Welcome Theron was the shady bower; welcome the cool aspect and the musical flow of the water; but more welcome than all was the sight of his friend, who lay reclined at the foot of an oak, with a book half open in his hand, and his eye fixed upon the statue.

Ther. I know not, Aspasio, whether I must make an apology for breaking in upon your retirement; or call you to an account, for depriving the ladies of your company at the tea-table.

Asp. Indeed, Theron, I have been so much delighted with the place, with the company in my hand, and the noble object before me, that I scarce observed how the time stole away. And I flatter myself, if you will take a seat by my side, and share my entertainment, you will be more inclined to excuse than to aggravate my fault.

Ther. Is Tully then (for I observe his name on the volume) your companion? And can such a devoted admirer of the Bible be so highly charmed with a Heathen classic? St. Augustine somewhere declares, that though passionately fond, before his conversion, of Tully's writings, yet after that memorable change he could no longer relish those admired compositions; because they were not sweetened, as he expresses himself, with the mellifluous name of Jesus.

Asp. I am far from pretending to such an exalted pitch of devotion as that seraphic father attained. I can spend a vacant minute on the delicate odes of Horace, and taste a refined entertainment in Virgil's beautiful poem. But when I hear a sermon, or peruse a religious treatise, which borrows neither dignity nor charms from that amiable and glorious name, I own myself extremely disappointed. Without the offices, the merits or the grace of Christ, the sermon and the treatise appear as defective, as a body that is neither adorned with the head nor enlivened with the heart.

Ther. I suppose then you cultivate an acquaintance with the Grecian and Roman authors, in order to improve your taste, and polish your style.

Asp. These, and, I am apt to think, more considerable advantages than these, may be derived from an occasional application to their works. They may serve as so many shades, to set off with heightened lustre the beauty and glory of the sacred oracles.

While I peruse Plato's ornamented page, or listen to Cicero's flowing periods, I am somewhat like the person who amuses himself in a gallery of painted flowers. He is pleased with the curious creation of the pencil; but finds none of that delicious fragrance, none of those breathing sweets, which meet him in the garden, and regale his sense, from the blooming parterre. So here are brilliant sentiments and a florid diction; delicate touches of wit, and bold strokes of description: But no discovery of Christ Jesus, no displays of his ineffable love, no overtures of reconciliation with the blessed God; nothing to yield us solid comfort in our present state, or any joyful expectations with regard to the approaching eternity.

Besides, when I converse with those celebrated geniuses of antiquity, who were at once the most erroneous and the most judicious—the most judicious in their taste of polite literature the most erroneous in their apprehensions of invisible things—they show me, what they never intended, the inexpressible need of revelation. They teach me to set a higher value on that inestimable gift. I bless the distinguishing goodness of providence, which has cast my lot,* not at Athens, but in Emmanuel's land. I say, with wonder and gratitude, "Why did not my existence commence in those eras of religious dotage? Why was not my portion confined to those regions of barbarism and delusion? Why am not I burning incense to idols, paying senseless adoration to sculptured stone, or worshipping, with detestable ceremonies, a set of lascivious, debauched, and scandalous deities?"—Surely, Theron, from every perusal of those volumes, attended with such a reflection, we shall see the utmost reason to magnify "the tender mercies of our God; whereby the day-spring from on high hath visited us;" (Luke i. 78.) and brought us out of darkness into the marvellous light of the gospel.

Permit me to mention another benefit which may result from a correspondence with those masterly writers. The streams may lead us to the inexhaustible fountain; lead us to admire the only wise God our Saviour, who has given such a shining vein of ingenuity to his rational creatures. As I read their works, and am charmed with their beauties, I would frequently reflect—"If the essays of a finite mind, and the compositions of a mortal pen, yield such high satisfaction, what rapturous, what unknown delight must arise from an uninterrupted communion with Infinite Wisdom! To stand, not at the feet of Homer, and attend the flights of his elevated imagination; not in the presence of Socrates, and hear the dictates of his sagacious soul; but to stand in the courts of the Lord, and before the throne of the Lamb, there to contemplate, without any interposing veil, the counsels of his unerring providence; to have the mysteries of his redeeming love laid fully open to our view; and receive the brightest manifestations of all his amiable, his adorable, his unspeakable attributes?"

* Alluding to the story of the philosopher, who used to bless the gods for three privileges:—That he was made not a brute, but a rational creature—That he was born not in barbarous climes, but in Greece—That he lived not in the more uncultivated ages, but in the time, and under the tuition of Socrates.

† This, I think, gives us the most deplorable and horrid idea of the blindness of our fallen nature. The Heathens, even amidst all the politeness of their taste, and notwithstanding their superior advancement in the sciences, where haters of the true God, and robbed him of his honour; nay, what is unspeakably worse, they paid it to monsters—monsters of lewdness and treachery, vice and immorality. Egregious, sottish, almost incredible stupidity! to worship those beings, which deserved universal abhorrence! to defy those characters, which could never be sufficiently detested.

Ther. These are advantages truly desirable, and equally obvious. Methinks, it surprises me that I should never so much as propose them, and grieves me, that I should so long be deprived of them. A view to such very superior improvements will, I hope, render my future intercourse with those favourite authors still more agreeable, and abundantly more beneficial.—But let me ask, what passage was engaging your attention this afternoon?

Asp. The great orator's treatise concerning the "Nature of the divine Being;"* that part especially which proves his existence and perfections from the formation of the human body.

Ther. And do you not perceive, that he is almost as deficient in the knowledge of his subject, as he is mistaken in his ideas of the Supreme Cause? The exquisite contrivance and imitable workmanship of the human frame were, in those early ages, but dimly discerned. It was the infancy of anatomy, when the very professors had scarcely the qualifications of a modern pupil. Many of the received notions were childish, almost all of them superficial.

Asp. Will my Theron then entertain me with a more accurate description of this wonderful structure?

Ther. How could you take occasion, Aspasio, from the hint I dropped, to conceive any such expectation? It is one thing to discover, another to correct, what is amiss. Many spectators can point out an accidental defect in some celebrated statue, or a small indelicacy in some valuable piece of painting, who are absolutely incapable of retouching the one or supplying the other.

Asp. Since we are fallen upon this point, you must give me leave to renew and urge my request. I shall be extremely glad to hear your remarks upon the subject, especially as you have made this branch of science a part of your amusement, and not without the advantage of anatomical dissections; whereas I have very seldom applied my thoughts to the former, and never had an opportunity of being present at the latter.

Let me also observe, that our very situation favours, or rather suggests, such a topic of conversation. All the fine prospects of the country are excluded. We have scarce any thing left but ourselves to contemplate.

And shall this be the only theme we neglect?

Ther. It is somewhat preposterous, I must confess, to pry into the archives of colleges, to ransack the cabinets of the virtuosi, to carry our search through the whole compass of external nature, and at the same time overlook the far more surprising curiosities which abound in the composition of our own bodies.—Since you insist upon it, my observations, crude and extemporaneous as they are, shall submit themselves to your judgment, provided you will be content to receive only a few of the outlines, and nothing like a finished draught.

Asp. Let me just hint, that the more circumstantial your account is, so much the more welcome will it be to your friend, and so much the more honourable to our common Creator. For I really think, that Galen's declaration upon this head is perfectly just; which I have read in my favourite commentator Beza, and which speaks to the following effect:—"Such treatises as display the excellencies of the great Creator, compose one of the noblest and most acceptable hymns. To acquaint ourselves with his sublime perfections, and point out to others his infinite power, his unerring wisdom, and his boundless benignity; this is a more substantial act of devotion than to slay hecatombs of victims at his altar, or kindle mountains of spices into incense."—Theron, after pausing a few minutes, thus resumed the discourse.

Ther. When some master builder under takes to erect a magnificent edifice, he begins with the less decorated, but more solid parts—those which are to support, or those which are to contain the rest. This order, if you please, we will follow in considering "the earthly house of our tabernacle." † 2 Cor. v. i.

First, you have a system of bones, cast into a variety of moulds, enlarged or contracted into a variety of sizes. All strong, that they may commodiously bear up the fleshy machine; yet light, that they may not depress the animal with an encumbering load. Bored with an internal cavity, to contain the moistening marrow, and perforated with exceedingly fine ducts, to admit the nourishing vessels. Insensible themselves, they are covered with a membrane of exquisite sensibility, which warns them of the approach, and secures them from the annoyance, of any injurious friction; and at the same time preserves the muscular parts from being fretted in their action by the hard and rough substance of the bones. Their figures are always most precisely fitted to their uses. They are generally larger at the extremities than in the middle, that they may be joined more firmly, and not so easily dislocated. The manner of their articulation is truly admirable, and remarkably various; yet never varied without demonstrating some wise design, and answering some valuable end. Frequently, when two are united, the one is nicely rounded and capped with a smooth substance; the other is scooped into a hollow of the same dimensions, to receive the polished knob; and both are lubricated with an unctuous fluid, to yield the readiest rotation in the socket.

The feet compose the firmest and neatest pedestal, infinitely beyond all that statuary or architecture can accomplish; capable of altering its form, and extending its size, as different circumstances require. Besides performing the office of a pedestal, they contain a set of the nicest springs, which help to place the body in a variety of graceful attitudes, and qualify it for a multiplicity of advantageous motions. The undermost part of the heel, and the extremity of the sole, are shod with a tough, insensible, sinewy substance. This we may call a kind of natural sandal: It never wears out, never wants repair, and always prevents that undue compression of the vessels which the weight of the body, in walking or standing, might otherwise occasion. The legs and thighs are like substantial and stately columns;* articulated in such a manner, that they administer most commodiously to the act of walking, yet obstruct not the easy posture of sitting. The legs swell out towards the top, with a gentle projection; and are wrought off towards the bottom with neat diminutions; which variation lessens their bulk, at the same time that it increases their beauty.

The ribs, turned into a regular arch, are gently moveable, for the act of respiration. They form a secure lodgment for the lungs and the heart, which being some of the most distinguished and important organs of life, have their residence fortified by this strong semicircular rampart.† The backbone is intended, not only to strengthen the body, and sustain its most capacious store-rooms, but also to bring down that communication of the brain, which is usually termed the spinal marrow. As an open channel, it conveys—as a well-closed case, it guards—this vital silver;‡ and, by several commodious outlets, transmits the animating treasure into all the inferior parts. Had it only been large, straight and hollow, it might have served these several purposes, but then the loins must have been inflexible, and every man impaled (not by the executioner, but by nature) on a stake coeval with his existence. To avoid which, it consists of very short bones, closely knit together by intervening cartilages. This peculiarity of structure prevents dislocation, and gives the main pillar of our frame the pliancy of an osier, even while it retains the firmness of an oak. By this means, it is a kind of continued joint, capable of various inflections, without bruising the soft medullary substance which fills its cavity, without intercepting the nervous fluid which is to be detached from this grand reservoir, or diminishing that strength which is necessary to support all the upper stories. A formation so very peculiar in any other of the solids, must have been attended with great inconveniences: here it is unspeakably serviceable—is, both for workmanship and situation, a master-piece of creating skill never enough to be admired.

The arms, pendent on either side, are exactly proportioned to each other, that the equilibrium of the structure may not be disconcerted. These being the guards which defend,* and the ministers which serve the whole body, are fitted for the most diversified and extensive operations; firm with bone, yet not weighty with flesh, and capable of performing, with singular expedition and ease, all manner of useful motions. They bend inwards, and turn outwards; they rise upwards, and stoop downwards; they wheel about, and throw themselves into whatever direction we please. To these are annexed the hands, and all terminated by the fingers; which are not, like the arms, of the same length, and of an equal bigness, but in both respects different, which gives them a more graceful appearance, and a much greater degree of usefulness. Were they all flesh, they would be comparatively impotent; were they one entire bone, they would be utterly inflexible; but consisting of various little bones, and a multitude of muscles, what shape can they not assume? what service can they not perform? Being placed at the end of the arm, the sphere of their action is exceedingly enlarged. This advantageous situation realizes the fable of Briareus, and renders a pair of hands as serviceable as an hundred. The extremities of the fingers are an assemblage of fine tendinous fibres, most acutely sensible,† which, † "Thou hast fenced me," secured my inward and vital parts, "with bones and sinews." Job x. 11. "Crates pectoris," is Virgil's expression.

‡ This is supposed to be the part which Solomon describes by the silver cord, and is indeed like a cord, on account of its shape; like silver, on account of its colour. Eccl. xii. 6.

† So very acute is the sensibility of these parts, that I am informed it furnishes the tribunal of the Inquisition with one of the most refined expedients in the art of torture. A strong quill, sharpened by the penknife, and dipped in some inflammable liquor, is thrust deep between the nail and the finger notwithstanding the delicacy of their texture, are destined to almost incessant employment, and frequently exercised among rugged objects. For this reason, they are overlaid with the nails, a sort of horny expansion, which, like a ferule, hinders the flesh from being ungracefully flattened; and like a sheath preserves the tender parts from injurious impressions.

In the ministry of the hands and activity of the fingers, we possess a case of the finest instruments, or a collection of the noblest utensils qualifying us for the execution of every work which the projecting genius can devise, or the lavish fancy crave. To these we are obliged for the beautiful statues, which have often entertained our eyes in yonder solitary walks; and even for that melodious trumpet, which now addresses our ears from the summer-house on the fishpond. These raise the lofty column, and turn the spacious arch. These swell the majestic dome, and adjust the commodious apartment. Architecture, with all her striking beauties, and all her rich benefits, is the creation of the human hand. Yielding to the strength of the hand, the tallest firs fall to the ground, and the largest oaks descend from the mountains. Fashioned by the dexterity of the hand, they accommodate the sailor with a floating warehouse; and circulate, from Britain to Japan, the productions of nature and the improvements of art. Obedient to the human hand, metals ascend from their subterranean beds, and compose the most substantial parts of that curious machine,* which transmits far and near, to the monarch's palace, and to the peasant's hut, such treasures of wisdom and knowledge, "as the gold and crystal cannot equal." Job xxviii. 17.

Among the Egyptians, the hand was the symbol of strength; among the Romans it was an emblem of fidelity; and I think it may, among all nations, be looked upon as the ensign of authority. It is the original and the universal sceptre; that which not only represents, but ascertains, our dominion over all the elements, and over every creature. Though providence has not given us the strength of the horse, the swiftness of the grey-hound, or the sagacious scent of the spaniel, yet, directed by the understanding, and enabled by the hand, we can subject them to our will, turn them to our advantage, and, in this sense, make them all our own. These hands, (surprising to relate!) these short hands, have found out a way, whereby they can dive to the bottom of the ocean, can penetrate the bowels of the earth, and reach from shore to shore. These feeble hands can manage the wings of the wind, can arm themselves with the rage of the fire, and press into their service the forcible impetuosity of the waters. How eminent is the dignity, how extensive the agency of the hand! It would require more eloquence than your orator possessed to display the former, and more pages than your book contains, to describe the latter. How greatly then are we indebted to our indulgent Creator for accommodating us with this noble, this distinguishing, this invaluable member!

Above all is the head, a majestic dome, designed for the residence of the brain. It is framed in exact conformity to this important purpose; ample, to receive it, strong to uphold it, and firm to defend it. As the head resembles the general's tent in an army, or the monarch's palace in a city, it has a communication established with all, even the most inferior and remote parts of the system; has outlets and avenues, for the ready dispatch of couriers to all quarters, and for the reception of speedy intelligence on every interesting occasion. It is furnished with lodgments, wherein to post centinels of various characters, and appointed for various offices. To expedite their operations, whether they are employed in reconnoitring what passes without, or examining what claims admittance within, the whole turns upon a curious pivot, most nicely contrived to afford the largest and freest circumvolutions.

This stately capital is screened from heat, defended from cold, and, at the same time, very much beautified, by a copious growth of hair, which flows down from the parted forelock in decent curls, and hangs mantling on the cheeks, clustering on the shoulders. A decoration incomparably more delicate than any or all the orders of architecture can supply, and so perfectly light, that it no way encumbers or incommodes the wearer.

While many animals creep on the ground, while all of them are prone in their posture or their aspect, the attitude of man is erect, which is by far the most graceful, has an air of dignity, and bespeaks superiority. It is by far the most commodious; fits us for the prosecution of every grand scheme, and facilitates the success of all our extensive designs. It is likewise attended with the greatest safety, being, if not less than any other position exposed to dangers, yet more happily contrived to repel or avoid them.

Asp. May it not likewise be intended to remind us of our exalted original, and our sublime end: Our original, which was the breath of the Almighty, and the spirit of

When the quill has cut its way through the shivering nerves, and stands planted like a dagger, amidst the gushing blood, some barbarous hand sets fire to the extremity. the Most High; our end, which is not the soil we tread on, or any of its low productions, but the heaven of heavens, and the "things that are above."

But not to divert from our subject, which, in my friend's manner of handling it, is as entertaining as it is instructive:—The bones (to carry on your own allusion) are only the rafters, the beams, the shell of the living edifice. You have raised the walls, and laid the floors; you have made the proper divisions, and left the necessary apertures. But in every finished house the roof is covered, and the rooms are wainscotted. The sashes are hung, and the doors turn upon their hinges. The grates are fixed and the stairs ascend. Within, the lodgings are furnished; without, the front is ornamented. All is rendered commodious for domestic use, and graceful to the external view.

Ther. This likewise is executed by the great, the divine Artificer. Here are ligaments; a tough and strong arrangement of fibres, to unite the several limbs, and render what would otherwise be a disjointed unwieldy jumble, a well-compacted and self-manageable system. Membranes, or thin and flexible tunics appointed to inwrap the fleshy parts, to form a connexion between some, and make a separation between others.*

Arteries, the rivers of our little world,† or the aqueducts of the organized metropolis, some of which ascend to the head, others spread themselves over the shoulders; some extend to the arms, some descend to the feet, and striking out, as they go, into numberless smaller canals, visit the streets, the alleys, and every individual apartment of the vital city: These being wide at their origin, and lessening as they branch themselves, check the rapid impetus of the blood. To sustain this shock, they are endued with uncommon strength; by performing this service, they oblige the crimson current to pass into the narrowest defiles, and distribute itself into all quarters. The blood thrown from the heart dilates the arteries, and their own elastic force contracts them. By which means, they vibrate in proper places, very perceivably against the finger; bring advices of the utmost importance to the physician; and very much assist him, both in discovering the nature of diseases, and prescribing for their respective cures. The larger arteries, wherever the body is formed for incurvation, are situate on the bending side; lest being stretched to an improper length by the inflection, their dimensions should be lessened, and the circulating fluid retarded. They are not, like several of the considerable veins, laid so near the surface, as to be protrusive of the skin, but are deposited to a proper depth in the flesh. This situation renders them more secure from external injuries. It conceals likewise those starts and resiliations of the pulse, which, if apparent, would discompose the most sedate, and disfigure the most comely countenance. Could we cast our eye upon the river which runs through the neighbouring meadow, we might observe several mills intersecting the stream. The waters, at those places, if not entirely stopped, drain away very slowly. In consequence of this obstruction, the lower channels would be sunk dry, and the upper ones swelled into a flood. To obviate both these inconveniences, low shots are provided, which carrying off the surcharge, prevent a glut above, and supply the banks below. In those parts of the body, which are most liable to pressure, much the same expedient takes place. The arteries inosculate, or, breaking into a new track, they fetch a little circuit, in order to return and communicate again with the main road. So that, if any obstacle blocks up or straitens the direct passage, the current, by diverting to this new channel, eludes the impediment, maintains an uninterrupted flow, and soon regains its wonted course.

Veins are appointed to receive the blood from the arteries, and re-convey it to the heart. Small at their rise, and enlarging as they advance, they are void of any pulsation. In these, the pressure of the circulating fluid is not near so forcible as in the arterial tubes; for which reason, their texture is considerably slighter. Such an exact economist is nature, even amidst all her liberality!* In many of these canals, the current, though winding continually and acquiring a proportionable increase of gravity, is obliged to push its way against the perpendicular. By which circumstance it is exposed to the hazard of falling back, and overloading the vessels, if not of supressing the animal motion. For a security against this danger, valves are interposed at proper distances, which are no hinderance to the regular passage, but prevent the reflux, sustain the augmented weight, and facilitate a progress to the grand receptacle. This auxiliary contrivance comes in, where the blood is constrained to climb; but is dismissed where the steep ascent ceases, and such a precaution would be needless.

* The intestines are fastened to each other by the mesentery. The breast is divided into two cavities by the "mediastinum." Both which are reckoned among the membranes.

† A human body was called by the ancients the "microcosm," that is, a little world, or the world in miniature.

* A parallel instance of frugality is observable in the arteries, whose coats are spun thinner, as the diameter of the vessels becomes smaller, and the pressure of the blood weaker

Here are glands, whose office it is to filtrate the passing fluid. Each of these glands is an assemblage of vessels, complicated and interwoven with seeming confusion, but with perfect regularity. As some kind of sieves transmit the dust, and retain the corn; others bolt out the meal, and hold back the bran; so some of these glandulous strainers draw off the finest, others the grossest parts of the blood. Some, like the distiller's alembic, sublimate;* others, like the common sewers, defecate.† Each forms a secretion far more curious than the most admired operations of chemistry; yet all necessary for the support of life, or conducive to the comfort of the animal. Muscles wove in nature's nicest loom; composed of the slenderest fibres, yet endued with incredible strength; fashioned after a variety of patterns, but all in the highest taste for elegance, convenience, and usefulness. These, with their tendons annexed, constitute the instruments of motion. The former, contracting their substance, operate somewhat like the pulley in mechanics. The latter, resembling the cord, are fastened to a bone, or some partition of flesh; and, following the muscular contraction, actuate the part into which they are inserted. This, and all their functions, they execute, not like a sluggish beast of burden, but quick as the lightning. Nerves, surprisingly minute tubes—derived from the brain, and permeated by an exquisitely subtle fluid, which, gliding into the muscles, sets them on work—diffuses the power of sensation through the body; or, returning upon any impression from without, gives all needful intelligence to the soul. Vesicles, distended with an unctuous matter, in some places, compose a soft cushion‡ for nature, in other places, they fill up her vacuities, and smooth the inequalities of the flesh. Inwardly, they supply the several movements of the active machine; outwardly, they render its appearance plump, well proportioned, and graceful.

The skin, like a curious surtout,§ exactly fitted, is superinduced over the whole, formed of the most delicate net-work, whose meshes* are minute, and whose threads† are multiplied even to a prodigy. The meshes so minute, that nothing passes thro', which is discernible by the eye; though they discharge every moment myriads and myriads of superfluous incumbrances from the body. The steam, arising from the warm business transacted within, is carried off by these real, though imperceptible funnels,‡ which constitutes what we usually call insensible perspiration. The threads so multiplied, that neither the point of the smallest needle, nor the incomparably nicer spear of a gnat, nor even the invisible lancet of a flea, can pierce any single part, without causing an uneasy sensation, and a suffusion of blood; consequently, without wounding, even by so small a puncture, both a nerve and a vein.§

The veins, either pervading or lying parallel with this fine transparent coat, beautify the human structure; those parts especially, which are most conspicuous, and intended for public view. The pliant wrist, and the taper arm, they variegate with an inlay of living sapphire.—They spread vermilion over the lips,|| and plant roses in the cheeks, while the eye, tinged with glossy jet, or sparkling with the blue of heaven, is fixed in an orb of polished crystal. Inasmuch that the earthly tabernacle exhibits the nicest proportions and richest graces;

* The pores of the cuticula.

† The nervous fibres, and other vessels of the cutis. Nature is somewhat like Solomon's virtuous woman, "who is not afraid of the snow for her household, because her household are clothed in scarlet;" or, as it may be rendered, are clothed "with pairs," have two coats a-piece, Prov. xxxi. 21. (See Gen. vi. 19. 20, where the word occurs in this signification). The body also is accommodated with a double covering. The outermost is that soft whitish tegument, which rises in the pustule of a blister. The innermost is that reddish and exquisitely tender part, which appears when the blister is broke, and the dead skin taken off. The first is void of sense, and intended to screen the second, not only from the stroke of injuries, but even from the impressions of the air, which, mild as it may feel to the sheathed, would be too rough and sharp for the naked nerves.

‡ There seems to be an allusion to this particular in that remarkable expression, "Skin for skin," Job. ii. 4. "skin even unto skin," the very inmost skin, which cannot be taken away without the greatest loss, and severest pain. Yet even this loss a man would suffer, this pain he would endure in order to preserve precious life.

§ These are somewhere prettily styled cutaneous chimneys, and no wonder they are imperceptible, if, as Mr. Lewenhoeck informs, a single grain of sand will cover no less than 125,000.

|| A blood-vessel at least. Compared with these vessels, the fine filmy threads, which, on some bright autumnal morning, float in the air, or hang on the stubble, must be large as a bell-rope, or bulky as a cable. Such tubes, one would think, would burst at every breath we draw, or even break with their own fineness. Yet they are the conduit-pipes, which convey the vital fluid from and to the grand reservoir. And so exquisite, so admirable is their texture, that they will outlast the strength of lead, or the heart of oak,—these wearing away, those growing stronger by use.

¶ "Thy lips are like a thread of scarlet," Cant. iv. 3. Like a thread, for their delicate shape; like a thread of scarlet for their colour.

* The glandulous substance of the brain, which secretes the animal spirits.

† The liver and kidneys. The former of which separates the gall, the latter drains off a fluid, which, being sufficiently known, need not be named. I could wish, it had not been so explicitly and coarsely mentioned in our translation of the best of books, but that we had rendered the original, in 1 Kings xiv. 10, "Every male;" in Isaiah, xxxvi. 12. "Eat and drink their own excrements."

‡ The calf of the leg for instance, whose large collection of muscles, intermingled with fat, is of singular service to those important bones. It flanks and fortifies them like a strong bastion. It supports and cherishes them like a soft pillow. And what is no less pleasing to observe, it accommodates and defends them on that very side, where they most frequently rest their weight, and where they are least capable of being guarded by the eye.

§ "Thou hast clothed me with skin and flesh," Job x. 11.

such nice proportions as afford the most correct model for statuary: such rich graces, as the canvass never bore, as painting imitates in vain.

Asp. How just in itself, and how pertinent to our purpose, is that well-known acknowledgment of the sacred and royal anatomist; "I am curiously wrought!"* "There is a variety, a regularity, and an elegance, in the texture of my body; in the formation and arrangement of these bones and muscles, these veins and arteries;—resembling, shall I say?—rather infinitely surpassing the most costly and admired pieces of embroidery."

It is one of the finest similitudes which the whole circle of polite arts could afford. Yet every comparison, fetched from the performances of mankind, must necessarily debase the noble subject. All the enrichments which the needle can give, or the most splendid silks receive, are rude, are coarse, are mere sackcloth, when set in opposition to the exquisite delicacy of the fleshy web. As, indeed, all the celebrated palaces, amphitheatres, temples, which ever adorned the most magnificent cities in the world, are but a heap of confusion, if compared with the symmetry and beauty of the bodily fabric. And, what is beyond measure marvellous, all these wonders of mechanism and decoration arose, not from the purer elements, not from the more refined parts of the creation, but from the dust of the ground.† How easily, Theron, can that stupendous Artificer renew our hearts, and transform our souls into his own image, who could raise such delicate and stately edifices from particles—despicable particles of the trodden soil!

I could not forbear interposing this remark; because it tends to manifest our Creator's glory, to encourage our hopes, and strengthen our faith; otherwise I should be angry with myself for interrupting your discourse. Pray go on with your description of the animal economy: only let me observe, that such a course of incessant action must exhaust the fluids, must waste the solids; and, unless both are supplied with proper recruits, must gradually weaken, and at length totally destroy the machine.

Ther. For this reason, it is furnished with the organs, and endued with the powers of nutrition.—Teeth, the foremost thin and sharp, fitted to bite asunder the food, or cut‡ off such a portion as the mouth can conveniently manage; the hindermost broad and strong, indented like the surface of a millstone,* with small cavities, and jagged with little asperities, which qualify them to grind in pieces whatever is transmitted to their operation. Were the teeth, like our other bones, covered with the usual membrane, the act of chewing would always occasion great uneasiness; and, when any hard substance is eaten, might even lacerate the tender tegument. Were they left without any sort of covering, they would suffer from the inclemencies of the air, and be liable to the penetration of liquors: In which case, they must soon become soft and unfit for service, or be corrupted, and entirely perish. To guard against these disadvantages, they are curiously glazed, or overlaid with a neat enamel, as white as ivory, and harder than the bone itself; which renders them an ornament to the mouth,† secures them from various injuries, and exempts them from pain in the office of mastication.

As the rims and cushions of a billiard-table keep the ball from flying off, and send it back into the green area for repeated essays of skill; so the lips prevent the food from slipping out of the mouth, and, assisted by the tongue, return it to the renewed attrition of the grinders. While the lips, in concert with the cheeks, are employed in this work, their motion compresses the circumjacent glands; and, from innumerable little orifices, a thin pellicid liquor exudes, which moistens the attenuated food, and prepares it for more easy digestion. When the mouth remains inactive, these fountains of spittle are, in a manner, closed. But when it is exercised, either in speaking or eating, their moisture then being peculiarly necessary, they never fail to give out a sufficient quantity.

When the soldier charges his carbine, the cartridge could not make its way to the bottom without the protrusion of the rammer.‡

* Styled accordingly, "molares."—We find neither of these kinds in the new-born babe. As milk is, for a considerable time, its appointed food, teeth would be of no service to the infant itself. As it is to press the tender nipple for this milky sustenance, teeth would be painful and prejudicial to the nurse. Therefore, nature has postponed the formation of these fine implements, till they become both necessary and beneficial.

† This ornamental furniture of the mouth is, in the grand oriental manner, described by Solomon: "Thy teeth are like a flock of sheep, that are even shorn, which come up from the washing." Cant. iv. 2. Growing, not single like the nose; not in pairs like the eyes; but in rows considerably numerous, like a flock. None rising higher than the other; none standing unduly prominent beyond another; but all set as true as if they were ranged by the compass; and making as regular an appearance as the flocks that are even shorn. They are clean also as the fleeces which have no spot, and white as the colour of the purest wool, like the flocks just come up from the washing.

‡ This and the other similitudes, are undoubtedly too mean for the noble occasion. Neither do they, in every circumstance, quadrate with the functions described. The motion of the muscles, which minister to the act of deglutition, is different from the per-

* The original signifies "finely wrought," or "elegantly flourished with a needle." The translation adopted by our liturgy is, in this place, flat and inexpressive. The English word fashioned has just the same inferiority to the beautiful Hebrew phrase, as the badge tacked upon some poor pensioner's coat has to the star embroidered on a nobleman's breast. Psal. cxxxix. 14.

† "The Lord God formed man of the dust of the ground." Gen. ii. 7.

‡ Called therefore, "incisive."

Neither would the food, which we receive at the mouth, descend by the force of its own weight, through a narrow and clammy channel, into the stomach. To effectuate therefore, and expedite its passage, muscles both strait and circular are provided. The former enlarge the cavity of the throat, and afford a more easy admittance; the latter, closing behind the descending aliment, press it downwards, and finish the deglutition. Before the food enters the gullet, it must of necessity pass over the orifice of the wind-pipe; consequently, must be in very imminent danger of falling upon the lungs; which would, if not entirely obstruct the breath, yet occasion violent coughing,* and great inconveniences. To obviate this evil, the all-foreseeing Contriver has placed a moveable lid, or hung a cartilaginous draw-bridge,† which, when any the smallest particle of food advances to enter the stomach, is pulled down and shut close; but the very moment the morsel is swallowed, it is set loose and stands open. By this twofold artifice, the important passage is always barred and made sure against any noxious approaches, yet is always left free for the necessary accession of air, and commodious for the purposes of respiration.

When the maltster prepares his grain for the transmutations of the brew-house, he suffers it to lie several hours steeping in the cistern, before it is fit to be spread upon the floor, or dried on the kiln. The meat and drink likewise must remain a considerable time in the stomach before they are of a proper consistence and temperature, either for the tender coats, or the delicate operation of the bowels. For which purpose, that great receiver is made strong to bear, capacious to hold, and so curiously contrived as to lay a temporary embargo‡ upon its contents. Here they are lodged in the very centre of warmth, and concocted by the most kindly combination of heat and humipendicular protrusion of the rammer; and it is mentioned only to demonstrate the necessity of some propelling force, in order to convey the aliment into the proper receptacle.

When we descant upon a subject of such extensive contrivance, and such finished perfection, as the human structure, it is scarce possible to find similitudes that will correspond in all particulars, or that can rise to the dignity of the original. Yet if they tend, in any tolerable degree, to explain its formation, to display its uses, and render its wonderful economy somewhat more intelligible, perhaps they may be allowed to take place.

I hope it will be remembered, that Theron speaks not as an adept in the science, but as one whose highest pretensions are, to admire the work, and adore the Artificer. Which acknowledgment may entitle him to some candid indulgence, in case he should offend against the precise anatomical exactness either of sentiment or expression.

* This is what we experience when, in eating or drinking, any thing goes (as it is commonly, and not improperly said) the wrong way.

† Called the "epiglottis."

‡ Which is quite contrary to the economy of the gullet, though they are not only contiguous to each other, but a continuation of the same tube.

dity. Here they are saturated with other fermenting or diluting juices, and are kneaded, as it were, by the motion of the stomach, and compression of the neighbouring parts. So that every, the minutest fragment is separated; the whole is reduced to a tenuity, abundantly finer than the exactest grinding could effect; and all is worked up into the smoothest most nicely-mixed pulp imaginable. From hence it is dislodged by a gently-acting force, and passes by a gradual transition into the cavity of the intestines.

Near the entrance, punctual as a porter in his lodge, waits the gall-bladder,* ready to transfuse its acrimonious but salutary juices, on the advancing aliment; which dissolve its remaining viscidities; scour the passage of the intestines, and keep all its fine apertures clear. This bag, as the stomach fills, is elevated by the distension; as the stomach empties, is proportionably depressed. The former posture brings on a discharge, the latter occasions a suppression of the bile. It is furnished also with a valve of a very peculiar, but most convenient form,† through which the detersive liquid cannot hastily pour, but must gently ooze. Admirable construction, which, without any care or consciousness of ours, prohibits an immoderate effusion, yet ascertains the needful supply.

Sufficiently charged with this adventitious fluid, the nutritive mass pursues its way through the intestines, whose wonderful meanders are incomparably more curious than the mazes of the Dedalean labyrinth. They are actuated with a worm-like or undulatory motion,‡ which protrudes the received aliment, and forces its fine milky particles into the lacteal vessels. These are a series of the most delicate strainers, ranged in countless multitudes all along the sides of the winding passage, each so nicely framed as to admit the neutralized balmy juices, and reject the gross excrementitious dregs. Had the intestines been straight and short, the food might have gone through them, without resigning a sufficient quantity of its nourishing particles. Therefore, this grand-est of all the vital ducts is artfully convoluted, and greatly extended, to afford nature an opportunity of sifting more thoroughly whatever passes, and of detaining whatever may serve her purposes. Lest such lengths of entrails should be entangled among themselves, or be cumbrous to the wearer, they are packed into the neatest folds, and lie within a narrow compass. They are at least six times longer§ than the body which

* The gall-bladder is situate upon the lower margin of the liver; and to secrete the bilious juice, is supposed to be the principal use of that largest of glands.

† A spiral form.

‡ Styled vermicular or peristaltic.

§ According to this calculation, they must measure, in a pretty tall man, more than thirty-six feet. The substance of the bowels, though thin to a delicacy, is contains them; yet are they lodged, not crowded, in a part, not in the whole region of the lower belly; and, amidst this small space, have sufficient room to execute the nicest and most important functions. Though the alimentary substance can never mistake its way, yet it may, through some accidental impediment, attempt to return backward. In this case a valve intervenes, and renders what would be extremely pernicious, almost always impracticable. As the whole proceeds in this serpentine course, it is perpetually sending off detachments of nutritious juices. In consequence of which, it would lose its soft temperature; might become rugged, and pain the tender parts; perhaps be hindered from sliding on to its final exit. To prevent such an obstruction, glands are posted in proper places,* and discharge a lubricating fluid, which aids the progress of the mass, and renews the secretion of the chyle, till all that remains of the one is clean drawn off, and the other—But here you must excuse me, and, for my neglect of farther particularity, your author shall make an apology: “Quemadmodum autem reliquæ cibi depellantur, tum astringentibus se intestinis, tum relaxantibus, haud sane difficile dictu est; sed tamen prætereundum est, ne quid habeat injucunditatis oratio.”†

The chyle, drawn off by all the secretory orifices, is carried along millions of the finest ducts,‡ and lodged in several commodious cells.§ As a traveller, by baiting upon the road, and taking proper refreshment, is better qualified to pursue his journey; so the chyle, diverting to those little inns, is mixed with a thin, diluting, watery substance, which renders it more apt to flow, and more fit for use. From hence it is conveyed to one common receptacle,|| and mounts through a perpendicular tube. When provision or ammunition is transmitted to an army, it generally passes under an escort of able troops. As this is the immediate support, and principal nourishment of the whole system, its conveyance is guarded and ascertained with peculiar caution. The perpendicular tube, not having sufficient force of its own, is laid contiguous to the great artery; whose strong pulsation drives on the creeping fluid, enables it to overcome the steep ascent, and unload its precious treasure at the very door of the heart.—Here it enters the trunk of a large vein, most conveniently opened for its reception: It enters in a slanting or oblique direction. By this method of approach, it avoids thwarting, and coincides with the purple stream; which, instead of obstructing its admission, expedites its passage, and instead of being a bar to exclude it, becomes a vehicle to waft it.—Its entrance is farther secured by a valve, admirably constructed, and most happily situated; which shuts the aperture against the reflux blood, in case it should offer to obtrude itself, but opens a free, safe, and easy avenue, to introduce this milk; this manna of nature.

The blood, through every stage of its ample circuit, having sustained great expenses; being laid under contribution by every gland in the whole system, and having supplied myriads of the capillary vessels with matter for insensible perspiration, must be very much impoverished; but is most opportunely recruited by this accession of chyle.—Yet though recruited, it is not refined. In its present crude state, it is absolutely unqualified to perform the vital tour, or carry on the animal functions: Therefore, by a grand apparatus of muscular fibres it is wafted into the lungs, and pours a thousand thousand rills into either lobe.—In the cells the spongy cells of this amazing laboratory, it imbibes the influences of the external air; its heterogeneous parts are thoroughly incorporated, and its whole substance is made cool, smooth, and fluid.—Thus improved, thus exalted, it is transmitted to the left ventricle of the heart; a strong, active, indefatigable* muscle, placed in the very centre of the system. Impelled by this beating engine, part shoots upward, and sweeps with a bounding impetus into the head. There it impregnates the prolific fields of the brain, and forms those subtle spirituous dews,† which impart strength to every nerve, strong to a wonder. The skin of an ox-gut, I am told, will endure the blows of the gold-beater's hammer for many months, nay, for several years.

* In the bowels which lie nearest the stomach, these glands are smaller or fewer; because, in those parts, the aliment is copiously furnished with moisture; whereas, in the bowels which are more remote from the stomach, and receive the food drained of a considerable quantity of its chyle, the lubricating glands are either multiplied or enlarged. A most admirable provision! apparently diversified according to the several changes of the aliment, yet exactly adapted to the exigencies of the animal.

† Cicero de Nat. Deor.

‡ Fine indeed! since their orifices, through which they admit the chyle, are not discoverable even by the very best microscopes. To this prodigiously-nice constructure it is owing, that nothing enters the substance of the blood, but what is smaller than the smallest arteries in the system; and thereby fitted to pass through the finest capillary vessels, without causing any obstruction.

§ The glands of the mesentery.

* Indefatigable.—This is a very distinguishing, and no less amazing property of the heart. The large muscles of the arm, or the much larger of the thigh, are soon wearied. A day's labour, or a day's journey, will exhaust their strength. But the muscle which constitutes the heart works through whole weeks, whole months, whole years, and never becomes weary; is equally a stranger to intermission and fatigue.

† These are what we call the animal spirits: and it is generally supposed, that sensation is caused by the undulatory motion of this nervous fluid; though some imagine it is performed by the vibratory motion of the nerves themselves.—Others think, that neither of these opinions will comport with the texture of those fine tubes, or with the nature of the fluid they contain.—It is, I believe, one of those mysteries in the material world, which may reconcile thinking and un-and communicate motion to every limb.— Part flows downward, rolls the reeking current through all the lower quarters, and dispenses the nutrimental stores even to the nearest member and the minutest vessel.

Observe how the stately Thames and the rapid Rhine refresh the forests and the groves, water the towns, which crowd their banks, and make the meadows they intersect laugh and sing. So, only with an incomparably richer fluid, and with infinitely more numerous streams, this human river laves the several regions of the body, trans-fusing vigour and propagating health through the whole.

But how shall a stream, divided into myriads of channels, and pervading innumerable tracts, how shall this be brought back again to its source? Should any portion, like your lake-waters after a land-flood, deviate from their course, or be unable to return—putrefaction would take place, a nuisance would arise, death might ensue. Therefore the all-wise Creator has connected the extremity of the arteries with the beginning of the veins: So that the same force which darts the crimson wave through the former, drives it through the latter. Thus it is reconducted, without the least extravasation, to the great salient cistern.* There, played off afresh, it renews and perpetuates the vital functions.

Where two opposite currents would be in danger of clashing, a fibrous excrescence interposes,† which, like a projecting pier, breaks the stroke of each, and throws both into their proper receptacle. When the wafture is to be speedy, the channels either forbear to wind in their course,‡ or to lessen in their dimensions.§ When the progress is to be retarded, the tubes are twined into various convolutions,|| or their diameter is contracted into a narrower size.— Modelled by these judicious rules, guarded by these wise precautions, the living flood never discontinues its interchangeable tide; but, night and day, whether we sleep or prejudiced minds to the mysteries of the Christian revelation. Why should any one wonder to find some doctrines in the Bible that surpass the reach of human understanding, when there are so many operations in the body confessedly and absolutely inexplicable by the most acute anatomist?

‡ Solomon makes use of this similitude.—“ Or ever the pitcher be broken at the fountain, or the wheel broken at the cistern.” Eccl. xii. 6. The two ventricles of the heart, replenished with blood, are fitly represented by a cistern; and the contractile force of their fibres acts like the water-wheel in hydraulics. The pitcher, which receives the water at the spring-head, and conveys it away for the owner’s service, may probably signify the aorta, and the pulmonary artery; whose functions correspond with the uses of such a vessel.

† In the point where the streams form the vena cava and vena ascendens meet.

wake, still perseveres to sally briskly through the arteries, and return softly through the veins.

Such astonishing expedients are used to elaborate the chyle, to blend it with the blood, and to distribute both through the body; by means of which the animal constitution is maintained. In youth its bulk is increased; in age its decays are repaired; and it is kept in tenacious condition for the soul during the space of seventy or eighty years.

These are a few, and but a very few, instances of that contrivance, regularity, and beauty, which are observable in the human frame. Attentive inquirers discover deeper footsteps of design, and more refined strokes of skill; discover them not only in the grand and most distinguished parts, but in every limb and in every organ; I may venture to add, in every fibre that is extended, and in every globule* that flows.

Asp. What a various, but uniform system, is the body! I see the greatest multiplicity of parts, yet the most perfect harmony subsists between them all. No one hinders, but each assists, the operation of another; and all conspire to the benefit and preservation of the whole. Most judiciously has the great apostle touched this subject, and most happily applied it, to illustrate the reasonableness and enforce the practice, both of personal and social duties, of private content and public concord. See 1 Cor. xii. 12, &c.

“The body,” he observes, “is not one member, but many;” to each of which some peculiar and needful office is assigned: So that the foot, though placed in the lowest order, and destined to serve on the very ground, has no reason to reckon itself a worthless outcast; or to say, “because I am not the head, I am not of the body.” Neither has the head, in its exalted station, and amidst its honourable functions, any cause to despise the inferior limbs; or to say, with contempt and self-sufficiency, “I have no need of you.” If there were no feet what would become of the locomotive faculty? or how could the body convey itself from one place to another? If there were no hands, what should we do for the instruments of action? or how could the animal frame be defended and accommodated?—Nay, the parts, “which seem to be less honourable” are necessary. Even those which form the sediments, or throw off the dregs, are of the last importance to life and its comforts. Should those be obstructed in their action, the most raging torment ensues; should the obstruction continue, death is the inevitable consequence.—By this wise adjustment “there is no schism in the body;” no separate or interfering ends are pursued by the members; but the safety and support of each are the one undivided care of all.

Thus should it be among men, and among Christians, in the civil community, and in the Catholic church. There is in both a subordination of persons, but a concatenation of interests. For which reason, a general agreement should take place, and a mutual subserviency to each other's welfare. The meanest have no cause to be dissatisfied with their condition; but to acquiesce in the unerring disposal of Providence, and cheerfully contribute their share to the common good. The highest should condescend to men of low estate, and maintain a regard to the well-being of the poorest, as that which is intimately connected with their own. In a word, each should feel a tender concern for all; rejoicing in their happiness, and studying to establish it; sympathizing with their miseries, and endeavouring to heal them.

I am sure my Theron will be pleased with this fine comparison used by the apostle, and adapted to purposes at once so noble and so benevolent; especially as it receives additional propriety and force from his own observations. But I have one more inquiry to make.

Your system, though organized, though endowed with a principal of motion, and furnished with the powers of nutrition, is still destitute of sense. The creation abounds with objects fitted to yield the most refined entertainment: The sun impurples the robes of morning, and stars bespangle the curtains of night: Flowers of silver whiteness, and of golden lustre, enamel the ground: Fruits of all radiant hues, and of every delicious taste, hang amiably dangling on the boughs.

—“Airs also, vernal airs,
Breathing the smell of field and grove, attune
The trembling leaves.”

But we hear of no capacities formed for the enjoyment of these various delights; without which, the breath of fields must lose its reviving fragrance, the whispering grove must degenerate into sullen silence, and nature's book of knowledge, all fair and instructive, be no better than a vast unmeaning blank.

Ther. Therefore the great Creator, profusely gracious to mankind, has made us a present, an inestimable present, of the senses, to be the inlet of innumerable pleasures, and the means of administering the most valuable advantages.

High in the head, bright and conspicuous as a star in the brow of evening, is placed the eye. In this elevated situation, like a centinel posted in his watch-tower, it commands the most enlarged prospect.—Consisting only of simple fluids, enclosed in thin tunicles, it conveys to our apprehension all the graces of blooming nature, and all the glories of the visible heavens. How prodigiously wonderful that an image of the hugest mountains, and a transcript of the most diversified landscapes, shall enter the smallest circlet of the pupil? How surprisingly artful, that the rays of light, like an inimitable pencil, should paint on the optic nerves, paint, in an instant of time, paint in their truest colours and exactest lineaments, every species of external objects?

The eye is so tender, that a slight accident, scarce perceivable by some other parts of the body, would be very injurious to its delicate frame. It is guarded therefore with remarkable circumspection, and the most solicitous care—with a care evidently proportioned to its nice texture and extensive usefulness. It is entrenched deep in the head, and barricaded on every side with a strong fortification of bones. As the incursion of the smallest fly would incommode the polished surface, it is farther defended by two substantial curtains, hung on a most slender cartilaginous rod, which secure it not barely from blows, and from any hurtful attrition, but also from every troublesome annoyance. In sleep, when there is no occasion to exercise the sense, but an absolute necessity to protect the organ, these curtains spontaneously close, and never fail to lie shut. At any time they will fly together with a motion quick as the alarm of fear; I had almost said, quicker than thought itself. At all times they are lined with an extremely fine sponge,* wet with its own native dew, which lubricate the eyeball, oil, as it were, its wheels, and fit it for a course of unwearied activity. At the end of this skinny mantlet, (if I may use the military style,) is planted a range of bristly palisadoes,† which keep out the least mote, ward off even the straggling atom, and moderate the otherwise too potent impressions of the sunbeams.‡

‡ The glandula lachrymalis and its ducts, opening on the inner part of the eyelid, and secreting the fluid, which Theron calls its oil, because it irrigates the eyeball, and facilitates its motion.

† The hairs, which arise upon the extremities of the eyelash, grow only to a certain convenient length, and never stand in need of cutting. They are not flaccid and pendulous, like those of the head; but stiff and prominent, like bristles. The first sort would be troublesome, the last is beneficial. Add to this, that their points stand out of the way, those of the upper eyelid being bent upwards, and those of the lower downwards. So nice is nature, even in such small matters.

‡ The incessant, the more than fatherly care, which the Lord God Almighty takes of his people, is represented in scripture by this extraordinary provision made for the security of the eye: which is one of the finest images that fancy can form, and one of the most

The brows are a kind of natural penthouse, thatched and arched with curious wreaths of hair. The thatch is intended to divert the sweat from trickling into the eyes, and offending them with its brine. The arches are so finely coloured, and so elegantly turned, that they set off the whiteness of the forehead, and bestow additional grace on the whole countenance. Because, in our waking hours, there is almost an incessant call for those little orbs, they run upon a set of the finest casters, rolling upwards or downwards, to the right hand or to the left, with the utmost speed and with equal ease; which circumstance, added to the flexibility of the neck, renders our two eyes as useful, as if the whole body, like the living creatures in St. John's vision, was "full of eyes before and behind." (Rev. iv. 6.)

The ear consists of an outward porch and inner rooms, with tools of the most admirable contrivance and finished workmanship. The contrivance and the workmanship incomparably nicer than the designs of Palladio, or the architecture of Solomon's temple, though the former were drawn from the magnificent monuments of Rome, though the latter was built in the taste of heaven. Yea, so consummately nice is the structure of this organ, that God, the only wise God, is not ashamed to be called its artificer, "He that planted the ear," (Psal. xciv. 9.) is to be found among the titles of the exalted Jehovah. In one very remarkable peculiarity, this minute fabric resembles that sacred edifice, the porch being loftier* than any other part of the building.

The porch I call that semicircular lodge which stands somewhat prominent from the head, and is—not soft and sinking as flesh, lest it should absorb the sound rather than promote the repercussion; not hard and stubborn as bone, lest it should occasion painful inconveniences, when we repose ourselves on either side; but of a cartilaginous substance, covered with a tight expansion of skin, and wrought into irregular bends and hollows, which, like circling hills, or surrounding rocky shores, collect the wandering undulations of the air, and transmit them, with a vigorous impulse, to the finely stretched membrane of the tympanum.† The avenue, or narrow entry, is secured from the insinuating attempts of little insects, by a morass (shall I say?) of bitter and viscous matter; disgusting to their taste, and embarrassing to their feet. The hammer and the anvil, the stirrup and the drum, the winding labyrinth,* and the sounding galleries; these and other pieces of mechanism, all instrumental to the power of hearing, are beyond all description curious.

Amazingly nice must be the formation, and inconceivably exact the tension of the auditory nerves; since they correspond with the smallest tremors of the atmosphere, and easily distinguish their most subtle variations. With the gentle gales that fan us, or even with the ruder blasts that assault us, these delicate strings are but little affected; whereas they are perfect unisons with those fine, those significant agitations of the air, which the acutest touch is unable to discern. These living chords, tuned by an almighty hand, and diffused through the echoing isles, and sonorous cells—these receive the impressions of sound, and propagate them to the brain: These‡ give existence to the charms of music, and reciprocate the rational entertainments of discourse. These treat my Aspasio with the melody of the woodland choirs, and afford me the superior pleasure of my friend's conversation.

The eye perceives only the objects that are before it, whereas the ear warns us of transactions that pass above us, behind us, all around us. The eye is useless amidst the gloom of night, and cannot carry its observation through the bolted door, or the closed window-shutter; but the ear admits her intelligence through the darkest medium, and the minutest cranny. The eye is upon duty only in our waking hours; but the ear is always expanded, and always accessible; a courier which never tires, a centry ever in his box. To secure a resource, in case any misfortune should dis-air, as the covering of the war-drum is by the impressions of the stick. It is also furnished with braces, which strain or relax it at pleasure, and accommodate its tension either to loud or languid sounds.

* Of this kind is the auditory tube, intended to soften and qualify the rushing sound; lest, if the incursion were direct, it might be too impetuous, and injure the delicate expense of the tympanum. While this is designed to moderate, the concavities of the inner structure are prepared to heighten and invigorate the sound, by calling in the auxiliary force of an echo. Such intentions, so varying, nay, so opposite, concur to form this admirable organ.

† Elegantly styled "the daughters of music." For this phrase may refer as well to the organs which distinguish, as to those which form, the harmonious accents, Eccl. xii. 4. Methinks, I am always desirous to add any apposite expression, or parallel passage, from the Bible; as I find, writers of taste and politeness are studious to embellish their work with quotations from the Classics. And I persuade myself, the reader will allow me to gratify this favourite inclination: because every portion of that inestimable book, however minute, is like the filices of gold, or the sparks of a diamond; is sure, when properly applied, to add worth, and impart beauty.

consolatory truths that faith can believe. "He kept him as the apple of his eye." Deut. xxxii. 10. "He that toucheth you, toucheth the apple of his eye." Zech. ii. 8. The reader will easily see that the comparison, every way beautiful, is carried to the highest pitch of energy and beauty by the sacred writers. Not barely the eye, but the apple or pupil of the eye; the tenderest part even of the most tender member.

able one of the hearing or seeing organs, our all-gracious Maker has given us duplicates of each.

As there are tremulous concussions impressed upon the air, discernible only by the instruments of hearing; there are also odoriferous particles, wafted by the same aerial vehicle, which are perceivable only by the smell. The nostrils are wide at the bottom, that a large quantity of effluvia may enter; narrow at the top, that, when entered they may close their ranks, and act with greater vigour. Fine beyond all imagination are the steams which exhale from the fetid or fragrant bodies. The very best microscopes, which discover thousands and thousands of animalculæ in a drop of putrefied water, cannot bring one individual among all these evanescent legions to our sight. They sail in numberless squadrons, close to our eyes, close by our ears; yet are so amazingly attenuated, that they elude the search of both. Nevertheless, so judiciously are the olfactory nets laid,* and so artfully their meshes sized, that they catch these vanishing fugitives. They catch the roaming perfumes which fly off from the opening honey-suckle; and take in the stationed sweets which hover round the expanded rose. They imbibe all the balmy fragrance of spring, all the aromatic exhalations of autumn, and enable us to banquet even on the invisible dainties of nature.

Furnished with these several organs,

* The keenness and sagacity of this sense furnished the evangelical prophet with a beautiful metaphor, to display the accuracy of the Messiah's judgment in spiritual things, Isa. xi. 3.

The original implies his faculty or sense of smelling: which expression is accommodated to our language, and properly enough translated, "shall make him of quick understanding," q. d. "He shall judge, not according to external appearance, but according to the state of the inner man. Unfeigned self-abasement, affiance in a Redeemer's righteousness, and faith purifying the heart; these endowments, though not observed, or if observed not valued by the world; these shall be the test of his approbation, and the objects of his esteem. These constitute what is called in the next words, the fear of the Lord.

† In determining the reality of these qualities, he shall be unerring exact, and infallibly true. Let hypocrisy put on every mask, and practise all her wiles, they shall avail nothing before the Root and Offspring of David. (ver. 1.) As those extremely subtle effluvia, which escape the inquisition of every other sense, are easily and perfectly distinguished by the smell; so those recesses of the breast, and those secrets of the heart which lie too deep for all human discernment; even they are naked and open, are obvious and palpable, to his divinely sagacious understanding.

† See that very elegant poem, "The Pleasures of Imagination" book 3.

of which, the food that supports our body, feasts our palate; first treats us with a pleasing regale, then distributes its beneficial recruits. The razor, whetted with oil, becomes more exquisitely keen. The saliva, flowing upon the tongue, and moistening its nerves, quickens them into the liveliest acts of sensation. This sense is circumstanced in a manner peculiarly benign and wise, so as to be a standing, though silent plea for temperance. Without recurring to the vengeance of God, or the terrors of eternal judgment, it is a powerful dissuasive from irregular and excessive indulgences; because the exercise of sobriety sets the finest edge on its faculties, and adds the most poignant relish to its enjoyments: Whereas, riot and voluptuousness pall the appetite, blunt its sensibility, and render the gratifications extremely languid, if not perfectly insipid. The sight, the smell, the taste, are not only so many separate sources of delight, but a joint security to our health. They are the vigilant and accurate inspectors, which examine our food, and inquire into its properties, whether it be pleasant or disagreeable, wholesome or noxious. For the discharge of this office they are excellently qualified, and most commodiously situated; so that nothing can gain admission through the mouth, till it has undergone the scrutiny, and obtained the passport of them all.

To all these, as a most necessary and advantageous supplement, is added the sense of feeling, which renders the whole assemblage complete. While other senses have a particular place of residence, this is diffused throughout the whole body. In the palms of the hands, on the tips of the fingers, and indeed through all the extreme parts of the flesh, it is most quick and lively; as the advanced guards, or scouts upon the frontiers, are, or ought to be, peculiarly attentive and wakeful. Scouts did I say? The whole army of Xerxes, drawn out in battle array, with his millions of supernumerary attendants,* were but like a few gleaners straggling in the field, if compared, either in number or order, with those nervous detachments, which pervade the texture of the skin, and minister to the act of feeling. How happily is this sense tempered between the two extremes! Neither so acute as the membranes of the eye, nor so obtuse as the callus of the heel. The former would expose us to continual pain, render our clothes galling, and the very down oppressive: The latter would quite benumb the body, and almost annihilate the touch. Nor this alone, but all the senses are most exactly adapted to their respective offices, and to the exigencies of our present state. Were they strained to a much higher tone, they would be avenues of anguish: Were they relaxed into greater insensibility, they would be so many useless incumbrances.

Asp. How admirable and gracious is this provision, which the blessed God has made, to accommodate us with delightful sensations, and instructive ideas! The taste, the touch and the smell, are somewhat straitened in the extent of their operations. The ear carries on a correspondence with a larger circle of objects; but the sight most amply supplies whatever is wanting in all the other senses. The sight spreads itself to an infinite multitude of bodies, and brings within our notice some of the remotest parts of the universe. The taste the touch, the smell perceive nothing but what is brought to their very doors; whereas the eye extends its observation as far as the orbit of Saturn; nay glances, and in an instant of time, to the inconceivable distance of the stars. The compass of the earth, and the immensity of the skies, are its unlimited range.

From this remarkable variety, with regard to the sphere and activity of the senses, St. Paul forms one of the finest, boldest, and most important comparisons in the world. By this he illustrates the difference between the wisdom which is derived from the word of divine revelation, and the wisdom which is acquired by dint of human application. In his oration to the Athenians, speaking of their most celebrated sages, he says, "If so be they might feel after, and find him." Acts xvii. 27. In his epistle to the Hebrews, speaking of the man Moses, our author observes, that "he endured, as seeing him who is invisible." Heb. xi. 27. Writing to his Corinthian converts, he adds, as a farther heightening of the contrast, "We all beholding with open face the glory of the Lord." 2 Cor. iii. 18. The knowledge of the philosopher is like that obscure and scanty information, which is to be obtained by groping with the hand in a dark night: The knowledge of the Christian is like that copious influx of clear and enlarged ideas, which we receive by the mediation of the eye amidst the shining of a bright day.

Tully, we find, has in the book before us hit upon some of the most general and obvious uses, to which the several parts of the human body are adapted. Yet how superficial and deficient appears his penetration, when we take in the much deeper discoveries and the much higher improvements of our modern anatomy! Thus, and abundantly more defective, is his knowledge of moral duties and divine doctrines, when compared with what is taught us in the plain sermon on the Mount, and the unstudied epistles of the Jewish tent-maker.

Therefore, though I would bless the beneficent God, for the ministration of all the senses, and particularly for the noble organs of vision; I would be more especially thankful for that light of the world, Christ Jesus, and his glorious gospel, as well as for that "spiritual eye," by which the one is understood, and the other seen,—a "lively faith." I would also long for that place of beatific enjoyment, where our views of the adorable Godhead, and our acquaintance with the sublimest truths, will as much transcend all our present apprehensions, as the most enlightened saint exceeds the benighted Gentile.

Ther. The crowning gift—that which improves the satisfaction, and augments the beneficial effects, accruing from all the senses, is speech. Speech makes me a gainer from the eyes and ears of other people; from the ideas they conceive, and the observations they make. And what an admirable instrument for articulating the voice, and modifying it into speech, is the tongue! The tongue has neither bone nor joint; yet fashions itself, with the utmost volubility, into every shape and every posture, which can express sentiment, or constitute harmony. This little collection of muscular fibres, under the conducting skill of the Creator, is the artificer of our words.* By this we communicate the secrets of the breast, and make our very thoughts audible. By this we instruct the ignorant, and comfort the distressed; we glorify God, and edify each other:† the academic explains the abstrusest sciences, and the ecclesiastic preaches the everlasting gospel. This is likewise the efficient of music. It is soft as the lute, or shrill as the trumpet; it can warble as the lyre, or resound like the organ. Connecting the sacred anthem with its tuneful strains, we soothe the cares, and beguile the toils of life; we imitate the angelic choirs, and anticipate in some degree their celestial joys. As the tongue requires full scope and an easy play, it is lodged in an ample cavity, and surrounded with reservoirs of spittle, always ready to distil the lubricating dews. It moves under a con-

* I am sensible that the glottis has a considerable share in modulating the sound, and forming the voice. But as the nature and office of this most curious aperture are very little known by the generality of people; we choose to follow the popular opinion so neatly described by the poet:

Daedala lingua,
"Lingua figuratrix verborum, opiseqxue loquela."
Ant. Lucret.

† The articulating tongue is called "our glory." Psal. lvii. 6. And such indeed it is when devoted to these purposes. It is then a distinction, not only of man from the brutal herd, but of the righteous from the congregation of the ungodly. It is then like choice silver, or a tree of life.

"Who would not bless for this the gift of speech, And in the tongue's beneficence be rich?"

cave roof, which serves as a sounding-board to the voice; giving it much the same additional vigour and grace as the shell of a violin adds to the language of the strings.

Wise, wonderfully wise and eminently gracious, is the regulation both of spontaneous and involuntary motion. Was this regulation reversed, what deplorable inconveniences would take place; nay, what unavoidable ruin must ensue! Deplorable inconveniences; if the discharges of the bowels, or evacuations of the bladder, were quite independent on our leave. Unavoidable ruin; if the action of the heart required the co-operation of our thoughts, or the business of respiration waited for the concurrence of our will.

The will, in some cases, has not so much as a single vote; in others, she determines and commands like an absolute sovereign: Nor is there a monarch upon earth so punctually obeyed, as this queen of the human system. If she but intimate her pleasure, the spirits run, they fly to execute her orders; to stretch the arm, or close the hand; to furrow the brow with frowns, or dimple the cheek with smiles. How easily, as well as punctually, are these orders carried into execution! To turn the screw, or work the lever, is laborious and wearisome: But we move the vertebræ, with all their appendent chambers; we advance the leg, with the whole incumbent body; we rise from our seat; we spring from the ground; and though much force is exerted, though a very considerable weight is raised, we meet with no difficulty, we complain of no fatigue.

That all this should be effected, without any toil, and by a bare act of the will, is very surprising: But that these motions should be made, renewed, continued, even while we remain entirely ignorant of the manner in which they are performed, is beyond measure astonishing. Who can play so much as a single tune upon the spinnet, without learning the difference of the keys, or studying the rudiments of music? Impossible! Yet the mind of man touches every spring of the human machine with the most masterly skill, though she knows nothing at all concerning the nature of her implements, or the process of her operations. We walk, we run, we leap: we throw ourselves into a variety of postures, and perform a multitude of motions; yet are utterly unable to say, which nerve should be active, which muscle should swell, or which tendon approximate.

Put a German flute into the hand even of a sensible person, without a master to instruct him, he is at a loss to make the instrument speak; much less is he able to sink and soften the sound, to exalt and extend it, just as he pleases: Yet we are self-taught in the method of forming, regulating, and varying the voice. Naturally, and with unpremeditated fluency, we give it the languishing cadence of sorrow, or the sprightly airs of joy; the low faltering accents of fear, or the elevated tone and rapid sallies of anger.

The eye of a rustic, who has no notion of optics, or any of its laws, shall lengthen and shorten its axis, dilate and contract its pupil, without the least hesitation, and with the utmost propriety; adapting itself, even with mathematical exactness, to the particular distance of objects, and the different degrees of light: By which means, it performs some of the most curious experiments in the improved Newtonian philosophy, without the least knowledge of the science, or so much as any consciousness of its own dexterity.

I can never sufficiently admire this multiplicity of animated organs; their finished form, and their faultless order. Yet I must confess myself struck with greater admiration at the power, the truly mysterious power and sway, which the soul exercises over them. Ten thousand reins are put into her hand: she is not acquainted with their office, their use or their name; she has not learned so much as to distinguish one from another; nevertheless she manages all, conducts all, without the least perplexity, or the least irregularity; rather with a promptitude, a consistency, and a speed, which nothing else can equal!

Upon the whole—great reason had Euripides to call the human body,

Σοφὴ τεκτονὸς καλὸν ποικίλμα.

I believe, the preceding observations will justify us, if we give a fuller meaning to the poet, and translate his words—"the infinitely varied, and inimitably fine workmanship of a great, supreme, unerring Artist." Or, as Virgil speaks, with a pertinency and a spirit which epitomises all I have said, and expresses all I would say, this bodily structure is indeed—"non enarrabile textum."*

Asp. "Wonderfully," I perceive, "and fearfully are we made," (Psalm cxxxix. 14.) Made of such complicated parts; each so correctly fashioned, and all so exactly arranged; † every one executing such curious functions, and many of them operating in so mysterious a manner, as may justly render us a wonder to ourselves. Since health

* That is, a structure, not barely correct, or highly finished, but (as Theron has elsewhere expressed it) "beyond description curious."

† St. Paul's language on the subject, is exceedingly beautiful and expressive, Συναρμοσθημεν καὶ συμβιβασθημεν. Eph. iv. 16. The several parts most nicely adapted to each other, and most perfectly harmonizing with the whole. All associated with that propriety, and connected with that firmness, which are the very foundation of symmetry, vigour, and agility.

depends upon such a numerous assemblage of moving organs; since a single secretion stopped may destroy the salutary temperature of the fluids; or a single wheel clogged may put an end to the vital motion of the solids; with what "holy fear should we pass the time of our sojourning here below," (Pet. i. 17.) trusting, for continual preservation, not merely on our own care, but on that omnipotent hand which formed the admirable machine; that the same hand which formed it, may superintend its agency, and support its being.

When we consider the extensive contrivance and delicate mechanism—what plans of geometry have been laid; what operations of chemistry are performed; in a word, what miracles of art and elegance are executed, in order to furnish us with the necessary recruits, and the several delights of life;—is there not abundant reason to cry out, with the same inspired writer, "How dear are thy counsels unto me, O God!" "Thy counsels of creating wisdom! thou hast not been sparing, but even lavish of thy indulgent designs. Thou hast omitted no expedient which might establish my ease, enlarge my comforts, and promote, yea, complete my bodily happiness!" And is not this a most endearing obligation "to glorify the blessed God, with our bodies, as well as with our spirits?" (1 Cor. vi. 20.)

Ther. "Our spirits!" Ay; What is this mansion of flesh, though so exquisitely wrought, compared with the noble and immortal inhabitant which resides within?

—That intellectual Being;
Those thoughts, which wander through eternity!
MILTON.

This consideration inclines me to think, that if the casket be so highly polished, the jewel cannot be so excessively coarse as my Aspasio's doctrine of original corruption supposes.

Asp. I perceive your aim, Theron; but must beg leave at present to decline all overtures for a dispute. If my arguments have failed, your description has answered its end. I cannot suffer my thoughts to be diverted from a subject which is so very engaging, yet so rarely discussed. I have such a strong desire to recollect and retain what has been observed, that even your conversation will at this juncture lose its relish. Here, therefore, I put a period to our discourse, and must break away from your company, in order to ruminate and digest my notions in some sequestered lonely walk. Unless you will permit me, before I retire, to make one remark. And let it not startle my friend if I venture to say, that, amidst all his curious observations, he has forgot the principal circumstance of honour and excellence which dignifies the human body.

Ther. I have omitted many fine and admirable properties I confess. But sure I have not forgot the principal and most distinguishing.

Asp. You need not be displeas'd with yourself. It argues no defect in your dissertation. The circumstances I have in my view could never be discovered by following the dissecting knife. It is learned, not from Cheselden's draughts, or the tables of Albinus, but from the word of revelation.—What I mean is this: the human body was exalted to a most intimate and personal union with the eternal Son of God. He who decorated the heaven with stars, and crowned the stars with lustre, "he vouchsafed to be made flesh," (John. i. 14.) "and was found in fashion as a man," (Phil. ii. 8.) Nay, this is even now the apparel of that divine and adorable Person. He is clothed with our nature; he wears our very limbs, and appears in the dress of humanity, even at the right hand of God, and at the head of all the heavenly hosts.

What think you of another privilege, mentioned by the apostle? "Your bodies are the temple of the Holy Ghost," (1 Cor. vi. 19.) Not your souls only, but your very bodies are the shrine in which "the high and holy One that inhabiteth eternity," condescends to dwell. He who sitteth between the cherubim, and walketh in the circuit of the skies, is pleased to sanctify these earthly tenements for his own habitation. And is not this a much grander embellishment than all their matchless contrivance and masterly workmanship? Just as the rod which budded, and the manna which was miraculously preserved; the sacred oracle of Urim and Thummim, with the cloud of glory covering the mercy-seat; were a much higher distinction to Solomon's temple, than the most heightened beauties of architecture.

Nor must I omit the dignity, the transcendent and amazing dignity, which is reserved for these systems of flesh at the resurrection of the just. They will then be refined and improved into the most perfect state, and the most beautiful form; surpassing whatever is resplendent and amiable in the most ornamental appearances of material nature. They will be purer than the unspotted firmament; brighter than the lustre of the stars; and, which exceeds all parallel, which comprehends all perfection, they will "be made like unto Christ's glorious body," (Phil. iii. 21.) like that incomparably-glorious body which the blessed Jesus wears in his celestial kingdom, and on his triumphant throne.

When we add all these magnificent prerogatives which are revealed in scripture, to all those inimitable niceties which are displayed by anatomists, what thankfulness, what admiration, can equal such a profusion of favours ?

When all thy mercies, O my God,
My rising soul surveys,
Transported with the view, I'm lost
In wonder, love, and praise!

DIALOGUE XIII.

THE morning had been wet. At noon, the rain ceased ; but the heavens still continued gloomy. Towards evening a gentle eastern gale sprung up, which dissipated the dead calm, and cleared the face of the sky. The sun, which had been muffled in clouds, dropped the veil. Disengaged from the dusky shroud, he shone forth with peculiar splendour. His beams, endeared by their late suspension, were doubly welcome, and produced unusual gaiety.

At this juncture Theron and Aspasio walked abroad. They walked alternately on the terraces ; one of which was opposite to the country, the other contiguous to the parterre ; where the gales, impregnated with the freshest exhalations of nature, breathed the smell of meads, and heaths, and groves ; or else, shaking the clusters of roses, and sweeping the beds of fragrance, they flung balm and odours through the air.

At a distance were heard the bleatings of the flock, mingled with the lowings of the milky mothers ; while more melodious music warbled from the neighbouring boughs, and spoke aloud the joy of their feathered inhabitants ;—and not only spoke their joy, but spread an additional charm over all the landscape. For, amidst such strains of native harmony, the breathing perfumes smell more sweet, the streaming rills shine more clear, and the universal prospect looks more gay.

Then was experienced, what Milton so delicately describes :

If chance the radiant sun with farewell sweet
Extend his evening beam, the fields revive,
The birds their notes renew, and bleating herds
Attest their joy, that hill and valley rings.

With wonder and delight our friends observed both the exquisite beauty and the immense magnificence of things.—They were struck with the most profound veneration of that almighty Majesty, who hung the sun in vaults of azure, and clothed his orb with robes of lustre ; “ whose right hand spanneth the heavens,” (Isaiah xlviii. 13,) “ and stretcheth them out as a tent,” for innumerable creatures, worlds, systems “ to dwell in.” (Isaiah xl. 22.)—Charmed they were at the consideration of the Creator’s boundless beneficence ; who lifts up the light of his countenance, and joy is shed ; who opens his munificent hand, and plenty is poured throughout all the regions of the universe. Insomuch, that even inanimate beings seem to smile under a sense of the blessings ; and though they find not a tongue to praise, yet speak their acclamations by their gladdened looks.

Ther. How very different, Aspasio, is this delightful appearance of things, from your ill-favoured doctrine of original guilt and original depravity ! Your doctrine is a contradiction to the language of nature. Nature says, through all her works, “ that God is good, and men are made to be happy.” Whereas, your opinion would turn the whole world into a vast hospital, and make every individual person a leper or a Lazarus

Asp. I join with my Theron, and with universal nature, in bearing witness to the goodness of our God. And nothing, I am persuaded, displays it more, nothing manifests it so much, as the doctrine of our fall in Adam, connected with our recovery in Christ.—Only in one particular I am obliged to dissent. It is not my opinion that would make, but the sin of our forefather which has made, the whole world an infirmary, and every individual person a leper.

Ther. At this rate, you would crowd into that single act of disobedience, evils more numerous, and more fatal, than the plagues which were lodged in Pandora’s box, or the troops which were stowed in the Trojan horse.

Asp. Far more numerous, and infinitely more pernicious. The fable of Pandora’s box seems to have been a shred of the doctrine, picked up by the heathen wits, and fashioned according to their sportive fancy : This would, if there was any occasion for such weak assistance, bring in the Pagan theology, as a subsidiary evidence to our cause. The Trojan horse poured ruin upon a single city ; but the primitive transgression entailed misery upon all generations.

Ther. You have advanced this heavy charge pretty strenuously, I must confess ; but without descending to facts, or appealing to experience. All the invectives are general and declamatory, none pointing and particular.

Asp. It is easy, my dear friend, too easy to draw up a particular bill of indictment ; and not only to specify the facts, but to demonstrate the charge. Experience, sad experience will furnish us with a cloud of witnesses, and prove my remonstrances to be more than invectives.

Were we to dissect human nature, as in our last conference you treated the animal system, we should find the leprosy of corruption spreading itself through our whole frame. For which reason, it is styled, by an inspired writer, “ the old man.” (Rom. vi. 6.) “ Old,” because in its commencement it was early as the fall, and in its communication to individuals is coeval with their being. "Man," because it has tainted the body, infected the soul, and disordered the whole person.

St. Paul, describing a profligate conversation, speaks in this remarkable manner: "fulfilling the desires of the flesh and of the mind." Eph. ii. 3. By the desires of the flesh, he means those irregular inclinations which correspond with the animal part of our constitution: By the desires of the mind, he denotes those evil propensities which are more immediately seated in the intellectual faculties. And by both, he very strongly expresses the total depravation of our nature.

Ther. What you call evil propensities, I am apt to think are not really sinful, but appointed for the trial of our virtue. Nay, since they are confessedly natural, they cannot be in themselves evil; because, upon this supposition, God, who is the author of our nature, would be the author also of our sin.

Asp. Then you imagine, that propensities to evil are void of guilt. This is the Popish notion, but neither the Mosaic nor the Apostolic doctrine.—In the law of Moses it is written, "Thou shalt not covet." Exod. xx. 17. The divine Legislator prohibits, not only the iniquitous practice, but the evil desire. The apostle gives it in charge to the Colossians, "Mortify your members, which are upon the earth: fornication, uncleanness, inordinate affection, and" which is the source of all, "evil concupiscence." Col. iii. 5. Now, can that be free from guilt which we are commanded to mortify? which, if not mortified, denominates us "children of disobedience," and subjects us to "the wrath of God?" Col. iii. 6.

Though these propensities are confessedly natural, they may be evil notwithstanding. The sacred writers oppose what is natural to what is spiritual. Instead of commending it as innocent, they condemn it as "foolish," 1 Cor. ii. 14, "base," 2 Pet. ii. 12, and "criminal," Eph. ii. 3.—Neither does this make the author of our nature, the author of our sin. But it proves, that our nature has sustained a deplorable loss; that it is quite different from its original state; that what is spoken of the Israelitish people, is applicable to the human race: "I planted thee a noble vine, wholly a right seed: how then art thou turned into the degenerate plant of a strange vine?" Jer. ii. 21.

However, let us observe your proposal; dwell no longer on general hints, but descend to a particular examination. As our examination will chiefly respect the soul, let me inquire what are her principal faculties?

Ther. The understanding, the will, and the affections. These are the most distinguishing powers which that queen of the human economy retains in her service. These, like the several distributions of some ample river, run through the whole man, to quicken, fertilize, and enrich all his conversation. But you represent them bitter, as the waters of Marah; unwholesome, as the streams of Jericho; noxious, as the pottage prepared for the sons of the prophets.

Asp. Nor is this a misrepresentation: For such they really are, till divine grace, like Moses' wood, Exod. xv. 25, like Elisha's salt, 2 Kings ii. 21, 22, or the meal, 2 Kings iv. 41, cast in by that holy man of God, sweeten them, heal them, and render their operations salutary.

The understanding claims our first regard. This, however qualified to serve the purposes of civil life, is unable to discover the truths in which wisdom consists, or to form the tempers from which happiness flows.

Let us take our specimen, not from the uncultivated savages of Africa, but from the politest nation in Europe. The Grecians piqued themselves on their intellectual accomplishments: They termed all the rest of mankind barbarians. Yet even these sons of science, "professing themselves wise, were," in fact, egregious "fools." Rom. i. 22. Not to enumerate the shocking immoralities which the poets ascribed to their deities; not to insist upon the gross idolatries which the common people practised in their worship; even their philosophers, the most improved and penetrating geniuses, were unacquainted with the very first principle* of true religion. Even they could not pronounce with an unflinching tongue, "That God is one."

Ther. With regard to the philosophers, the prejudices of a wrong education might pervert their judgment; or, in compliance with the prevailing mode, they might adopt customs, and assent to notions, which they did not thoroughly approve.

Asp. A poor compliment this to their integrity! Had I been their advocate, methinks, I would have given up the sagacity of my clients, rather than their fidelity to the cause of God and truth.

With reference to the supreme Good, they were equally at a loss. There is not one among all the inferior creatures, not even the crawling worm or the buzzing fly, but perceives what is beneficial, and pur-

* "The first of all the commandments is, Hear O Israel, The Lord our God is one Lord; and thou shalt love the Lord, &c. Mark xii. 29. From which it appears, that the unity of the Godhead is the foundation of all the divine commandments, and of all human worship.

sues it; discerns what is pernicious, and avoids it. Yonder caterpillar, whose nourishment is from one particular species of vegetables, never makes a wrong application to another; never is allured by the fragrance of the auricula, or dazzled by the splendour of the tulip; but constantly distinguishes, and as constantly adheres to the leaf which affords her the proper food. So sagacious are the meaneast animals with relation to their respective happiness! While the most celebrated of the heathen sages were, on a subject of the very same import, mere dotards. Varro reckons up no less than two hundred and eighty-eight different opinions concerning the true good; and not one of them derives it from the true source: I mean a conformity to the ever-blessed God, and an enjoyment of his infinite perfections.

If on these leading points they were so erroneous, no wonder that they were bewildered in their other researches.

Ther. We are not inquiring into the circumstances of this or that particular nation, but into the state of mankind in general.

Asp. Cast your eye, Theron, upon those swallows. They shoot themselves with surprising rapidity, through the air. I should take them for so many living arrows, were it not for their shifting, winding, wanton motions. Are not these what you call birds of passage?

Ther. These, and some other of the feathered race, are our constant visitants in summer, but leave us at the approach of winter. As soon as the weather becomes cold, they assemble themselves in a body, and concert measures for their departure. Who convenes the assembly—what debates arise—or how they communicate the resolution taken—I do not presume to say. This is certain, that not one of them dislodges till the affair is settled, and the proclamation has been published. Not a single loiterer is to be seen, when the troops are preparing for their decampment, not a single straggler to be found, when they have once begun their march.—Having finished their journey through the land, their wings become a sort of sails, and they launch, not into, but over the ocean. Without any compass to regulate their course, or any chart to make observations in their voyage, they arrive safely at the desired shore; and what is still more extraordinary, they always find the readiest way, and the shortest cut.

Asp. “The stork in the heavens knoweth her appointed times; and the turtle, and the crane, and the swallow, observe the time of their coming: but my people know not the judgment of their God,” (Jer. viii. 7.) The young ones of those birds perceive how absolutely necessary it is to forsake the land of their nativity, and travel in quest of milder climes; but our offspring, even when their minds begin to open, “are brutish in their knowledge,” (Jer. x. 14.) Born they are, and too long continue, “like the wild ass’s colt,*” (Job. xi. 12.); not only quite destitute of heavenly wisdom, but stupid to apprehend it, and averse to receive it. “As soon as they are born, they go astray,” and—

Ther. “Go astray”—To what is this owing, but to the bad examples they behold? They catch the wayward habit from the irregular conversation of others.

Asp. Is not this a confirmation of my point? Why are they yielding clay to each bad impression? case-hardened steel to every edifying application?—From imitating unworthy examples, you can hardly withhold them by the tightest rein. But if you would affect them with a sense of divine things, or bring them acquainted with God their Maker; “line must be upon line, line upon line; precept must be upon precept, precept upon precept; here a little and there a little.†” What farther corroborates my sentiment, is, that all these tender toils of erudition are generally unwelcome, are too often unsuccessful, nay, will always be ineffectual, without the concurrence of Almighty grace.

Besides, Theron, if this propensity to evil be observable in all children, it seems more than probable that the unhappy bias is derived from their parents, rather than caught from their neighbours; and owing not to the influence of external examples, but to a principle of internal corruption.‡ —Neglect the education of children, and you are sure to have their manners evil, their lives unprofitable. Nay, only remit your endeavours, and they lose what has been gained, they start aside like a broken

* How keenly is this comparison pointed!—Like the ass’s, an animal remarkable for its stupidity, even to a proverb:—Like the ass’s colt, which must be still more egregiously stupid than the dam.—Like the wild ass’s colt, which is not only blockish, but stubborn and refractory: neither possesses valuable qualities by nature, nor will easily receive them by discipline.—The image, in the original, is yet more strongly touched. The comparative particle like, is not in the Hebrew—born a wild ass’s colt: or, as we should say in English, a mere wild, &c.

† A great critic has laid down the following rule, to be observed in fine writing:

’Tis not enough no harshness gives offence,
The sound must be an echo to the sense.

POPE’S Essay on Criticism.

Never was this delicate maxim more nicely exemplified, than in the above cited passage of Isaiah, chap. xxviii. 13. Another instance of the same kind occurs in the seventh verse; where the language seems to mimic the reeling, straggling, giddy motions of a drunkard; while it iterates and reiterates the idea; expresses the same thing in a different and still different manner; with an apparent, and in this case, a significant circumrotation of words.

‡ St. Paul confesses, that he and his fellow-saints were, in their unconverted state, depraved: and this, not δια τῆν ἕξιν, “by custom or habit,” but φύσει, “by nature.” Eph. ii. 3.

bow. And wherefore this? Why do they not, without the rules of discipline or lessons of instruction, spontaneously addict themselves to the exercise of every virtue? just as the cygnets in yonder canal, spontaneously take to the element of water, and the act of swimming?

That bed in the garden before us will suggest the reason. It has been digged and dressed this very day. It now lies smooth and clean. Not a single weed appears on its surface. Yet how certainly will it, in a very little time, produce a plenteous growth of those vegetable nuisances? Whence can this proceed? No hand will sow them; no wish will invite them. But the seeds, though unperceived by any eye, are already there. Disseminated by the winds, they have mixed themselves with the mould, and are sunk into the soil. So, just so it is with our children. The seeds of iniquity are within them; and unless proper diligence be exerted by us, unless gracious assistance be vouchsafed from above, they will assuredly spring up, overrun their souls, and dishonour their lives.

Ther. Let us leave the children, and make men the subject of our inquiry.

Asp. In this respect, Theron,

Men are but children of a larger growth.

We may leave the vest or hanging-sleeve coat, but we shall still find the follies of the child. In youth, what low ambition and fondness for despicable pleasures! In manhood, what a keen pursuit of transitory wealth, yet what a cold inattention to God and holiness! Men, and men too of the greatest abilities, whose penetration on other subjects is piercing as the eagle's sight, are on the most important points blind as the incaverned mole.

Ther. What! is the understanding like the most dim-sighted animal, when lodged in her darkest retirement? that sublime faculty of the soul, which lends her eye to all the rest, sits at the helm, and directs their motions!

Asp. You remember, I presume, that beautiful passage in Milton,* which Mr. Addison so highly admires, and so judiciously illustrates: The passage, I mean, where the archangel Michael comes down to advertise Adam of future events, and to execute the sentence of divine justice.

Ther. I remember it perfectly well.—In the east, the great light of day lies under an eclipse. In the west, a bright cloud descends, filled with an host of angels, and more luminous than the sun itself. The whole theatre of nature is darkened, that this glorious machine may appear in all its magnificence and beauty. From this radiant chariot the Potentate of heaven alights, and advances with a majestic stateliness to meet Adam.

Asp. Should you see such an august personage alighting from such a splendid chariot, and walking amidst the thronged streets of a city; should you behold every one intent upon his business or diversions, struck with no awe, paying no reverential regard to this celestial visitant—what would you think?

Ther. I should certainly suspect that some superior power had drawn a veil over their sight, and hid this wonderful spectacle from their view.

Asp. Such is really the case with all mankind by nature, and with the generality of people during their whole life. God, the infinitely great God, is in every place. Yet how few advert to his presence?—All nature exhibits him to their senses, yet perhaps he is not in any of their thoughts.

The sun, clothed in transcendent brightness, most illustriously displays his Maker's glory. The moon, though dressed in fainter beams, has lustre enough to show us the adorable Deity, and his marvellous perfections. The stars, fixed as they are at an immeasurable distance, and lessened almost to a point, come in with their evidence, and magnify their Creator to a gazing but unaffected world.

The air whispers his clemency in the gentle, the refreshing gales of spring. If we take no notice of this soft persuasive address, the tone is elevated, the majesty of Jehovah sounds aloud in roaring winds and rending storms. Yet both expedients fail. Man is like the deaf adder, that stoppeth her ears. He refuseth to hear the voice of the charmers, charm they never so sweetly, never so forcibly.

Each flower, arrayed in beauty, and breathing perfume, courts our affections for its infinitely amiable Author.—Not a bird that warbles, not a brook that murmurs, but invites our praise, or chides our ingratitude. All the classes of fruits deposit their attestation on our palates, yet seldom reach our hearts. They give us a proof of the divine benignity; a proof as undeniable as it is pleasing, and too often as ineffectual also.

In short, the whole creation is a kind of magnificent embassy from its almighty Lord, deputed to proclaim his excellencies, and demand our homage. Yet who has not disregarded the former, and withheld the latter?—How few walk as seeing him that is invisible, or have fellowship with the Father of spirits? though to walk before him is our highest dignity; and to have fellowship with him is our only felicity?

Ther. This is owing to inattention, rather than to any blindness or defect in man's understanding The many works of genius, which have been produced in various ages, are an abundant proof of his intellectual capacity.—Have not the seas been traversed and the skies measured? Has not the earth been disembowelled of its choicest treasures, while its surface is beautified with towns, cities, palaces innumerable? What fine arts are invented and exercised, and to what a pitch of perfection are they carried? Arts that seem, if not to exceed, at least to rival nature. It was the understanding which formed all these great designs. It was the understanding which contrived the means, and conducted the execution. And are not these unquestionable evidences of her very superior abilities?

Asp. Then she is like some great empress, who conquers half the world, but is unable to rule herself; who extends her regulations into foreign climes, while her domestic affairs are involved in confusion.—Do you doubt the reality of this remark? Set yourself to meditate upon the most interesting truths. How desultory, how incoherent are your thoughts?—Charge them to be collected; they disobey your orders. Rally the undisciplined vagrants; again they desert the task. Exert all your power, and keep them close to their business; still they elude your endeavours.

The other day I could not forbear smiling at a little adventure of your youngest son's. Some quicksilver, which happened to be spilt upon the floor, parted in several globules. The shining balls looked so prettily, he longed to make them his own. But when he offered to take them up, they slipped from his hand; as soon as he renewed the attempt, so often he met with a disappointment; the closer he strove to grasp them, the more speedily they escaped from his fingers: he seemed at first to be amazed, then became quite angry that the little fugitives should so constantly baffle his repeated efforts. Thus unmanageable I very often find my own thoughts. If yours are under no better regimen, this may convince us both, that all is not according to the original creation.

We apply ourselves to converse with the everlasting God in prayer. Here one would expect to have the thoughts all clearness, and all composure. But here "we are not sufficient of ourselves to think any thing as of ourselves. (2 Cor. iii. 5.) All those holy ideas which create reverence, or strengthen faith, or quicken love, come from the Father of lights. Should he withdraw his influence, all will be dull, and dark, and dead. It may be we are somewhat enlivened in this sacred exercise; before we are aware, perhaps in the very midst of the solemn office, our attention is dissipated, and not dissipated only, but scattered to the ends of the earth. The God of all glory is forsaken, and the devotion paid to some senseless foppery. A malefactor begging his life at the knees of his sovereign, and discontinuing his suit in order to caress a lapdog, or pursue a butterfly, is but a faint image of the vanity which attends our devotional services. Reason, which ought to correct these irregularities, is treated like the incredulous lord, who, instead of controlling the unruly multitude, was overborne by their impetuosity, "and trodden under foot." (2 Kings vii. 17.)

Since then the reins are struck out of our hands, and we have lost the rule over our own faculties, surely we are in a state different, very different from our primitive constitution.

Ther. However insensible to refined speculation, the understanding, when interest is in the case, is apprehensive enough.

Asp. In temporal,* not in spiritual affairs.—Your younger brother, Theron, is a merchant. We will suppose him at the sea-side, within a small distance of the vessel in which a considerable part of his substance is embarked. We will suppose the vessel in the utmost distress, ready to founder with her leaks, or to strike upon the rocks. If he discovers no sign of concern, calls in no assistance from the country, makes no effort to save the crew, and secure the cargo, would you not think him bereaved of his understanding, or deprived of his sight? Could you conceive a more favourable opinion of his eyes or his intellect, if, instead of trying every method to prevent a shipwreck, he should amuse himself with picking shells from the ocean, or drawing figures on the sand?

We, and every one of our fellow creatures, have an interest in jeopardy, unspeakably more precious than all the rich lading of a thousand fleets. Our souls, our immortal souls, are exposed, every day, every hour, to the peril of everlasting destruction. Every temptation is threatening to their endless welfare, as a ridge of craggy rocks to a ship that drives before the strongest gale. Yet how unconcerned are mankind? where is their holy fear? where their godly jealousy? where their wakeful circumspection? Rather what a gay insensibility is observable in their behaviour? or else, what a lifeless formality prevails in their supplications—their supplications to that Almighty Being, who alone is able to save and to destroy. Was not the human understanding both darkened and benumbed, we should see our neighbours, we should feel ourselves awakened into much the same earnest solicitude, as the disciples expressed, when, perceiving the waves boisterous, and their bark sinking, they cried, "Lord, save us! we perish!"

* Called therefore by the apostle, "fleshy wisdom," and opposed to the grace of God. 2 Cor. i. 12.

But, alas! in things of an unseen nature, though of eternal consequence, interest, that habitual darling of every heart, loses its engaging influence. Nay, when eternity, all-important eternity is at stake, even self-preservation is scarce any longer a governing principle. What can be more deplorable? and, if we admit not the doctrine of original corruption, what so unaccountable?

Ther. This, I must confess, is true with regard to the unthinking rabble. To them may be accommodated the remark of Augustus, who, when he saw some foreign females carrying apes in their arms instead of infants, said to one of his courtiers, "have the women of those countries no children, that they are so fond of such despicable animals?"—The vulgar are so immersed in secular cares, that one might indeed be tempted to ask, "have those people no souls, that buying and selling, eating and drinking, engross their whole concern?" But persons of rank and education think in a more exalted manner.

Asp. Do you then imagine, that an elevation of circumstances sets the affections on things above? or that it is the peculiar infelicity of the vulgar to grovel in their desires? Gold, I believe is more likely to increase than to dissipate the fog on the mind. Abundance of possessions, instead of disengaging the heart, fasten it more inseparably to the earth. Even superior attainments in learning, if not sanctified by grace, serve only to render the owner somewhat more refined in his follies. But comparisons between the various classes of mankind, are as useless as they are invidious. None, in either condition, attend to the things which make for their peace, till they are awakened from their lethargy, by the quickening Spirit of Christ; and even then we cannot but observe evident indications of much remaining blindness.

How apt are such persons to mistake the way of salvation, to place their own works for a foundation of hope, instead of Christ the Rock of Ages, thinking by their own performances to win, not seeking from unmerited grace to receive, the inheritance of eternal glory; which is more absurdly vain than to offer toys as an equivalent for thrones, or to dream of purchasing diadems with a mite.—They are also prone to misapprehend the nature of holiness, are zealous to regulate the external conduct, without attending to the renovation of the heart; in outward forms elaborate; with respect to inward sanctity, less if at all exact: a labour just as preposterous, as to skin over the surface of a wound while it festers at the bottom, and consumes the bone.

Give me leave to ask, Theron, when our Lord declares, "Unless a man be born again, he cannot enter into the kingdom of heaven;" John iii. 3; when he speaks of "eating his flesh, and drinking his blood;" John vi. 54.; when you hear or read of union with the blessed Jesus, or communion with the most high God; is there not a cloud, if not total darkness, on your mind? How erroneous was the Psalmist himself in his judgment concerning the divine dispensals; "So foolish was I and ignorant, even as it were a beast," or as the veriest beast, "before thee."† Psalm lxxii. 22. The voice of experience therefore will attest, what the word of revelation has averred,—that the natural man, be his intellectual abilities ever so pregnant, or ever so improved, "cannot know the things of the Spirit of God;" 1 Cor. ii. 14; he has no sight to discern their beauty, no taste to relish their sweetness. Nay, though they are the purest light, and the most perfect wisdom, ‡ to him they appear not only dark and obscure, but even foolishness itself.

Would this be the case if the understanding was not greatly depraved? Should it be difficult for your ear to distinguish the diversity of sounds, or for your eye to discern the variety of colours, would you not conclude, that the organs were very much impaired?

Ther. I think you have treated the understanding as Zopyrus served his own body,§ when he went over to the enemy. Do you intend to mangle the other faculties at the same unmerciful rate?

Asp. That nobleman made the wounds which disfigured his flesh; I have only probed the sores which were found in the understanding. If I have touched the quick, and put the patient to pain, it is only to facilitate the operation of medicine, and make way for a cure.—But permit me to ask, Wherein does the excellency of the human will consist?

Ther. In following the guidance of rea-

* With regard to the mysteries of Christ, the greatest proficients are but abuse acuti, dull even in their acuteness.—What says the wise Augur? an invaluable fragment of whose works is preserved in the book of Proverbs. "Surely I am more brutish than any man, and have not the understanding of a man;" even though the following verses bespeak the very singular elevation and extent of his knowledge, Prov. xxx. 2. Conformably to the experience of this excellent man, I have always observed, that the more enlightened people are, the more they lament their ignorance; the more they pant after a continual progress in heavenly knowledge; and pray for clearer, still clearer manifestations of the incomprehensible God.

† I question whether Aspasio's translation comes fully up to the emphasis of the original. The comparative particle is omitted in the Hebrew, as it softens and palliates the matter. Therefore the Psalmist, to express the deepest sense of his ignorance, says, "I was a beast, yea, the veriest beast."

‡ See Rollin's Ancient Hist. vol. iii. p. 46.

son, and submitting to the influence of proper authority.

Asp. The will, I fear, rejects the government of reason; and it is undeniably certain, that it rebels against the authority of God.

Cast your eye upon that team of horses, with which yonder countryman is ploughing his fallow-ground. No less than five of those robust animals are linked together, and yield their submissive necks to the draught. They have more strength than twenty men, yet are managed by a single lad. They not only stand in awe of the lash, but listen to the voice of their driver. They turn to the right hand or to the left; they quicken their pace, or stop short in the furrow, at the bare intimation of his pleasure. Are we equally obedient to the calls, to the exhortations, the express injunctions of our heavenly Lord? The blessed Jesus spoke at the beginning, and the world was made. He speaks by his providence, and the universe is upheld. When he shall speak at the last day, the heavens will pass away, and the earth be dissolved. Yet he speaks to us in his divine word, and we turn a deaf ear to his address. He speaks in tender expostulations, and no melting of heart ensues. He speaks in precious promises, and no ardent desires are enkindled. The will, which in these cases ought to be turned as wax to the seal, is unimpressed and inflexible as an iron sinew?

Ther. The human will is constantly inclined to preserve, accommodate, and make its possessor happy. Is not this the right position, in which it should always stand? Or the most desirable direction that can be given to its motions?

Asp. I should be glad, if fact bore witness to your assertion. But fact, I apprehend, is on the contrary side. I took notice, as we came along, of some ants, busily employed on a little hillock. Have you made any observation, Theron, on this reptile community?

Ther. It is a little republic.* They inhabit a kind of oblong city, divided into various streets. They are governed by laws, and regulated by politics, of their own. Their magazines are commodiously formed, and judiciously guarded against the injuries of the weather. Some are defended by an arch made of earth, and cemented with a peculiar sort of glue: Some are covered with rafters of slender wood, and thatched with rushes or grass. The roof is always raised with a double slope, to turn away the current of the waters, and shoot the rain from their storehouses. They all bestir themselves, with an incessant assiduity, while the air is serene, while the roads are good, and abundance of loose grain lies scattered over the fields. By these precautions, they live secure, when storms embroil the sky, they want no manner of convenience, even when winter lays waste the plains.

Asp. Do we improve, so diligently, our present opportunities? This life is the seed-time of eternity. Do we husband the precious moments like persons sensible of their unspeakable importance? sensible, that if we trifle and are indolent, they will be irretrievably gone, and we irretrievably ruined?

Sickness, we know not how soon, may invade us, pain may torment us, and both may issue in our final dissolution. Are we duly aware of these awful changes, and properly solicitous to put all in order for their approach? We walk (alarming thought!) upon the very brink of death, resurrection, and judgment. Do we walk like wise virgins, with our loins girt, with our lamps trimmed, in a state of continual readiness for the heavenly Bridegroom's advent?

Those ants "have no guide, overseer, or ruler; yet they prepare their meat in the summer, and gather their food in the harvest." (Prov. vi. 7.) We have all these, yet neglect the time of our visitation. We have God's unerring word to guide us; God's ever-watchful eye to oversee us; God's sovereign command to rule and quicken us. Notwithstanding all these motives, is not the speech of the sluggard the very language of our conduct? "A little more sleep, a little more slumber, a little more folding of the hands to sleep." The most supine indifference, where all possible diligence is but just sufficient! This, you must allow, is the true character of mankind in general. And does this demonstrate the rectitude of their will?

Ther. The understanding may be said to carry the torch, the will to hold the balance. Now the perfection of a balance consists in being so nicely poised, as to incline at the least touch, and preponderate with the slightest weight. This property belongs, without all dispute, to the human will.

Asp. What if one of your scales should descend to the ground, though charged with trifles that are light as air? if the other should kick the beam, though its contents be weightier than talents of gold? Is not this an exact representation of our will, when the fleeting pleasures of sense, or the puny interests of time, excite our wishes; even while the solid delights of religion, and the immensely rich treasures of immortality, can hardly obtain our attention? However, let us quit the metaphor, and examine fact. Suppose I make it appear, that, instead of choosing the most eligible objects, the will is so deplorably vitiated as to loathe what is salutary, and to be fond of what is baneful.

* See Nat. Disp. l. i.

Ther. If you prove this to be universally the case, you will prove your favourite point with a witness.

Asp. When Providence is pleased to thwart our measures, or defeat our endeavours; to bring us under the cloud of disgrace, or lay upon us the rod of affliction; what is our behaviour? Do we bow our heads in humble resignation? Do we open our mouths in thankful acknowledgments?—Observe the waters in that elegant octagonal basin. They assimilate themselves, with the utmost readiness, and with equal exactness, to the vessel that contains them. So would the human will, if it were not extremely froward and foolish, conform itself to the divine; which is unerringly wise, and, of all possible contingencies, incomparably the best.* Yet how apt are we to fret with disquietude, and struggle under afflictive dispensations, “as a wild bull in a net?”

Ther. This is a very imperfect proof, Asp. pasio, and corresponds only with part of your accusation. We may dislike what is wholesome, especially if it be unpalatable, yet not be fond of our bane.

Asp. Should you see a person who thirsts after the putrid lake, but disrelishes the running fountain; who longs for the empoisoned berries of the nightshade, but abhors the delicious fruit of the orchard; would you applaud the regularity of his appetite? I do not wait for your answer. But I more than suspect this is a true picture of all unregenerate people. How do they affect dress and external ornament; but are unwilling, rather than desirous, to be “clothed with humility,” 1 Peter v. 5, and “to put on Christ,” Rom. xiii. 14. Amusement will engage, play animate, and diversion fire them; but as to the worship of the living God, O “what a weariness is it.” Mal. i. 13. This is attended, if attended at all, with languor and a listless insensibility. Frothy novels and flatulent wit regale their taste, while the marrow and fatness of the divine word are as “their sorrowful meat.” Job vi. 7. What is all this but to loathe the salutary, and long† for the baneful?

* This seems to be the meaning of the prophet. Isaiah xxvi. 7. Not—“the way of the just is uprightness.” This sense, in the present connexion, is hardly consistent with humility; is by no means proper to introduce a devotional address to the great Jehovah. Rather—“God’s way to the just is uprightness:” or, still more emphatically, “uprightness:” is in all respects irreprovable, excellent, admirable; suited, perfectly suited to every sacred attribute of wisdom, goodness, and truth.

† The reader may see this unhappy contrast drawn in the strongest colours, by the royal preacher, and by the mourning prophet. “Because I have called, and ye refused; I have stretched out my hand, and no man regarded it; but ye have set at nought all my counsel, and would none of my reproof.” What a crowd of words! emphatically declaring the most incorrigible perverseness: which is proof against every method of reformation, against all the arts even of

Let me, from the same comparison, propose one question more, which may be applicable both to the will and to the understanding. Should you hear of another person, the state of whose stomach was so disposed that it turned the most nourishing food into phlegm, and derived matter of disease from the most sovereign supports of health, what would you think of this constitution.

Ther. I should certainly think it very much distempered.

Asp. Without the grace of our Lord Jesus Christ, our souls turn every occurrence into an increase of their sinful depravity. Our very table is a snare, and instead of exciting us to gratitude, is a provocative to gluttony. How difficult is it, when we flow in plenty, not to be elated; when we are oppressed with poverty, not to repine? Have we business in the world? it cumbers our thoughts, or tempts us to avarice: Have we no business to manage? we sink into sloth, and settle on the lees of voluptuousness. If our schemes are prosperous, it is odds but they attach us to the interests of time: If they prove unsuccessful, we too often are chagrined with the disappointment, and sin against meekness. Even the holy commandment, instead of restraining sin, or producing obedience, irritates the inbred depravity, and renders it more restless, more impetuous, more ungovernable, Rom. vii. 8. Those very things which should have been for our welfare, (so malignant and raging is our corruption!) are converted into an occasion of falling.

Ther. The will is under no necessity of misemploying her powers. She is free to act in this manner or in that; and if a spendthrift, is not a slave.

Asp. In actions which relate to the animal economy the will is unquestionably free. She can contract the forehead into a frown, or expand it with a smile. In the ordinary divine persuasion. Prov. i. 24, 25.—“The host of heaven, whom they have loved, and whom they have served, and after whom they have walked, and whom they have sought, and whom they have worshipped.” What a heap of expressions: significantly describing that impetuous ardour, which no prohibitions can restrain; and that insatiable avidity, which never knows when to say, it is enough. Jer. viii. 2.

If I beg leave to add another example of this kind, it is chiefly for the sake of clearing up an obscure passage in the Psalms; which seems to have been mistaken by the authors of both our versions.—David, to set forth the barbarous assiduity of his persecutors, says, “They wander up and down.” They pry into every corner; they search the city, and examine the country: not for meat; which in this connexion is a sense quite foreign to the subject, and very jejune indeed; but to devour, to devour me the destined victim of their rage. And if they are not satisfied, if they cannot compass their design by day, will they grudge? No; but they will continue all night, in the prosecution of their purpose. Neither cold nor darkness can retard them; neither hardships nor dangers can divert them; but their attempts are as indefatigable as their malice is implacable. Psalm lix. 15.

affairs of life, she is under no control. We can undertake or decline a journey, carry on or discontinue an employ, just as we please. In the outward acts of religion also, the will is her own mistress. We can read the word of God, or go to the place of divine worship, without any extraordinary aid from above.—But, in matters which are more intimately connected with our salvation, the case is different. Here, as our liturgy expresses it, “we are tied and bound with the chain of our sins.”

Would you have a person delight himself in the Lord, take pleasure in devotion, set his affections on things above?—All this is both his duty and his happiness. But alas! he is alienated from the life of God; his inclinations gravitate quite the contrary way; his will is in the condition of that distressed woman, who was “bowed down with a spirit of infirmity, and could in no wise lift up herself.” Luke xii. 11. Corruption, like a strong bias, influences, or rather like a heavy mountain oppresses his mind. Neither can he shake off the propensity, or struggle away from the load, until grace, almighty grace, interposes for his release,—“Where the spirit of the Lord is, there,” and there alone, “is liberty,” 2 Cor. iii. 17, that sacred and glorious liberty, which is not the common privilege of all men, but the high prerogative of the children of God.

Would you have a person apply to the great Redeemer—apply with a real ardour of desire, as Bartimeus of old, or the Syro-phenician mother?—His will is like the withered arm, cannot stretch forth itself to the all-gracious Saviour; cannot hunger and thirst after his everlasting righteousness and infinite merit, till the Saviour himself speaks power into the enfeebled, the perverted faculty.—If you think otherwise, try the experiment. Persuade men to this necessary practice. Urge the most weighty arguments; devise the most pathetic expostulations; let zeal summon all her force, and rhetoric employ all her art. Without being a prophet, I dare venture to foretell the issue. Disappointments, repeated disappointments, will convince you that our divine Master knew what he said when he solemnly declared, “No man can come to me, except the Father, which hath sent me, draw him.” John vi. 44. Our church, in conformity to this and other scriptures, has taught us to pray, “Turn thou us, O good Lord,” for nothing but thy omnipotent agency is capable of doing it, “and so we shall be turned.”

* It is not said the Father drives, but draws: not by violent, irrational, compulsive means; but by clear conviction, sweet persuasion, and inducements suited to a reasonable being. Those are the cords of a beast; these of a man. So that we are not acted upon as clock-work, or influenced as mere machines, but “made willing in the day of his power.” Psal. cx. 3.

Ther. Are we slaves then? Will Christianity send us to seek our brethren in the mines or in the galleys?

Asp. Christianity does not send but find us there: There, or in a worse slavery.*—It is doubtless a most abject state, to wear the yoke, and trundle in chains. Yet such, I apprehend, is the state of our minds by nature. To prove this, we need not go down to the lowest ranks of life. “These,” you might say with the prophet, “are poor; these are foolish; they have not known the way of the Lord, nor the judgment of their God”—I will get me therefore to the great men,” Jer. v. 4, 5, and examine their disposition.

Have you not known persons of the greatest intrepidity, and firmest resolution, hurried away by their lusts, as “a rolling thing before the whirlwind?” Isa. xvii. 13. Perhaps they were bold enough to face danger, and defy the sword in the field of battle; yet were no more able to withstand the wanton allurements of beauty, or the soft solicitations of pleasure, than the moth can forbear fluttering about the flame, even though it singes her wings, and is scorching her to death. Others, possessed of a refined imagination, disdain the gross indulgences of sensuality; yet are slaves to their own domineering passions. They are blown into the most intemperate rage, and pushed on to the most extravagant actions, by every little ruffling accident. They see the meanness which such an ungovernable spirit argues; they feel the misery which such internal tempests create: nay, they resolve to suppress the impetuosity of their temper: yet are borne away by the torrent, and upon the very first provocation, are as furiously resentful as ever. Will you call these persons free, because their task-masters and their tyrants are lodged within?† because the fetters are forged, not for the meaner but for the immortal part of their nature?

Ther. Let us pass to the affections. These are to the soul what wings are to the eagle, or sails to the ship. These always stand ready to receive the gales of interest, and to spring at the signal of reason.

* St. Paul says of Christians, and reckons himself in the number, that naturally they served (not διακονησαστες but δουλευσαστες, were absolute slaves to) “diverse lusts and pleasures.” Tit. iii. 3. The whole verse is very remarkable, and nothing can be more apposite to Aspasio’s purpose. It shows us, what they were by nature, who through grace became living images of the blessed God.

† This mortifying doctrine is often acknowledged by our church: Thus begins one of her public supplications, “Almighty God, who alone canst order the unruly wills and affections of sinful man.” It seems we cannot determine our own wills, nor regulate our own affections. What is this but bondage?

proportioned to the ballast, what advantage will accrue, either to the animal or to the vessel? The one, will probably be over-set in the voyage, the other will lie groveling on the ground.

Ther. Desire seems to be first, which "opens the mouth, or moves the wing, or peeps." Isa. x. 14. Desire is active as a flame, and ever in pursuit of happiness.

Asp. What if your flame, instead of shooting upwards, should point its inverted spires to the earth? Would not this be strange, and a sign of great disorder?—God is the centre of perfection, and the source of felicity. All that is amiable in itself, is comprehended in God. All that is beneficial to us, proceeds from God. Do our desires uniformly tend to this superexcellent Being? Do our wishes terminate in the enjoyment of his ever-glorious Majesty? Alas! we are naturally estranged from him. We covet no communion with him. We are wedded to trifles, and dote upon vanity: but to God we say—it is evidently the language of our conduct—"Depart from us? we desire not the knowledge of thy ways." Job xxi. 14.

If desire is the first-born among the affections, observe it in children. There it appears in its dawn, and has most of pure nature. See how those flies, exulting in the sunny gleam, vibrate with all the rapidity of motion their little wings.* So prompt and expedite are the desires of children to any corrupting diversion. See how sluggishly that snail, crawling forth amidst the refreshing moisture, drags her slow length along: So dull, if not reluctant, are the dispositions of our children to any improving exercise. Rewards will hardly win them to the latter; the rod can hardly deter them from the former: And none, none but God, "by his special grace preventing them, can put into their minds good desires."†

Is our love under better regulation? How easily are we captivated with a fair complexion and graceful form, especially when set off with the decorations of dress; but how little affected with the beauty of internal character, with the ornaments of virtue, and the graces of Christianity! Can it be supposed, that the pulse of the soul beats regularly, when there is such a passionate fondness for fading embellishments, and such a cold indifference for the most substantial endowments? How ready are we to be enamoured with well proportioned clay, often to our apparent prejudice, sometimes to our utter ruin? yet how backward to love that infinitely loving and lovely Redeemer, who would die himself rather than we should become a prey to death! Tender we are, perfect tender to the sparks of irrational and dissolute affection; harder than adamant, colder than ice, to this heavenly flame.

Ther. If our love is blind, our fear has not lost her eyes. Fear is quick of apprehension; and instead of being stupidly insensible, is ready to "rise up at the voice of a bird." Eccl. xii. 4.

Asp. The passion of fear is sufficiently active, but deplorably misapplied. We fear the reproach of men. But are we alarmed at the view of that everlasting shame which the Lord, the righteous Judge, shall pour upon the ungodly? We shudder at the drawn dagger, and stand appalled at the headlong precipice: But how often have we defied the sword of almighty vengeance, and sported upon the brink of irretrievable perdition?

Sin is the most pernicious of all evils. Sin violates the divine command, and provokes the divine Majesty. Sin offers despite to the blessed Spirit, and tramples upon the blood of Jesus. For sin, the transgressor is banished from the blissful presence of God, and doomed to dwell with inextinguishable burnings. Do we dread this grand destroyer of our happiness? dread it more than any calamities, more than all plagues?—Take one of those fine may-dukes, which glow with so beautiful a scarlet on yonder espalier: Offer it to the black-bird that serenades us from the neighbouring elm. The creature, though fond of the dainty, will fly from our hand, as hastily as from a levelled fowling-piece. He suspects a design upon his liberty; and therefore will endure any extremity, will even starve to death, rather than taste the most tempting delicacy in such hazardous circumstances. Are we equally fearful of an infinitely greater danger? Do we fly, with equal solicitude, from the delusive but destructive wiles of sin? Alas! do we not too often swallow the bait, even when we plainly discover the fatal hook? Do we not snatch the forbidden fruit, though conscience remonstrates, though God prohibits, though death eternal threatens.

Ther. Conscience, then, according to your own account, has escaped the general shipwreck. Conscience is God's vicegerent in the soul, and executes her office faithfully. Even the Gentiles "show the work of the law written in their hearts, their conscience also bearing witness, and their thoughts the meanwhile accusing or else excusing one another."* Rom. ii. 15.

Asp. If there be any remains of the divine image, perhaps they are to be found in the conscience. But even this is not exempt from the common ruin.—Consider its light. It is like a dim taper, feebly glimmering, and serving only to make the darkness visible. Or, if it discovers any thing, it is an obscure something, we know not what, which instead of informing tantalizes us; and instead of guiding bewilders us, as false and delusory lights on the shore put a cheat upon the mariner, and lead him on to ruin.*—Consider its operations. It is either dumb or dead, or both. Dumb; or else how vehemently would it upbraid us for our shocking ingratitude to the supreme omnipotent Benefactor? how loudly would it inveigh against our stupid neglect of spiritual interests, and eternal ages? Dead; otherwise how keenly would it smart when gashed with wounds—numerous as our repeated violations of the divine law, deep as the horrid aggravations of our various iniquities?

Ther. Do you call this an answer to my objection, Aspasio? If it be an answer, it resembles, in point of satisfactory evidence, the light which you ascribe unto the conscience.

Asp. The Gentiles, you allege, show the work, but not the love of the law, written on their hearts. Some leading notices of right and wrong they have, some speculative strictures of good and evil; but without a real abhorrence of the one, or a cordial delight in the other: which, far from ennobling their nature, far from vindicating their practice, argues the exceeding depravity of the former, and renders the latter absolutely without excuse.

No; you say, conscience excuses the heathens. Rather, their conscience bears witness to the equity of the law, while their thoughts make some weak apology for the tenor of their conduct. This is far from acquitting, far from justifying them. Besides, these weak attempts to excuse are always founded on ignorance. Did they know themselves, their duty, or their God, conscience would, without the least hesitation, bring in her verdict Guilty. The apostle assures us that till faith, which is a divine principle, takes place in our breasts, “both the mind and conscience are defiled: Tit. i. 15: here and elsewhere very plainly intimating, that the conscience is evil, and ever will be evil, till it is “sprinkled with the blood of Christ.” Heb. x. 22.

It accuses some, I acknowledge, and it ought to accuse, yea, to condemn all. But

* This seems to have been the case with the bulk of the Heathen world. Conscience arraigned, and found them guilty. This put them upon practising their abominable, sometimes their inhuman idolatries. Nay, this induced them to give the most scandalous and impious misrepresentations of the Deity. That they might sheath the sting of conscience, and find some salvo for their own iniquities, they made even the objects of their worship the patrons and the precedents of their favourite vices.

even here it evidences itself to be corrupt, for its accusations are sometimes erroneous, and no better than false witnesses, sometimes partial,* and suborned by appetite; and very, very often ineffectual. Nay, when they do take effect, they produce no fruit that is truly good. They work not a genuine humiliation, or an unfeigned repentance; but either a slavish dread of God as a severe judge, or hatred of him as an inexorable enemy.

Ther. Hatred of God! Astonishing impiety! Is it possible for the human heart to admit such enormous, almost incredible wickedness?

Asp. You may well be astonished, Theron; and God may justly demand; “What iniquity have my people found in me, that they are gone far from me, and have walked after vanity?” Jer. ii. 5. “I created you out of nothing, and endowed you with an immortal soul. As a father, I have provided for you: As a nurse, I have cherished you. I have consigned over to your possession the earth, and the fulness thereof. All my creatures do you service, and even my angels minister unto your good. Do you desire greater demonstrations of my love? I have given what was dearer to me than all angels, than all worlds: I have given my son from my bosom, to die in your stead. Would you have farther evidences of my tender, my distinguished regard? Behold! I touch the mountains, and they smoke: I look upon the earth, and it trembles: I cast even the princes of heaven, when they break my law, into chains of darkness. But to you, O men, I condescend to act as a supplicant! Though highly injured, and horribly affronted, I beseech you, again and again I beseech you, to be reconciled.”

To hate† such a God, is indeed the most detestable impiety. Yet man, foolish man, practises this impiety, whenever, for the sake of a vile lust, an ignoble pleasure, or an unruly passion, he transgresses the command of his Creator.

Shall I exemplify the doctrine in another of the affections?

Ther. In truth, Aspasio, I begin to be sick of the subject. If human nature is so ulcerated, the less you touch it the better. However, let us not quite omit the irascible appetite.

* Partial—otherwise, how could the most celebrated among the ancient heroes applaud and practise that execrable unnatural crime, self-murder? How could their first-rate historians extol and almost consecrate that diabolical principle of action, pride? And how could their ablest teachers of morality, not only tolerate, but establish the error, by neglecting to find so much as a name for that amiable virtue, humility.

† Hatred of God is so shocking an expression, that one would almost wish never to hear or read it. But it occurs in our unerring book; is too often exemplified in common life; and is engraven, by corrupt nature, on every human heart. See Rom. i. 30; Exod. xx. 5; John xv. 26; Rom. viii. 7.

Asp. Of this we have already taken a side view: if you choose to see it in full proportion, make your observation on Fervidus. Fervidus comes home in a rage. His cheeks are pale and his lips quiver with excess of passion. Though he can hardly speak, he vows revenge, and utters imprecations. What is the cause of all this wondrous ferment? A neighbour, it seems, has dropt some reflecting hint, or a servant has blundered in some trifling message. Such usage, Fervidus says, is intolerable, and such negligence unpardonable. This same Fervidus has offered innumerable affronts to his Maker, he has most scandalously neglected the will of his almighty Lord, yet feels no indignation against himself. He is all fury when his own credit is touched, but when the interest of Christ is wounded, he can sit unconcerned, or pass it off with a laugh. Anger, I acknowledge, is sometimes becoming and useful. But is this its right temperature? this its proper application?

Ther. This is the practice only of some few turbulent spirits. To saddle their qualities upon every person, is a procedure just as equitable, as the madman's* calculation was reasonable, who took an account of every ship which entered the harbour, and set it down for his own.

Asp. The latter part of my charge, I fear, is applicable to more than a few. However, let us consider the most calm and sedate minds. How are they affected under injuries? Do they never aggravate failings into crimes? Do they find it easy to abstain from every emotion of ill-will? easy to love their enemies, and do good to those who hate them? These god-like tempers, if our nature was not degenerated, would be the spontaneous produce of the soul. But now, alas! they are not raised without much difficulty: seldom come to any considerable degree of eminence; never arrive at a state of true perfection. An undoubted proof, that they are exotics, not natives of the soil.

Now we are speaking of plants, cast your eye upon the kitchen-garden. Many of those herbs will perfume the hard hand which crushes them, and embalm the rude foot which tramples on them. Such was the benign conduct of our Lord: He always overcame evil with good. When his disciples disregarded him in his bitter agony, he made the kindest excuse for their ungrateful stupidity. Matth. xxvi. 41. When his enemies, with unparalleled barbarity, spilt his very blood, he pleaded their ignorance as an extenuation of their guilt. Luke xxiii. 34. Is the same spirit in us which was also in our divine Master? Then are our passions rightly poised, and duly tempered. But if resentment kindles, and animosity rankles in our hearts; this is an infallible sign, that we swerve from our Saviour's pattern, consequently, are fallen from our primitive rectitude.

Ther. What say you of the fancy? This, sure, if no other, retains the primitive rectitude. What pictures does she form, and what excursions does she make? She can dive to the bottom of the ocean, can soar to the height of the stars, and walk upon the boundaries of creation.

Asp. That the fancy is lively and excursive, I readily grant. It can out-travel the post, or out-fly the eagle. But if it travel only to pick up shells, or fly abroad to bring home mischief; then, I apprehend, though you should admire the faculty, you will hardly be in raptures with its agency. This is the real truth. Our fancy, till divine grace regulate and exalt its operations, is generally employed in picking painted shells, or culling venomous herbs; "weaving (as the prophet very elegantly, and no less exactly describes the case) the spider's web, or hatching cockatrice-eggs;" Isa. lix. 5; busied in the most absurd impertinences, or acting in speculation the vilest iniquities. That which should be "a garden enclosed, a fountain sealed," Cant. iv. 12, for the Prince of Peace, is the thoroughfare of vanity. And even when we are renewed from above, O! how necessary is it to keep an incessant watch, and exercise a strict discipline, over this volatile, variable, treacherous vagrant!

The memory, as well as the fancy, is impaired, or if not impaired, is debauched. Why else does it so firmly retain the impressions of an injury, but so easily let slip the remembrance of a benefit? Any idle fopperies which sooth our vanity, and increase our corruption, cleave to the thoughts, as the vexatious burr to our clothes; while the noble truths of the gospel, and the rich mercies of a gracious God, slide away from the mind, and leave no lasting trace behind them. This double perverseness is very emphatically and too truly represented by Jeremiah: "Can a maid forget her ornaments, or a bride her attire? Yet my people have forgotten me, days without number. Jer. ii. 32. If we hear a loose hint, or read an immodest expression, they are almost sure to fasten themselves on our memory. If shaken off, they follow us with a troublesome importunity. If excluded, as unwelcome visitors, they force themselves again and again upon our imagination. They dog us to the closet; they haunt our most retired hours; and too often disturb our very devotions. Tell me now, can that faculty be upright and uncorrupted, which is a perforated sieve.

* Thrasylus, an Athenian.

to transmit the beneficial, but a thirsty sponge to imbibe the pernicious?*

Ther. Well, my friend, whatever guilt I or others have contracted, flattery I dare be positive, is none of yours. Human nature has received no heightening or adulatory touches from your pencil. You have portrayed her foolish and beastly, and every thing bad and devilish.

Asp. And this, even this abomination I must not secrete, I dare not except. Envy is a devilish disposition. It subsists nowhere but in damned spirits and fallen souls: Yet, infernal as it is, it has been found in persons of the most exalted character. The magnanimous Joshua felt its cankerous tooth. Numb. xi. 29. The disciples of the blessed Jesus were soured with its malignant leaven. Matt. xx. 24. An apostle declares, that "the spirit which dwelleth in us, lusteth to envy," James iv. 5, is impetuously prone to that detestable temper.

Lying is confessedly a diabolical practice; yet how unaccountably forward are our children to utter falsehood? As soon as they are born, they go astray; and as soon as they speak, they speak lies.—I said unaccountably; but I recall the expression: The cause is evident—they have lost the image of the God of truth, and are become like that apostate spirit, who "is a liar and the father of it." John viii. 44.

What think you of malice, of hate, and revenge? Are they not each a species of murder, and the seed of the old serpent? Unless, therefore, we are entirely free from all these hellish emotions, we must, we must acknowledge, "that the prince of this world," John xiv. 30, has his party within us. May the almighty hand of our God expiate and subdue it day by day!

You tell me I am no flatterer. Should a person who professes himself the friend of his fellow-creatures, soothe them into a false peace? should he bolster them up in a groundless conceit of their excellency, when they really are no better than "an unclean thing?" shall the surgeon assure his patient, "all is well," even when the mortification has taken place, and the gangrene is spreading? This were to refine the first out of all benevolence, and to flatter the last into his grave.

A disputant of less complaisance than my Theron would probably ask with a contemptuous sneer, "Have you then been drawing your own picture?"—To whom I would reply, with confusion and sorrow,

"I have;" alleging this only to moderate my confusion, that I am daily seeking, by prayer and watchfulness, more and more "to put off this old man, which is corrupt according to the deceitful lusts." Eph. iv. 22. And, to alleviate my sorrow, I am endeavouring continually to remember, that however unworthy I am, however vile I may have been, my adored Redeemer's righteousness is perfect; and in this righteousness every believer is to make his boast.

Ther. So then man is blind in his understanding; perverse in his will; disorderly in his affections; influenced by dispositions which are partly brutal and partly diabolical.—I have often heard you extol, in terms of high admiration, the virtue of humility: You have lavished all the riches of eloquence when haranguing on poverty of spirit. If such be the condition of mankind, they have infinite cause to be poor in spirit. They must therefore have one excellency left, and, according to your own account, a very distinguishing one.

Asp. Scarce any thing displays in a more glaring light the extreme depravity of man than his strong propensity to pride, notwithstanding so much vileness, and so many deformities.—Should the noisome leper admire the beauty of his complexion, or the impotent paralytic glory in the strength of his sinews, would they not be mistaken, even to a degree of sottishness and frenzy? Yet for man, fallen man, who has lost his original righteousness, which was the true ornament of his nature; who is become subject to base and sordid lusts, or as the apostle speaks, "is earthly and sensual,"—for him to be proud, is still more absurdly wicked. And since this is the case, I cannot acquit him from the last and heaviest article of the sacred writer's charge; I have a fresh and more convincing proof that we do him no wrong, when we call his nature, his disposition, his wisdom—"devilish." Jam. iii. 15.

Ther. Why do you reckon pride an universally prevailing corruption? I see no ground for such a dishonourable suspicion. I hope I myself am an instance to the contrary. To unguarded sallies of passion, to several other faults, I confess myself subject; but cannot think that I am proud.

Asp. Ah! Theron, if you was not proud, you would not be passionate. Unreasonable anger always proceeds from an overweening opinion of our own worth. One who, besides his acquired knowledge of human nature, had the supernatural gift of discerning spirits, is observed to join "humility" and "meekness," Eph. iv. 2, intimating, that they are amiable twins, and where one exists the other cannot be absent. Always consistent with himself, he links together the opposite vices, "heady and high-minded, 2 Tim. iii. 4, not obscurely hinting, that those who are easily provoked are certainly proud. Shall I add, without offence, if we fancy our minds to be clear from the weeds of vanity, and our thoughts free from the workings of self-admiration, it is a most pregnant symptom, that we are overrun with the former, abandoned to the latter, and blinded by both.

* This I think suggests an unanswerable confutation of that specious argument, frequently used in behalf of some fashionable but dissolute diversions. "They are interspersed," say their admirers, "with sentiments of virtue, and maxims of morality." Should we admit the truth of this plea, yet the depraved disposition of mankind is perfectly satiated with the morality, and carry away the riba dry.

Pride was the first sin that found entrance into our nature, and it is perhaps the last that will be expelled. What are all our afflictions, but a remedy provided for this inveterate disease; intended to "hide pride from man." Job xxxiii. 17. What is the institution of the gospel, but a battery erected against this stronghold of Satan; ordained to "cast down every high imagination." 2 Cor. x. 4, 5. Though that remedy is often applied, though this battery is continually playing, yet the peccant humour is not entirely purged off, nor the elatement of spirit totally subdued, till mortality is swallowed up of life.

Pride is the sin which most easily besets us. "Who can say, I have made my heart clean." Prov. xx. 9, from this iniquity? It defiles our duties, and intermingles itself with our very virtues. It starts up, I know not how, in our most solemn hours and our most sacred employments. The good Hezekiah, whose prayers were more powerful than all the forces of Sennacherib, was not proof against the wiles of this subtle sorceress. 2 Chron. xxxii. 25. Even the great apostle, who had been caught up into the third heavens, was in danger of being puffed up with pride; in such great danger, that it was necessary to put a lancet into the gathering tumour; or, as he himself expresses it, to fix a "thorn into his flesh, and permit the messenger of Satan to buffet him." 2 Cor. xii. 7.

How pathetically is this corruption lamented, and how truly described by "a sweet singer of our Israel!"

But pride, that busy sin,
Spouls all that I perform;
Cursed pride! that creeps securely in,
And swells a haughty worm.

Thy glories I abate,
Or praise thee with design;
Part of thy favours I forget,
Or think the merit mine.

The very songs I frame
Are faithless to thy cause;
And steal the honours of thy name,
To build their own applause

WATT'S HOR. LXX.

Ther. Now, I presume you have given the ast touches to your distorted portrait.

Asp. There are other disagreeable and shocking features; but these I shall cast into shades, or hide under a veil. One particular you must allow me to add, which, like a sullen air in the countenance, throws aggravated horror over the whole: I mean, an inclination to be fond of our slavery.

In other instances, the "captive exile hasteth to be loosed." Isa. li 14. But here we prefer bondage to freedom, and are loath to leave our prison. Of this, our backwardness to self-examination is both a consequence and a proof. Self-examination, under the agency of the Spirit, would open a window in our dungeon; would show us our wretched condition, and teach us to sigh for deliverance. Why have we such a dislike of reproof? Because we hug our chains, and choose darkness rather than light. Reproof is more grating than the harshest discord, though it tends to dissolve the enchantment, and rescue us from the tyranny of sin; while flattery, which abets the delusion, and strengthens the spell, is music to our ears. Is not our reason, which should arraign and condemn every irregularity, forward to invent excuses, and to spare the favourite folly? Reason, which should unsheath the dagger, super-induces the mask; and, instead of striking at the heart of our vices, screens them under the cover of some plausible names. A wicked habit is called a human infirmity, ensnaring diversions pass for innocent amusements, a revengeful disposition is termed spirit, gallantry, and honour. Thus our reason (if, when so egregiously perverted, it deserves the name) is ingenious to obstruct our recovery, and rivets on the shackles which our passions have formed.*

This the eternal Wisdom foresaw, and therefore uttered that tender expostulation, "How long, ye simple ones, will ye love simplicity, and scorners delight in their scorning, and fools hate knowledge?" Even the inestimably precious knowledge of an all-atoning and completely justifying Saviour; who preaches, who has purchased, and who works deliverance—preaches in his word, has purchased by his blood, and works by his Spirit, deliverance for the captives, the wretched captives of ignorance, sin, and death. This I take to be the most flagrant and deplorable effect of human depravity—our aversion to the doctrine, the privileges, the grace of the gospel. Beware, dear Theron, lest you prove my point by—shall I speak it? would you suspect it?—your own practice. Zealous as I am for my tenets, I should be sorry, extremely sorry, to have such a demonstration of their truth.

Ther. You are highly obliging, Aspasio, to single me out for your evidence. Yet why should the honour be appropriated to myself? It belongs, upon the foot of the preceding calculation, not to your friend only,

* Perhaps this is what our Lord means, when developing the human heart, and discovering its latent enormities, he closes the dark account with αἰσῶσις, foolishness: implying that stupidity which has no sense of its misery: that perverseness which has no inclination for a recovery: both which render all the other evils far more inveterate, Mark vii. 22.

but to the whole species. If you was aiming at none but the licentious and abandoned, you would have none to oppose you but persons of that character. Your arrows of satire would then be rightly levelled, and might be serviceable to mankind; whereas, to put all in the black list, to mark all with the villain's brand—this can never be Christian charity, this is insufferable censoriousness.

Asp. Let me beseech you, Theron, not to misapprehend my design. I speak not as a malevolent satirist, but would imitate the faithful physician. I am opening the sore, that it may admit the healing balm: and should I perform the operation with an envenomed instrument? My soul abhors the thought.—I must entreat you likewise to remember the distinction between a state of nature and a state of grace. We are all naturally evil. Such we should for ever continue, did not a supernatural power intervene; making some to differ, both from their original selves, and from the generality of their neighbours. Are they refined in their temper, and reformed in their life? I grant it. But then it is the influence of the sanctifying Spirit, which purges away their dross, yet not without leaving some alloy.

Ther. Here, Aspasio you certainly strain the bow, till it breaks; since scripture itself celebrates some persons as absolutely perfect. What says Moses, the inspired historian? "Noah was perfect in his generation." Gen. vi. 9. What says the God of Moses, who can neither deceive nor be deceived? "Job was a perfect man and an upright." Job. i. 1. consequently their nature must be entirely cleansed from this hereditary defilement; and their character confutes your derogatory representations of mankind.

Asp. Those eminent saints were perfect; that is, they were sanctified throughout, sanctified in all their faculties; no one grace of religion was lacking. As in the newborn infant there is a human creature complete; no constituent part of the vital frame is wanting; though each is tender, all are very feeble, and none arrived at the full size.

They were upright. This word seems to be explanatory of the preceding; and signifies an unfeigned desire, joined with a hearty endeavour, to obey the whole will of God; excluding not all defect, but all reigning hypocrisy, and willful remissness.—The interpretation, thus limited, is of a piece with their conduct. If stretched to a higher pitch, it is evidently inconsistent with the narrative of their lives.

Pray, what was your motive for decorating the sylvan retirement (which sheltered us yesterday) with the statue of Elijah?

Ther. Because I thought his solitary life and gloomy temper suited that sequestered bower; because the memorable adventure there represented, is with me a favourite portion of sacred history.

Are we pleased with spirited and delicate railery? Nothing exceeds his pungent sarcasm on the stupid and despicable dupes of idolatry. Every sentence is keen as a razor, and pointed as a dagger, yet wears the appearance of the most courtly complaisance. We may truly say, in the beautiful language of the Psalmist, "His words are smother than oil, and yet be they very swords!"*

Are we delighted with instances of magnanimity? A single prophet, unsupported by any human aid, maintains the cause of truth against the king, his grandees, and hundreds of the apostate priests. He ventures to stake all his credit, to risk his very life, and (what was dearer to him than personal credit, or bodily life) the honour of the true God, and interests of his holy religion; to risk all on the immediate interposition of a most surprising miracle.

Do we admire the triumphs of faith? His faith was in a manner omnipotent. He prays, and torrents of fire descend from the sky, to devour his adversaries, 2 Kings i. 10. He prays again, and the sluices of heaven are shut; there is neither dew nor rain for several years, 1 Kings xvii. 1. A third time he prays, and the windows from on high are opened; abundance of showers water the earth, (Jam. v. 17, 18.) On another occasion he presents his supplications, and God makes his feet like harts' feet, inasmuch that an aged prophet outruns the royal chariot, (1 Kings xviii. 46.)

Asp. I commend your taste, Theron; and am particularly pleased with the reasons of your choice. But do not you remember, that even the wonder-working Ti-hbite failed in his resignation, and failed in his faith? Eminent as he was for mortification, he gave way to unreasonable discontent; and, though a champion for the living God, he yielded to unbelieving fear.† "The man Moses was very meek, above all the men which were upon the face of the earth, Num. xii. 3; yet he, even he was provoked in his spirit, and spake unadvisedly with his lips," Psal.

* 1 Kings xviii. 27. "And it came to pass at noon, that Elijah mocked them, and said, Cry aloud, for he is a God. Either he is talking, or he is pursuing, or he is in a journey, or peradventure he sleepeth, and must be awaked."

† Elias, or rather Elijah, "was a man subject to like passions as we are," James v. 17. Upon which passage an eminent commentator makes the following remark: "This probably is said with respect to his fear and discontent, manifested, 1 Kings xix. 3, 4. Ὀμοιωτάβης must, I think, imply a state liable to the irregular workings of passion: not free from the sinful infirmities of nature. Otherwise, it is an instance foreign to the purpose, does by no means answer the end designed; which is to encourage the heart, and strengthen the faith, even of frail, corrupt, offending creatures. See verse 16.

evi. 33. Was not Peter the hero among our Lord's followers? Yet he trembles, more than trembles, at the shaking of a leaf, he denies his divine Master, scared by the voice of a woman.

Look wherever we will, we find proofs of human depravity, reigning uncontrolled in some, making frequent insurrection in all. It is written in our own hearts, by the pen of experience; the finger of observation points it out in the practice of others—even in the practice of those who have been saints of the first rank, and of the highest endowments. Yet they were defective;—defective too, in that very quality which was their distinguishing gift, in which they particularly excelled.

Ther. While we are talking, the day has insensibly stole itself away, and left us surrounded with twilight: which is a sort of lustre intermingled with darkness; no part wholly lucid, no part wholly obscure. An emblem, according to your representation, of the renewed soul and its imperfect holiness.

Asp. A very just one. Even where the gospel shines still there is an incurrent gloom of corruption. Ignorance mixes itself with our knowledge; unbelief cleaves to our faith: Nor is our purity free from all contamination. The prophet Zechariah, foretelling the establishment of the gospel kingdom, and describing the state of its spiritual subjects, says, "It shall come to pass in that day, that the light shall not be clear nor dark."* This, as to its literal sense, we now see exemplified in the circumambient atmosphere. With regard to its spiritual meaning, every true believer feels it accomplished in his own breast.

Ther. While you are so vehement in decrying all human attainments, consider, Aspasio, whether you do not check and dispirit us in the pursuit of exalted virtue.

Asp. I suppose you never expected to be such an adept in geometry as Archimedes, nor so profound an astronomer as Newton; yet this did not check your application to the study of mathematics, or the contemplation of the heavens. Your brother, the merchant, I presume, has no prospect of amassing the wealth of a Cæsus, or the immense treasures of a Kouli-Khan; yet this does not dispirit him in prosecuting the business which brings him both opulence and honour.

However, Theron, so long as you deny the imputation of Christ's righteousness, I must acknowledge you act a consistent part in being zealous for the perfection of personal obedience. You ought either to acquire the one, or to accept the other: Therefore I shall produce no more arguments for your discouragement; but shall comprise the whole of my answer in the motto to an Irish nobleman's arms—TRY. Or, if this be too concise, I will subjoin, with a very little alteration, the words of a king; "When you have attained what you pursue, bring me word again, that I may go and possess it also," Matth. ii. 8.

Ther. According to your account, the most advanced and established Christians are but like a company of invalids. Does not this extremely derogate from the honour of our Lord, considered as the Physician of souls? It seems to make a mere nothing of sanctification, and would swallow up Christ the King in Christ the Priest.

Asp. Invalids they are;* and such will continue till they are dismissed from this great infirmary, and admitted into that holy, happy, blessed world, where "the inhabitants shall no more say, I am, either in soul or in body, sick." Isa. xxxiii. 24.

If the cure was never to be completed, this doubtless would be dishonourable to our almighty Physician. But the spiritual recovery, begun on earth, and advancing through time, will be perfected in heaven, and prolonged to eternity. Does this make a mere nothing of sanctification? No; but it makes room for a continual progress, and affords cause for continual humiliation. It reserves a most exalted prerogative for the heavenly state and beatific vision; and perpetually reminds us of a most important truth,—That our present blessedness consists, not in being free from all sin, but in having no sin imputed to us. Psa'm xxxii. 2.

This imperfection of our obedience, instead of confounding, maintains a proper distinction between Christ the King, and Christ the Priest: whereas, if we were perfect in piety, the priestly office, with regard to us, would be superseded. What need of an intercessor to recommend our prayers? what occasion for an high priest to "bear

* Zech. xvi. 1 1 Cor. xiii. 9. "For we know in part." Perhaps this declaration of the apostle may be a key to the prophet's meaning. However, it is a sufficient confirmation of Aspasio's sentiment.

* Not the best of men lament their ignorance of the divine perfections, their slowness of heart to believe the divine promises, and the languor of their gratitude for inestimable, for innumerable gifts of the divine goodness. Do they not frequently feel deadness in their devotions, disorder in their affections, and various other relics of the original leaven?—Do they not often complain, in the language of the apostle, "When I would do good, evil is present with me; And say with the earliest Christians, "We that are in this tabernacle do groan, being burdened;" burdened, not so much with affliction—these heroes in Christianity had learned to rejoice in tribulation—but burdened with a sense of their spiritual infirmities, and with the workings of their inbred corruption; which, to a tender and lively believer, are the heaviest of crosses, and the most galling of loads. Nay, do not the heirs of glory wash their very robes, even their fairest deeds and their brightest graces, in the blood of the Lamb? which, if they were free from spot, and void of impurity, need not be made white in this sacred fountain. See 2 Cor. vi. 11 Rev. vii. 13.

the iniquity of our holy things?"* if some taint of the original leaven did not pollute our best services?

Neither does this detract from the wisdom, from the goodness, or from the power of Christ. It rather administers to the advantageous display of all these divine attributes: Of his wisdom, in conducting the affairs of his church with such exact propriety, that the righteousness of faith may have its due honour, and the sanctification of the Spirit its proper esteem: Of his goodness, in carrying on the work of grace amidst so much infirmity, and so many corruptions; and in crowning, with consummate happiness, such frail undeserving creatures: Of his power, in extracting a variety of benefits even from—

Ther. Benefits, Aspasio! Can any thing beneficial proceed from an evil, which, according to your own representation, is so incorrigibly malignant?

Asp. It will tend to make us lowly in our own eyes, when we remember that by nature we are altogether become abominable; that the remains of natural depravity still adhere to our minds. How must such a view of ourselves cover us with shame, and lay us low in abasement! "Less than the least of all thy mercies" Gen. xxxii. 10, will be the language of such a one's very soul.

It will dispose us to compassionate others. How can we take a brother by the throat, and require faultless perfection in his behaviour, when we ourselves in many things offend, in all things fall short? Every such consideration rebukes what I may call spiritual unmercifulness: it pleads for tenderness and forbearance to our fellow-creatures; it is a monitor within, and whispers that affecting remonstrance, "Oughtest not thou to have compassion upon thy fellow-servant, since thy almighty Lord hath" such renewed, such unwearied "pity on thee." Matth. xviii. 33.

It will teach us to admire the riches of grace. Shall fallen creatures, that are taken from the very dunghills of sin, and rescued from a hell of inward iniquity—shall they, notwithstanding their deplorable depravity, and innumerable deficiencies—shall they be admitted into the bosom of eternal love? they be exalted to the thrones of glory, and numbered with the princes of heaven? This is grace, transcendently rich, and divinely free indeed!

Will it not reconcile us to the approach of death? This, methinks, like wormwood on the nipple, or gall in the cup, must tend to wean us from the world. How can we be enamoured with such a land of darkness, and such a vale of tears? Or why should we covet, when Providence gives the signal for our departure, to prolong our abode in these territories of disorder? Surely this must incline us to leave them, every day, more and more in our affections; and at last to leave them, without any reluctance, by final dissolution: leave them for that better country, where our personal righteousness will no longer be defective, like the waning moon, but shine forth with consummate lustre, like the meridian sun, in the kingdom of our Father.

It will endure the blessed Jesus in every capacity; as the stings of the fiery flying serpents, and the dearth of the waste howling wilderness, endeared to the Israelites both their miraculous antidote, and their bread from heaven. They who believe this truth, must see their inexpressible and incessant need of Christ's Spirit. The prostration of Moses, on a particular occasion, will be the daily, the hourly breathing of their souls: "Carry us not up hence, unless thy presence, thy Spirit, go with us." Exod. xxxiii. 15. For without his aid, we can discharge no duty aright, nor successfully resist any temptation. They will be exceedingly cautious not to "grieve" (Eph. iv. 30) that sacred guest, lest he depart from them, and abandon them to the power of their lurking corruptions; knowing that if he abandon them, when such foes are within, and so many snares without, their case will be worse than Samson's, when his locks were shaven, and the Philistines all around him.

How highly will such persons value the blood of the covenant, and the intercession of their great High Priest! They will no more presume to enter into the presence of the most high God, without a fiducial reliance upon the atoning and interceding Saviour, than the sons of Jacob would have ventured to appear before the viceroy of Egypt, without the company of their younger brother. Gen. xlii. 5. In all, in all their intercourse with heaven, the great Propitiator will be their plea, and the great Advocate their confidence. The impotent man waited at the pool of Bethesda, and the Syrian general dipped seven times in Jordan. These persons will not only wait, but live by the "fountain opened for sin and uncleanness." Zech. xiii. 1. They will wash in the sacred sanctifying stream, not seven times only, but seventy times seven.

And when such sentiments possess the mind, how dear! O how dear and desirable will our Lord's obedience be! I called, some time ago, our own works worm-eaten things; and must not these corruptions, if they remain ever so little in the heart, tarnish our graces and debase our duties? Must they not be depreciatory to all our accompleishments, and too much like corroding vermin in the substance of our timber, or at the core of our fruits?—Should we not then renounce, utterly renounce, these tarnished worm-eaten things, and rely, wholly rely, for everlasting acceptance, on our divine High Priest, who, in his mediatorial works, as well as in his wonderful person, is altogether light and perfection?* and neither in him nor in them is there any deficiency or any darkness at all.

Excuse me, Theron; I fear I have been preaching. The importance of the text must form my apology. It is an introduction, not to the records of history, or the transactions of philosophy, but to the riches of Christ.

Ther. If my Aspasio has been preaching, I can assure him for his comfort, that his audience has been very attentive; and though the sermon was somewhat copious, the hearer neither slept nor gaped. However, I should be glad to have the whole reviewed and summed up, that if it has been large as the pyramid, it may, like the pyramid, terminate in a point.

Asp. This then is the state of our nature. The image of the Creator is lost; blindness is in the understanding; disorder in all the affections.—In the will, enmity against God, the sovereign good; inability to all that is spiritual and heavenly; with a propensity to whatever is sordid and earthly. The whole soul is deformed, distempered, rebellious. And shall such a creature lay claim to those amiable and sacred endowments, which may be a proper recommendation to infinite holiness? Is such a creature qualified to perform these righteous acts, which may approve themselves to the demand of God's law, and to the inflexibility of his justice?

Should he conceive the vain hope, or make the vainer attempt, I would now address him as Jehoash formerly answered Amaziah. Amaziah king of Judah, elated with the little victories he had obtained over the Edomites, began to fancy himself invincible. Prompted by this foolish imagination, he challenges Jehoash king of Israel to meet him in a pitched battle, and receives this ironical apologue by way of reply, which, for gallantry of spirit and delicacy of wit, for poignancy of satire and propriety of application, has seldom been equalled, perhaps never exceeded: "The thistle that was in Lebanon, sent to the cedar that was in Lebanon, saying, Give thy daughter to my son to wife; and there passed by a wild beast that was in Lebanon, and trod down the thistle." 2 Kings xiv. 9. What are we, when we offer to establish our own righteousness, or presume to justify ourselves before the most high God, but despicable thistles, that fancy themselves stately cedars. And is not every temptation, is not each corruption, a wild beast of the desert, which will trample on the impotent boaster, and tread his haughty pretensions in the dust?

DIALOGUE XIV.

ASPASIO was employed in preparing for his journey. Theron, free from business, and disengaged from company, had the greatest part of the day to himself, which he spent in reviewing the substance of their late conferences, not without intermingling aspirations to God for the guidance of his divine Spirit.

At evening he went, like the patriarch of old, "into the field to meditate," Gen. xxiv. 63, amidst the calm of nature to meditate on the grace of the gospel. The sky was peculiarly beautiful, and perfectly clear; only where the fine indigo received an agreeable heightening by a few thin and scattered clouds, which imbibed the solar rays, and looked like pensile fleeces of purest wool. All things appeared with so mild, so majestic, so charming an aspect, that, intent as he was upon a different subject, he could not but indulge the following soliloquy.

"How delightful are the scenes of rural nature! especially to the philosophic eye, and contemplative mind. I cannot wonder that persons in high life are so fond of retiring from a conspicuous and exalted station, to the covert of a shady grove, or the margin of a cooling stream; are so desirous of quitting the smoky town and noisy street, in order to breathe purer air, and survey the wonders of creation, in the silent, the serene, the peaceful villa.

"It is true, in the country there are none of the modish, I had almost said, meretricious ornaments of that false politeness, which refines people out of their veracity; but an easy simplicity of manners, with an unaffected sincerity of mind. Here the solemn farce of ceremony is seldom brought into play, and the pleasing delusions of compliment have no place. But the brow is the real index of the temper, and speech the genuine interpreter of the heart.

"In the country, I acknowledge, we are

* Light and perfection.—This is the meaning of that mysterious ornament, which, in the grand officiating robes of the Jewish high priest, was annexed to the breast-plate, and styled Urin and Thummim; only the Hebrew words are in the plural number, and denote every degree of illumination, and all kinds of perfection.—Does not this very significantly teach sinners whenceto seek their wisdom, and where to look for their perfection? There never was, in all ages, more than one Urin and Thummim, and only one person in each generation was appointed to wear it. And who is there, in all worlds, that can give us heavenly knowledge, but the Spirit of Christ? What is there in ourselves, or all creatures, that can present us unblamable before God, but the obedience of Christ?

seldom invited to see the mimic attempts of human art: But we everywhere, behold the grand and masterly exertions of divine power. No theatre erects its narrow stage, surrounds it with puny rows of ascending seats, or adorns it with a shifting series of gorgeous scenery: But fields extend their ample area, at first lightly clad with a scarf of springing green, then deeply planted with an arrangement of spindling stalks; as a few more weeks advance, covered with a profusion of bearded or husky grain; at last, richly laden with a harvest of yellow plenty.

"Meadows disclose their beautiful bosom; yield a soft and fertile lap for the luxuriant herbage, and suckle myriads of the fairest, gayest flowers; which, without any vain ostentation, or expensive finery, outvie each other in all the elegance of dress. Groves of various leaf, arrayed in freshest verdure, and liberal of their reviving shade, rise in amiable, in noble prospect all around. Droves of sturdy oxen, strong for labour, or fat for the shambles; herds of sleeky kine with milk in their udders, and violets in their nostrils; flocks of well fleeced sheep, with their snowy lambkins, frisking at their side—these compose the living machinery. Boundless tracts of bending azure, varnished with inimitable delicacy, and hung with starry lamps or irradiated with solar lustre, from the stately ceiling; while the early breezes, and the evening gales, charged with no unwholesome vapours, breeding no pestilential taint, but fanning the humid buds, and waving their odoriferous wings, dispense a thousand sweets, mingled with the most sovereign supports of health. And is not this school of industry, this magazine of plenty, incomparably more delightful, as well as infinitely less dangerous, than those gaudy temples of profuseness and debauchery, where sin and ruin wear the mask of pleasure, where Belial is daily or nightly worshipped with what his votaries call childish recreation, and genteel amusement?"

"Here indeed is no tuneful voice to melt in strains of amorous anguish, and transfuse the sickening fondness to the hearer's breast: No skilful artist, to inform the lute with musical enchantment, to strike infectious melody from the viol, and sooth away the resolution and activity of virtue in wanton desires or voluptuous indolence. But the plains bleat, the mountains low, and the hollow circling rocks echo with the universal song. Every valley re-murmurs to the fall of silver fountains, or the liquid lapse of gurgling rills. Birds, musicians ever beautiful, ever gay, perched on a thousand boughs, play a thousand sprightly and harmonious airs.

"Charmed, therefore, with the finest views, lulled with the softest sounds, and treated with the richest odours, what can be wanting to complete the delight? Here is every entertainment for the eye, the most refined gratifications for the ear, and a perpetual banquet for the smell, without any insidious decoy, for the integrity of our conduct, or even for the purity of our fancy.

"O ye blooming walks and flowery lawns, surrounded with dewy landscapes! how often have patriots and heroes laid aside the burden of power, and stole away from the glare of grandeur, to enjoy themselves in your composed retreats!* Ye mossy couches, and fragrant bowers, skirted with cooling cascades! how many illustrious personages, after all their glorious toil for the public good, have sought an honourable and welcome repose in your downy lap?† Ye venerable oaks and solemn groves; woods that whisper to the quivering gale, cliffs that overhang the darkened flood! who can number the sages and saints, that have devoted the day to study, or resigned a vacant hour to healthy exercise, beneath your sylvan porticoes and waving arches? that, far from the dull impertinence of man, have listened to the instructive voice of God, and contemplated the works of his adorable hand amidst your moss-grown cells and rocky shades? How inelegant, or how insensible is the mind, which has no awakened lively relish for these sweet recesses, and their exquisite beauties!"

But whither am I carried? Is not this rural enthusiasm? I find myself talking to trees, and forget the momentous question, which waits for our decision. Here, then, let my rhapsody end, and my inquiry proceed.—Does it betray a want of true delicacy, to be insensible of nature's charms? My Aspasio thinks, it argues as wrong a taste in practical divinity, not to acquiesce in the imputed righteousness of Jesus Christ. To this doctrine I have been always extremely averse. I set myself to oppose it with objections, drawn from the reason of things, and from various passages of scripture; to all which my friend replied. And though I was scarcely convinced, yet I was silenced by his answers.

I pleaded for the insufficiency of our sincere obedience, especially when accompanied with repentance, and recommended by the merits of Christ. Neither was this attempt successful: His arguments, somewhat like the flaming sword planted at the entrance of paradise, "turned every way;" Gen. iii. 24; and precluded all access to life on the foot of our own duty.

* ————"Mihi me reddentis agelli,"—says Horace of his little country-seat.

† Virgil was so smitten with the amiableness of these scenes, that he assigns them as an habitation for happy spirits, in the regions of Elysium.

"Lucis habitamus opacis,
Riparumque toros, et prata recentia rivis
Incolimus."

At length, Aspasio quitted the defensive, and attacked me in his turn. He explained the precepts, and enforced the threatenings of the divine law. So exact its tenor, that it demands a perfect and persevering conformity to every injunction. So extensive its authority, that it reaches the inmost thoughts, and requires obedience, not barely in the actions of life, but the very intentions of the heart. So inexorable its severity, that it condemns every the smallest offence, and curses every the least offender.

This remonstrance had some of the terror, and almost all the effect of a masked battery. It was quite unexpected, and alarmed me considerably. To push his advantage, he enlarged upon the infinite purity of God: A God, glorious in holiness, who cannot look upon evil with any connivance, or without the utmost abhorrence; before whom the heavens are unclean, and who will in no wise clear the guilty.

To complete his victory, he played off the doctrine of original guilt, and original depravity: That, besides the imputation of Adam's apostacy, besides the commission of numberless iniquities, we were born in sin; are, by nature, enmity against God; in all our faculties corrupt; in every imagination evil; and, even when renewed* by grace, are still, still tainted with some base remains of the old leprosy.

After all, he bid me consider—what fruits must spring from such a nature? how they must appear when compared with such a law? what they must deserve when tried before such a God? These, I must confess, are very weighty and startling queries. If these representations are true, the face of human affairs carries a most gloomy aspect; or rather, a most dreadful storm is hanging over the children of men. Aspasio urges me to fly, without any delay, to the covert of Christ's meritorious obedience. This, he says, was wrought out in my name, and in my stead; this will be admitted both at the throne of grace, and the bar of judgment, as my justifying righteousness.

This, he adds, opens a way, on God's part, for the largest emanations, and most honourable exercise of mercy. On man's part, it founds a title to pardon, to life and every spiritual blessing. This doctrine, especially in such a connexion, begins to put on a more recommending appearance. My prejudices are really wearing away. I am almost a convert.

Aspasio overheard the close of these reflections. Unwilling to interrupt his friend in so serious an inquiry, and desirous to observe the issue of so interesting a debate, he had hitherto concealed himself. But, thinking this a favourable minute, he stepped forward and said,—

Asp. Almost! and why not altogether a convert? What should hinder my dear The-ron from submitting to so rational a scheme, with the most entire acquiescence? What should hinder him from embracing so comfortable a doctrine with the utmost complacency? Why should he not subscribe, both with hand and heart, that divine decree? "Their righteousness is of me, saith the Lord," (Isa. liv. 17.)

Theo. If, by this doctrine, the claims of the law are answered—if the perfections of God are glorified—if the interests of morality are secured—I must acknowledge, it will be more worthy of acceptance than I could once have imagined.

Asp. And if these points are not gained, gained too in the most eminent manner, I solemnly declare, that I will never plead for imputed righteousness more.

But the claims of the law are all answered: For there is nothing in its sacred injunctions, which Christ did not perform; and nothing in its awful threatenings which Christ did not sustain. He fulfilled all its precepts, by an unspotted purity of heart, and the most perfect integrity of life. He exhausted its whole curse, when he hung upon the cross, abandoned by his Father, and a bleeding victim for the sins of his people. This obedience brings higher honour to the divine law, than it could have received from the uninterrupted duty of Adam, and all his posterity in all their generations.

The perfections of God which were dishonoured by our rebellion, are glorified. He appears, by this method of justification, inconceivably rich in showing mercy, yet steady, inflexibly steady, in executing vengeance. The sceptre of grace, and the sword of justice, have each its due exercise, each its full scope. The holiness of the divine nature, and the dignity of the divine government, are not only maintained, but most magnificently displayed. Indeed it is the peculiar excellence of this wonderful expedient, that it renders all the divine attributes supremely venerable, and supremely amiable.

Theo. But are the interests of morality secured?—This is what I am strongly inclined to doubt. And, to say the truth, this is now my principal objection to your scheme.

* "Even when renewed."—For a display of this important truth, and a remedy against this stubborn evil, let me refer the reader to a little treatise published by Dr. Owen, and entitled, "The Nature, Power, Deceit, and Prevalency of the Reminders of Indwelling Sin in Believers." The author's pen is indeed a dissecting knife, goes deep into this subject, and lays open this plague of the heart. Like a workman that need not be ashamed, he demonstrates his point, from the unerring word of God, and the acknowledged experience of Christians. Like a compassionate as well as able physician, he all alone prescribes the proper antidote; nay, he shows how the poison may be so over-ruled by divine grace, and so managed by the watchful patient, as to become medicinal, salutary, and conducive to the most beneficial purposes.

Asp. I shall never blame my friend for being vigilant and jealous over the interests of morality. If our doctrine had a malignant aspect on true morality, I would give my voice against it, and use all my endeavours to suppress it: But it is formed with every tendency to awaken the utmost dread of sin, and affect us with the warmest sense of our Creator's love. And is not that the strongest barrier against the encroachments of vice? Is not this the sweetest inducement to the practice of virtue?

I am glad to find, that a jealousy for the interests of morality is the chief obstacle in the way of your assent; because I am persuaded, it is much of the same nature with those forbidding and mistaken apprehensions which our ancestors entertained concerning the ocean. They looked upon it as an unsurmountable obstruction to universal society: whereas it is, in fact, the very cement of society: the only means of accomplishing a general intercourse, and the great highway to all the nations of the earth. What is here affirmed may, on some future occasion, be proved. At present let me desire you to imagine, rather may the blessed Spirit enable you to believe, that your sins are expiated through the death of Jesus Christ—that a righteousness is given you, by virtue of which you may have free and welcome access to God, the merit of which you may plead for obtaining all the blessings of time and eternity. Then let me ask, will this alienate your affections from your Almighty Benefactor? will this irritate evil concupiscence, or send you to carnal gratifications in quest of happiness. Quite the reverse. When this faith is wrought in your heart, nothing will be so powerful to produce holy love and willing obedience, to exalt your desires and enable you to overcome the world.

What says the apostle? "I through the law am dead to the law. Gal. ii. 29. Being made to understand its spirituality and perfection, I have no longer any hope of justification from my own conformity to its precepts. Did this prompt him, did this embolden him to neglect or violate his duty? Hear the sacred writer's own declaration;—I am released from the rigour and bondage of the law; I am directed to Christ for righteousness and salvation; "that I may live unto God;" that my whole life may be devoted to his honour, who has brought me into a state so delightful, into a liberty so glorious.

Ther. This liberty, I am afraid, will be of very little service to the licentious and gay world

Asp. I shall be in no pain even for the gay world, if once they cordially receive this grace, and are vitally influenced by this doctrine; which, far from dissolving the least obligation to obedience, or weakening any one principle of piety, adds to every other motive, the endearing engagements of gratitude and the winning persuasives of love.

Nay, I verily believe, that multitudes in the gay and licentious world are held fast in the fatal snare, by their ignorance of this sweet, alluring, consolatory truth. They find themselves deeply obnoxious to divine justice, and feel themselves strongly bound with the chains of sensuality. They think it is impossible to clear the enormous score of their guilt; impossible to deliver themselves from the confirmed dominion of sin. Therefore, like desperate debtors, they stifle every serious thought; lest a consciousness of their long arrears, and a prospect of the dreadful reckoning, should "torment them before the time." Matt. viii. 29.

But if they were informed, that the infinitely-merciful Son of God has undertaken to redeem such undone and helpless sinners; that he has thoroughly expiated the most horrid transgressions, and procured, even for ungodly wretches, all the needful supplies of strengthening grace; that, instead of being prohibited, they are invited to partake, freely to partake, of these unspeakable blessings: were they acquainted with these glad tidings of the gospel, surely they would burst their chains, and spring to liberty. These truths, if once revealed in their hearts, would, of all considerations, be most effectual to "make them free." John viii. 32.

What shall I say more to obtain my Theron's approbation? Shall I point out and plead the most illustrious precedents?—God the Father is well pleased with this righteousness of our Redeemer. He expresses his complacency by the most emphatical words: "Behold my servant whom I uphold; mine elect, in whom my soul delighteth." Isaiah xlii. 1. In Christ and his righteousness, God is not only pleased but "delighted; his "very soul," every perfection of the Godhead, with ineffable satisfaction, rests and acquiesces in them. — I said ineffable; for he has declared this, in a manner superior to all the energy of language, by raising our crucified Surety from the dead, by exalting him to the heaven or heavens, and placing him at his own right hand in glory.

Our Lord Jesus Christ is well pleased. He esteems it his honour to shine forth as the everlasting righteousness of his people: It is the brightest jewel of his mediatorial crown. In this he "sees of the travail of his soul, and is satisfied:" accounting himself fully recompensed for all the labours of his life, and all the sorrows of his death, when sinners are washed from their guilt in his blood, and presented faultless by his obedience.

The Holy Spirit is equally pleased with this great transaction, and its noble effects. It is his peculiar office, and favourite employ, to convince the world of their Saviour's righteousness: not only that his nature was spotlessly pure, and his conversation perfectly holy; but that from both results a righteousness of infinite dignity and everlasting efficacy; sufficient, throughout all ages sufficient, for the acceptance and salvation of the most unworthy creatures.

Since then this method of acceptance and salvation is excellent and glorious in the eyes of the most adorable Trinity; since it magnifies the law, and yields the most exalted honour to its divine Author; since it makes ample provision for the holiness of a corrupt, and the happiness of a ruined world; why should my friend any longer dislike it, oppose it, or treat it with a cold indifference? Surely all these grand recommendations are enough to overrule any little objections which may arise from the suspicions of timidity, or may be started by the artifices of sophistry.

Ther. I know not how it is, Aspasio; but I cannot reconcile myself to this doctrine of imputed righteousness, notwithstanding all the pains you have taken to make me a convert.

Asp. The disappointment is mine, but the loss is yours, Theron. However, let me entreat you not to reject my sentiments absolutely, nor to condemn them prematurely. Suppose it possible, at least, that they may be true, and weigh them in an even balance. Learn wisdom from your Aspasio's folly. I was once exactly in your situation; saw things in your light, and through your medium.

Conversing, I well remember, with a devout, but plain person, our discourse happened to turn upon that solemn admonition; "If any man will come after me, let him deny himself." Matth. xvi. 24. I was haranguing upon the import and extent of the duty; showing, that merely to forbear the infamous action, is little. We must deny admittance, deny entertainment at least, to the evil imagination; and quench even the enkindling spark of irregular desire. When I had shot a random bolt, my honest friend replied, "There is another instance of self-denial, to which this injunction extends, and which is of very great moment in the Christian religion: I mean, the instance of renouncing our own strength, and our own righteousness; not leaning on that for holiness, not relying on this for justification." I thought the old man, I must confess, little better than a superstitious dotard; and wondered at (what I then fancied) the motley mixture of piety and oddity in his notions. But now I discern sense, solidity, and truth in his observation.* Now I perceive, that we ourselves are often the dreamers, when we imagine others to be fast asleep.

Ther. I shall not forget your caution, and will endeavour to avoid the rock on which my Aspasio struck, but happily, it seems, escaped shipwreck. You may likewise assure yourself, that upon a subject of exceeding great and eternal consequence, I shall not fail to use the most attentive and impartial consideration. An indolent supineness or a bigotted obstinacy, in this great crisis of affairs, would be of all errors the most inexcusable, and must prove of all miscarriages the most fatal.

Asp. But still you cannot reconcile yourself. And no wonder. For this way of salvation runs directly counter to the stream of corrupt nature. It puzzles our reason, and offends our pride. What? shall we not work, but "believe unto righteousness?" Rom. x. 10. Shall we receive all freely, and reckon ourselves no better than unprofitable servants? This is a method to which we should never submit; this is a proposal which we should always spurn, were not our sentiments rectified, and our hearts new-moulded, by sovereign grace.

Let me remind you of a little incident which you must have read in the Grecian history. A certain stranger came, one day, to dine with some Lacedaemonians. They, you know, always sat down at a public table, and were content with the plainest food. The gentleman, accustomed to higher eating, could not forbear expressing his disgust at the homely provision. Sir, said the cook, you do not make use of the sauce. What do you mean? replied the guest. You do not use hard exercise; nor habituate yourself to long abstinence, nor bring a sharpened appetite to the meal.—And you, my dear friend, I am apprehensive, have not the sauce, have not the proper preparative for this salutary doctrine, which is indeed the bread of life, and the very marrow of the gospel.

Ther. What preparative?

Asp. A sense of your great depravity, your extreme guilt, and your utterly undone condition.—While destitute of these convictions, our souls will be like the full stomach, that loathes even the honey-comb. So long as these convictions are slight, and hover only in the imagination, we shall be like Gallio,* listless, indifferent, and "

ever have put those words into the mouth of a divine speaker.

—Thy merit
Imputed shall absolve them, who renounce
Their own, both righteous and unrighteous, deeds
And live in thee transplanted, and from thee
Receive new life.—Book iii. l. 290.

* Acts xviii. 17. A late commentator, of distinguished eminence, has attempted to vindicate Gallio's conduct; and would represent it as an amiable instance of prudence and moderation.

According to my apprehension, this Roman governor acted a part both irreligious and unjust. Irreligious, because he refused to hear the apostle's defence,

* Milton thought the same, otherwise he would not for none of these things." But when they are deep and penetrate the heart, then the righteousness of a Redeemer will be sweet, tasteful, and inviting, as myrrh and frankincense to the smell, as milk and honey to the palate, as gold and treasures to the ruined bankrupt.

Ther. What method would you advise me to use, in order to get these convictions impressed on my heart?

Asp. Endeavour to understand God's holy law. Consider how pure, how extensive, how sublimely perfect it is. Then judge of your spiritual state, not from the flattering suggestions of self-love, nor from the defective examples of your fellow-creatures, but by this unerring standard of the sanctuary. Above all, beseech the God and Father of our Lord Jesus Christ to send his enlightening Spirit into your soul. For indeed, without the enlightening influences of the Spirit, we may have the divine law in our own hand, we may comprehend its grammatical meaning, yet be like blind Bartimeus under the meridian sun. It is the blessed Spirit alone who can rend the veil of ignorance from our minds, and show us either "the wonderful things of God's law," or the glorious mysteries of his gospel. In this sense, our polite poet* speaks a truth, as singularly important, as it is elegantly expressed:

He from thick films shall purge the visual ray,
And on the sightless eye-ball pour the day.—
POPE'S Messiah.

Will you give me leave to propose another expedient, which I believe may be considerably serviceable in this particular case,—which I am assured will be greatly advantageous in many other respects?

Ther. Backward as I am to adopt your doctrine, I am no enemy to my own interest; therefore shall not only give you leave to propose, but give you thanks for communicating so valuable an advice.

Asp. It is, in reality, none of mine. It was long ago recommended by your old acquaintance Horace.† It consists in keeping a diary.

Compile a secret history of your heart and conduct. Take notice of the manner in which your time is spent, and of the strain which runs through your discourse; how often the former is lost in trifles, how often the latter evaporates in vanity. Attend to which was the most likely means of his conversion and salvation. Unjust, because he permitted Sosthenes, then an innocent person, afterwards a disciple of Christ, (1 Cor. i. 1.) to be so illegally treated, and outrageously abused, without interposing for his rescue.

* Mr. Pope, in his charming poem styled the Messiah.

the principle from which your actions flow; whether from the steady habitual love of God, or from some rambling impulse, and a customary propensity to please yourself. Minute down your sins of omission; how frequently you neglect to glorify your Creator, to edify your fellow-creatures, and to improve yourself in knowledge and holiness. Observe the frame of your spirit in religious duties—with what reluctance they are undertaken, and with what indevotion performed; with how many wanderings of thought, and how much dullness of desire: how often, in the common affairs of life, you feel the inordinate sallies of passion, the workings of evil concupiscence, or the intrusion of foolish imaginations.

Register those secret faults, to which none but your own conscience is privy, and which none but the all-seeing eye discerns. Often review these interesting memoirs. Frequently contemplate yourself in this faithful mirror. An artist some time ago took a survey of your estate, drew the form and measured the dimensions of each enclosure, pictured out every hedge, and scarce omitted a single tree that grew upon the premises. Act thus with your will, your understanding, your affections. These are your noble internal demesne, of which none but yourself can be a competent surveyor.

Ther. It is unreasonable and preposterous, I must acknowledge, to be minutely exact in meaner matters, and use no accuracy of inspection in the most momentous affairs; to have a correct draught of our lands, which are a transient inheritance, and no map of that everlasting possession—the soul.

Asp. Gratify me then, my dear Theron, in this particular. As I purpose to set out very early in the morning, I shall insist upon it that you do not rise before your usual time in order to compliment my departure. But I now make it my last wish, and my parting request, that you will for some months at least keep a diary.

You have wondered at my opinion concerning the corruption of our nature, and the insufficiency of our own righteousness. This may seem strange, this may appear shocking, to a mind unacquainted with itself. But when you have searched your heart by this probe—when you have felt the pulse of your soul by self-examination—then you will be better able to judge of my sentiments, and enter into the reasons of my faith.

By this means we shall also discover the sins that most easily beset us, which most frequently elude our vigilance, and baffle our resolution. We shall learn how to post our guard, when to exercise the strictest watch, and where to direct the artillery of prayer. In a word, we shall learn, better than from ten thousand volumes, to know ourselves: a knowledge which was supposed by the ancient philosophers, to descend from heaven ; and which, I believe, our Christian divines will allow, has a happy tendency to lead people thither ; because, of all other preparatives, it best disposes them for that blessed Redeemer, who is the way, the only way to those blissful mansions.

Now I have mentioned a way, let me suppose you travelling through an unknown country. You come to a place, where the road divides itself into two equally-inviting parts. You are at a loss which track to pursue. Whose direction will you choose to follow ? that man's who has passed through neither of them ; that man's who has passed through one of them only ; or that man's who has passed and repassed them both ? To wait for an answer, would be an affront to your judgment. Only let me observe, that the last is your Aspasio's case. He has travelled long, and proceeded far, even in your path. All that circumspection and assiduity, all that prayer and self denial, all that fasting and alms, and every other means of grace could do, in order to establish a righteousness of his own, has been done : But to no purpose. He has also trod every step in the way which he recommends to his beloved friend. He has made the trial ; can set his probatum est to whatever he advises ; and may very truly say, with his divine Master, " We speak that we do know," John iii. 11, and testify that we have experienced.

Ther. I am sorry to observe, that the night is coming on, and our conversation almost at an end. My regret is increased, by the consideration of your intended journey. Though business obliges you to depart, it will, I hope, afford you leisure to write. This will be some compensation for the want of your company.

Yonder sun is sinking below the horizon, and just taking his leave of our earth. To retard the departing radiance, at least to alleviate the approaching loss, those western clouds catch the rays, and reflect them to our view in a most amusing diversity of colours. By this means we enjoy the great luminary in his beams, even when his orb is withdrawn from our sight.—An epistolary correspondence has something of the same nature. Letters may be called the talk of absent friends. By this expedient, they communicate their thoughts, even though countries, kingdoms, or seas intercept their speech. You must therefore promise me this satisfaction ; and let me converse with my Aspasio by the pen, when I can no longer have an intercourse with him in person.

Asp. You have anticipated me, Theron. Otherwise, what is now my promise would have been my request.

I cannot but take notice of another particularity in that magnificent assemblage of clouds. How they varied their appearance, as the lamp of day changed its situation ! A little while ago, these curtains of the sky were streaked with orange, or tinged with amber. Presently, they borrowed the blush of the rose, or the softened red of the pink. Ere long, they glow with vermilion, or deepen into crimson. Soon succeeds the purple-tinctured robe of majesty ; and as soon (thus transient is all sublunary grandeur !) gives place to the sable veil of evening, or the gloomy pall of night. Such, I trust, will be the issue of my Theron's present apprehensions. All his splendid ideas of human excellency and self-righteousness will become faint, will lose their imaginary lustre, till at length they fade away, and darken into absolute self-abasement. Then the Sun of Righteousness will be amiable, will be desirable, as the beauties of the dawn breaking upon the shades of night.

LETTERS.

LETTER I.

ASPASIO TO THERON.

DEAR THERON,—I AM NOW at the seat of my worthy friend Camillus, where business and inclination will fix me for some weeks. This evening we had a most pleasing ramble. I have met with nothing so agreeable since I left your house, and lost your company.

The time was just arrived, and the scene was fully opened, which furnished our great poet with his fine description :

Now was the sun in western cadence low,
From noon : and gentle airs, due at their hour,
To fan the earth now waked, and usher in
The evening cool.

At this juncture, Camillus invited me to take the air. We walked several times along a close shady alley, arched with the foliage of filberts. Here, hid from every eye, and the whole world withdrawn from our view, we seemed like monks strolling in their cloisters. Turning short at the end, we enter a parallel range of majestic and uniformly spreading walnut-trees. This transition was somewhat like advancing, through a low porch, into the aisles of a magnificent cathedral. The broad leaf and large trunk of those lordly trees, their very diffusive spread, added to their prodigious height, gave them an air of uncommon dignity. It swells the imagination with vast ideas, and entertains us with a romantic kind of delight, to expatiate amidst such huge columns, and under such superb elevations of living architecture.

Quitting our cathedral, we turn once again, and pass into a grand colonnade of oaks; so regular in their situation, so similar in their size, and so remarkably correspondent in every circumstance, that they looked like the twins of nature, not only belonging to the same family, but produced at the same birth. Through these lay a walk, straight, spacious, and gracefully long, far exceeding the last in the extent of its area, though much inferior in the stateliness of its ceiling. It put me in mind of that divine benignity, which has allowed us six days for the prosecution of our own comparatively low affairs, and set apart but one for the more immediate attendance on the sublime exercises of devotion.

This walk was covered with the neatest gravel, and not a weed to be seen, nor one sprig of grass, through the whole extended surface. It stole into a continual ascent, yet so very gradually, that the rise was scarce discernible, either by the searching eye, the toiling feet, or the panting breath. At the extremity, a handsome summer-house showed a flight of steps, and half a Venetian door. The rest of the building was hid by the clustering branches.

As soon as we enter the apartment, Camillus throws open the left-hand sash, and with it a most enlarged and amusive prospect. The structure appeared situate on the brow of a considerable eminence, whose sides were partly confused and wild with broken rocks, partly shagged and perplexed with thorny shrubs. The spectator is agreeably surprised to find himself accommodated with so elegant a mansion, on the summit of so rude and ruinous a spot. But how greatly is his surprise and his satisfaction augmented, when he casts his eye forward, and beholds the beautiful meads, which, from the foot of this rugged hill, stretch themselves into a space almost unmeasurable!

Through the midst of this extensive vale, which was decked with the finest verdure, and replenished with the richest herbage, a river rolled its copious flood—rolled in a thousand serpentine meanders, as though it had lost its way in the flowery labyrinth, or made repeated efforts of flowing back to its source, till at last, having wandered more than twice the length of the meadows, having held a mirror to the aspiring poplars and bending willows, having paid a welcome salute to several ornamented villas, and passed through the arches of two or three curiously pendent bridges, it seemed to meet the sky, and mingle with the horizon.

Opposite to the front window, a cascade fell from the adjacent stream. It flashed and foamed along the broad slope, indented with small pits, and jagged with protuberant stones. The current, vexed and embarrassed, seemed to rave at the intervening obstacles, and forcing its rapid, indignant, sonorous way, struck the ear with a peal of liquid thunder. These fretful waters—let our angry passions observe the admonition, and follow the example—soon were pacified, soon forgot to chide. Collected into a little rivulet, they ran off in calm and silent lapse, till they lost themselves amongst beds of osier and plantations of alder.

The river, widening as it flowed, was parted here and there by several little islands; some tufted with reeds, and the resort of swans; some adorned with stately porticoes and splendid alcoves, the graceful retreats of rural pleasure; some furnished with green embowering walks, fitted for studious retirement and sedate contemplation. On either side of the charming valley, towns and villages lay thick, and looked gay, adding ornament and variety to the scene, and receiving innumerable advantages from the passing wave.

The whole recalled to an attentive observer's mind that amiable and august spectacle, which the Syrian soothsayer could not behold without a rapture of delight: Numb. xxiii. 7: "From the top of the rocks I see the tribes of Jehovah, and from the hills I behold the habitations of his chosen people. How goodly are thy tents, O Jacob! and thy tabernacles, O Israel! As the valleys are they spread forth, as gardens by the river's side; as trees of exquisite fragrance,* which the Lord hath planted; as cedars of stateliest growth, flourishing beside the waters."

We had but just looked about us when a messenger came for Camillus. As he was called to settle some private affairs, I chose to stay in this inviting retreat; and determined to make myself amends for the loss of Camillus' company, by beginning a correspondence with my Theron. We have pen, ink, and paper, in all our rural retirements, that if any thing is started in discourse, or occurs in meditation, worthy to be remembered, it may immediately be committed to writing.

* Numb. xxiv. 5. 6. It is well known that the original word is used in the sacred writings, to denote either a delightful perfume, Prov. vii. 17, or that aromatic plant which produces it. Cant. iv. 14. For which reason, I think it very justifiable to render the expression, "trees of exquisite fragrance," and am persuaded it will be far more intelligible to the generality of readers, than "trees of lign aloes."

I could not but observe to my friend, that, fine as the prospect appeared, there was one decoration wanting; if some grand deformity may be called a decoration. The ridges of a bleak and barren mountain, or the skirts of a sun-burnt tawny heath, would give additional liveliness to the ornamented parts of the landscape, and make their beauties strike with double vigour. This also, by showing us what wretched abodes and inhospitable quarters might have fallen to our share, would awaken in our hearts a more fervent gratitude to the Supreme Disposer of things; who has cast our "lot in a fairer ground, and given us a more goodly heritage."

So, a proper knowledge of the divine law—of its sublime perfections and rigorous sanction—joined with a conviction of our own extreme deficiency and manifold transgressions;—all this would endear the blessed Jesus to our affections, and powerfully recommend his righteousness to our desires. The remainder of this epistle, therefore, shall turn upon some instances of duty enjoined in that sacred system: by which it may be highly useful to examine our conduct and sift our hearts; in which, I believe, we have all fallen short, and are all become guilty; from which, we may learn the imperfection of our best services, and see the inexpressible need of a better righteousness than our own.

The knowledge of God is the foundation of all vital religion, and indeed is the consummation of human happiness. It is not only matter of present duty, but the very essence of our future bliss: "This is life eternal, to know thee the only true God, and Jesus Christ whom thou hast sent." John xvii. 3. Yet, important and obligatory as it is, are we not very defective in this divine science? Have we duly acquainted ourselves with the marvellous excellencies of the Lord Jehovah? his uncontrollable power, and all-comprehending wisdom; his unbounded goodness, and unwearied patience; his immaculate holiness, and inflexible justice; his never-failing faithfulness, and inviolable veracity? Have we, according to the direction of our inspired tutor, pursued this sacred study on our knees? James i. 5; and sought this most noble of all intellectual endowments, not merely from books, but principally at the throne of grace? Have we sought it, like that ancient Jewish student, with an early application, and with incessant assiduity; even "from the flower till the grape was ripe?" Eccl. li. 15.

Is that scanty ray of knowledge, which perhaps has forced itself through our original darkness, operative on our affections? "Have we loved the Lord our God with all our heart?"—"This is the first and great commandment!" Matth. xxii. 38. Have we constantly entertained the most magnificent and honourable thoughts of his sublime perfections? Is our esteem for this immensely great and most blessed Being, high, superlative, matchless? somewhat like that expressed by the Psalmist, "Whom have I in heaven but thee? and there is none upon earth that I desire in comparison of thee," Psalm lxxiii. 25. Have we been affectionately concerned for his glory, and zealous to advance his holy religion? troubled, very sensibly troubled, when our Maker's honour has been trampled in the dust, by licentious tongues, or flagitious deeds?

Have we made it our ruling care to approve the whole of our life, and the most secret transactions of our breast, to his all-seeing eye? resolved, deliberately resolved to sacrifice, not only our darling lusts, but even our most valuable interests, whenever they stand in competition with the good pleasure of his will? In a word, as the hart panteth after the water-brooks, with such vehement and inextinguishable ardour have we thirsted after—a brighter manifestation of his divine attributes—some sweeter assurances of his special love—and an ever increasing conformity to his holy image?

Such was the temper of those excellent men, who are characterised in the scriptures of truth as children of the Highest, and patterns for our imitation. This is their language: "The desire of our soul is unto thy name, and to the remembrance of thee. With my soul have I desired thee in the night; yea, with my spirit within me will I seek thee early."* Isa. xxvi. 8, 9. Neither is such warmth of love, and fervour of desire, any needless or extravagant pitch of devotion: but a reasonable service, indispensably due, from all intelligent creatures, to the great author of their being; in whom all possible perfections, with the utmost exaltation and dignity, reside: from whom all manner of blessings, in the most copious and never-failing communications, flow.

When we receive from an absent friend rich and repeated presents; casks of gener-

*We can hardly tell which to admire most, the beauty of the description, or the piety of the persons. I have desired, and not with inactive wishes, but such as prompt to vigorous endeavours. I will seek thee; and early, with the most vigilant application, and unwearied assiduity. The emphasis is very much increased, by the addition of these lively words, "with my soul, yea, with my whole spirit;" with the whole bent and sway of my affections, and with the steady invariable determination of my judgment. Thus have I desired thee, even in the night: when both the pursuits and the thoughts of other people are sunk and lost in profound repose. Thus will I seek thee, with a zeal—early as the rising—constant as the returning sun.

ous wine, or jars of delicious fruit, we feel ourselves enkindled into a grateful affection. We honour, we love the person, who allows us such a distinguished place in his heart; and expresses his cordial regard, by such a series of active and tender benevolence. The blessed God is a friend to us all, infinitely powerful, and equally munificent. We are the constant objects of his more than friendly, of his parental cares. Every passing moment is a messenger of his patience, and charged with some token of his bounty. For our sake, he has diffused blessings over all the face of the earth, and commanded every element to concur in ministering to our accommodation. He has not only adapted his benefits to our several wants; but has given them a diversification, large as the scope of our wishes; and an enrichment, far beyond all that our fancy could conceive. Profuse liberality! yet small and scanty, compared with his most adorable benignity in Christ Jesus.

What, if God, willing to manifest the superabundant riches of his kindness, had made bare the arm of his omnipotence, and struck a most miraculous road through the surges of the ocean, to afford us a safe passage?—if, to accommodate us in our travels, he had brought waters out of the flinty rock; and bid the ravens bring meat to our hands, bid the winds convey manna to our doors?—if, to furnish us with a commodious settlement, he had dethroned mighty kings, dispossessed populous nations, and made the walls of impregnable cities fall to the ground?—if, to further the dispatch of our business, or facilitate the conquest of our enemies, he had arrested the sun in his meridian career, and laid an embargo upon the moon setting out on her nightly tour? In short, if, to promote our welfare, he had suspended the powers, and controlled the laws of universal nature; had wrought all the miracles exhibited in the land of Egypt, or recorded in the volumes of inspiration;—should we not think ourselves under the most inviolable engagements to love the Lord our God, “who had done so great things for us?” to love him unfeignedly and ardently; to love him with a supreme affection, far above every other amiable object? Yet we have greater, incomparably greater obligations to our almighty Benefactor. For (hear, O heavens! wonder, O earth! and let eternity dwell upon the stupendous truth!) “God spared not his Son—his own Son”—his transcendently glorious and divinely excellent Son—but delivered him up to the deepest humiliation, and to the most accursed death, for us men, and our salvation.”

O, Theron! have we been impressed with wonder, at the contemplation of this goodness? Have our hearts glowed with gratitude, under a sense of these mercies? Surely no man need be convicted of any other crime at the great tribunal than insensibility of such love, and ingratitude for such favours. This, without the accession of horrid impieties, is enough to leave him absolutely inexcusable. This is enough to prove him one of the most disingenuous and detestable of creatures.

Have we exercised ourselves in frequent thanksgiving? Many are the exhortations to this honourable duty. “Praise thy God, O Zion,” Psalm cxlvii. 12, “praise him for his mighty acts;” Psalm cl. 2; “praise him according to his excellent greatness.” Innumerable are the incitements to abound in this pleasant service. Every comfort has a voice, and cries in the ear of reason, “O that men would therefore praise the Lord for his goodness!” Every deliverance enforces the address, and furnishes fresh materials for the heavenly employ. The man after God’s own heart declares, as an inviting example for our practice, “I will bless the Lord at all times; his praise shall continually be in my mouth.” Psalm xxxiv. 1. “Yea, as long as I have any being, I will sing praises unto my God,” Psalm cxlvi. 2. Indeed, when we consider the inexhaustibly rich bounty of God our Creator, and the inconceivably tender mercy of God our Redeemer, it is both strange and deplorable that the love of God is not always prevailing in our hearts, and the language of praise ever flowing from our lips.

I will not suppose our character so irreligious, that we have neglected the daily worship of God, either in our closet or in our family: But have we prayed with that profound reverential awe, which is due to the high and lofty One, “who inhabiteth eternity?” Have we made our supplications with that fervent importunity which may, in some measure, correspond with the extreme indigence of our state, and the invaluable worth of the blessings we crave? Have our petitions been attended with that steady affiance, which may glorify the goodness, the power, the veracity of the Lord? may evidently declare that he “is rich in mercy to all that call upon him;” Rom. x. 12; that he is the Lord Jehovah, in whom is everlasting strength;” Isa. xxvi. 4; “that he is the God of truth, and faithful for ever.” Deut. xxxii. 4. We call him Father; but have we trusted in him with that unsuspecting, cheerful, filial confidence, which a child reposes on the fidelity and indulgence of such an earthly relative? Have we not entertained, too often entertained, narrow, dishonourable, beggarly apprehensions, concerning the treasures of his liberality, and the bowels of his pity; rating them even lower than our parents, our friends, or our own?

* Among these exhortations, we may rank that beautiful and devout address to God, Psalm xxii. 3. Thou that inhabitest—light inaccessible, shall I say? the regions of immensity, or the ages of eternity? No, but what is a more exalted character—the praises of Israel: finely signifying that praise is a most acceptable sacrifice, to which the divine Majesty attends with the greatest delight; intimating also, that the exercise of praise should not be an occasional thing, like a transient visit to a stranger’s house; but a daily and almost unintermitted service, like the stated residence of a person in his own habitation.

Have we been careful to carry the spirit of our prayers into our ordinary conversation, and waited at the door, as well as approached to the throne of grace?—Amidst the intervals of our solemn devotions, have we cultivated an ejaculatory intercourse with heaven? How highly would the ambitious courtier prize, and how frequently would he use a privy key, which should give him, at all hours, free admittance to his sovereign. This key of admittance, only to an infinitely more exalted Potentate, we all possess in the practice of mental aspirations to God. It is certainly the noblest employ, and will be the richest improvement of our thoughts, to send them in such short embassies to the King of kings; and to derive, by such occasional sallies of faith* a renewed supply

* We have, in Scripture, very remarkable instances of the success which has attended ejaculatory prayer. Observe Nehemiah: He stands before Ahasuerus, apprehensive of the monarch's displeasure, yet desirous to solicit him in behalf of Jerusalem. To be delivered from his fears, and to obtain his desires, what method does he use? The mean and servile arts of flattery? No; but the manly and devout expedient of prayer. I prayed, says the patriot, to the God of heaven.—We cannot suppose, that he fell on his knees, or spoke with his lips, while he continued in the royal presence. But he darted up his soul in silent supplication; which supplication pierced the clouds, reached the eternal throne, and returned not again till a blessing was sent; such as totally averted the wrath he dreaded, and procured favour and assistance much larger than he expected. Neh. ii. 4.

When David heard that Abithophel, the ablest politician in his Kingdom, was revolted to Absalom; sensible what a loss his affairs had sustained, and what an advantage the rebellious party had acquired, he betook himself to his God. He staid not for an opportunity of retirement, but instantly and upon the spot cried, "O Lord, I pray thee, turn the counsel of Abithophel into foolishness."—A short address, but very efficacious. He who disappointeth the devices of the crafty, sent a spirit of infatuation among the rebels; and inclined them to reject the advice of that judicious statesman. Which false step brought upon their hard enterprise the ruin it deserved, and chagrined the wretched traitor, even to rage, frenzy, and suicide. 2 Sam. xv. 31; xvii. 23.

Amyntor, at a memorable period of his life, was under great distress of conscience, and harassed by violent temptations. He made his case known to an experienced friend, who said, "Amyntor, you do not pray."—Surprised at this, he replied, "I pray, if such a thing be possible, too much. I can hardly tell how many times in the day I bow my knee before God: almost to the omission of my other duties, and the neglect of my necessary studies." "You mistake my meaning, dear Amyntor. I do not refer you to the ceremony of the knee, but to the devotion of the heart: which neglects not any business, but intermingles prayer with all; which, in every place, looks unto the Lord: and, on every occasion, lifts up an indigent, longing soul, for the supply of his grace. Thus," (added he, and spoke with a peculiar vehemence), "this is the prayer which all the devils in hell cannot withstand." This, I would further observe, is the prayer which brings down somewhat of heaven into the heart; in which I would desire to abound, and would earnestly recommend to all my acquaintance, and all my readers.

from the fountain of all good. How great a loss then must it be to our spiritual interests, and how contemptuous a disregard of the ever-present Jehovah, to omit entirely, or long to discontinue, this most beneficial practice of habitual adoration?—Can you, my dear Theron, acquit yourself on this article of inquiry? Has not every day of your life been a day of negligence in this respect; been a perpetual disobedience to our Saviour's injunction, "Men ought, in this manner, always to pray, and not to faint?" Luke xviii. 1.

Have we sanctified the Sabbath? Has the Lord's day, with all its solemn and sacred offices, been our delight? Have we remembered that distinguished portion of our time, as Jacob remembered the delightful interview at Peniel? Have we expected it, as merchants expect the arrival of a richly laden vessel? Have we improved it, as husbandmen improve the shining hours of the harvest? Have we wholly laid aside every earthly engagement, "not speaking our own words," Isa lviii. 13, nor allowing ourselves in any gratifications that may interrupt our communion with the Father of Spirits? Has "one day in his courts been preferable to a thousand," Psal. lxxxiv. 10, spent either in the works of our calling, or in the scenes of recreation? Have the memorials of our Redeemer's dying merits, and the seals of his unchangeable loving-kindness, been relished as a feast, and prized as a portion?

Have we honoured God's holy word? What greater mark of disrespect than to despise a person's discourse, and not to think his speech worthy of our notice? especially when he addresses us with very great seriousness, and with the utmost affection. In our Bible, the God of glory speaks to his creatures; speaks with the most persuasive energy, and with all the yearnings of parental tenderness. Have we listened to our Creator, with reverence and delight; and rejoiced with trembling at—"Thus saith the Lord?"

Have we searched the oracles of truth, not merely as scholars, but as sinners; not from a spirit of curiosity, or with an air of formality, but with a solicitude and ardour becoming persons who inquire after the Saviour of their lost souls? Have we submitted our inmost thoughts to their impartial scrutiny; to receive conviction of sin from their awful remonstrances, and to hear the sentence of condemnation at their righteous bar? Have we been willing to suffer the reproach of conscious baseness, while they have ripped up the disguises of falsehood, laid open our secret iniquities, and brought all our evil ways to remembrance? Thus Josiah acted: "His heart was tender, and he humbled himself before the Lord: he rent his clothes, and wept before the Lord, when he heard the words of the book of the law." 2 Chron. xxiv. 27.

Have we hid the glad tidings of the gospel within our memories, within our hearts? Have we been diligent to suck this "honeycomb" (Cant. v. 1.) of grace, by concomitant meditation, and subsequent prayer? Have we valued the precious promises, as gentlemen of wealth value the writings of their private estates; or as enfranchised bodies esteem the charter of their public privileges? Have we, like the princely patriarch, longed for those words of edification, exhortation, and comfort, more than for our necessary food? Job xxiii. 12, and, like the royal prophet, prevented the night-watches, that we may be occupied in those statutes and ordinances of heaven? Psalm cxix. 148.

We have hitherto confined the examination to a few instances of the affirmative kind; how dreadfully will the dark account be swelled, if, instead of love and obedience, there be hatred and opposition—hatred of the name, glory, and worship of God—opposition to his interest, kingdom, and service?

God is infinite perfection, worthy of all admiration, exalted above all praise. Yet do not our thoughts more frequently, or more naturally, turn upon our own accomplishments, than upon the adorable and shining attributes of the almighty? This is, in itself, the most shameful dotage; and, in God's sight, the most abominable idolatry. Yet let us observe what passes within, and we shall probably find, that as damps arise in the mines, or fogs in the fenny grounds, so naturally and so copiously do these overweening reflections arise in our depraved minds.

God is an everlasting King. Have we not too often resisted his authority? Have we not, as far as in us lay, deposed the omnipotent Sovereign, and exalted self into the throne? made self-will our law, and self-pleasing our end? thus adding sacrilege to rebellion?

God is transcendently gracious and amiable. Have we not turned our backs upon him, by forgetting his mercies? Nay, have we not spurned him from our affections, by being "lovers of pleasure, more than lovers of God?" 2 Tim. iii. 4. Awake, conscience! bear thy impartial testimony; and I am persuaded, the Pharisee in our breasts, like the man unfurnished with the wedding garment, must be struck dumb; must be covered with confusion.

Is our hearts warm with brotherly love? Good manners will put expressions of civility into our mouths; but has a power from on high implanted the royal law of charity in our breasts? The character of a gentleman requires a deportment accessible, obliging, and courteous; has the spirit of Christianity taught us to love, "not in word," or plausible appearance only, "but in deed and in truth?" 1 John iii. 18. Do we love our neighbours, not merely on account of some relation they bear us, or some services they have done us; but because they are creatures of the blessed God, are the objects of his providential care, and capable, at least, of being conformed to his image? Do we love them, because we hope that the Lord Jesus Christ has bought them with his blood; is willing to make them partakers of his Spirit, and members of his mystical body?

Are we sincerely concerned for their present welfare and their eternal happiness? Do we embrace all opportunities of promoting both the one and the other? embrace them with the same alacrity; and improve them with the same zeal, which actuate us in seeking our own felicity? If they exceed us in all that is amiable, and all that is prosperous, do we contemplate their superior excellence with a real complacency, and their more abundant success with a real satisfaction?

Do we dislike to hear, and abhor to spread, defamatory tales; even when our adversaries are the men whom they tend to blacken? When rudely affronted, or causelessly abused, do we pity the offenders, for the wrong done to their own souls, rather than kindle into resentment at the indignity offered to ourselves? When greatly injured, are we slow to anger, and not easily provoked? Are we much more willing to be reconciled than to foment displeasure, and prosecute revenge? In a word, do we "love our enemies; bless them that curse us; do good to them that hate us; and pray for them that despitefully use us and persecute us?" Matt. v. 44. Without this loving and lovely disposition, we abide, says the apostle, in death, 1 John iii. 14, are destitute of spiritual, and have no title to eternal life.*

Let me add—are all our graces, and all our works "clothed with humility?" This should be the dress in which they severally appear, as well as the bond of connexion which unites them all. Do we maintain a very low opinion of our own accomplishments, and "in honour prefer others to ourselves?" Rom. xii. 10; habitually sensible that we are less than the least of the divine mercies, and the very chiefest of sinners?

I might easily have branched out the preceding subjects into a much greater variety of interrogatory articles. But I intend only to present you with a specimen. Your own meditations will enlarge the sketch, and supply what is defective. Only let me beg of you, my dear friend, to try your state by this touchstone; to prove your conduct by this standard. And may the Father of lights give you an understanding to discern the exact purity and sublime perfection of his holy law!

* What manner of love is this? How disinterested! how extensive! how triumphant! Must not all the boasted benevolence of the philosopher and the moralist strike sail to this evangelical charity? Must not both moralist and philosopher acknowledge the necessity of a divine operation, thus to enlarge, exalt, and refine their social affections?

Have you lived in the uninterrupted observance of all these duties; avoiding whatever is forbidden, and obeying whatever is commanded? Your outward behaviour, I know, has been free from notorious violations; but has your inward temper been preserved from all ungodly motions, and from every irregular desire? Is there no enmity in your heart to any of the precepts, nor any backwardness, nor any failure in performing each and every injunction?

When you put these questions to yourself, remember, that if you fail in one point, or in any degree, you are guilty of all. James ii. 10. If your conformity be not persevering as well as perfect, you incur the penalty, and are abandoned to the curse. Gal. iii. 10. You stand charged, before the Judge of the world, with all the guilt of all your sins, both original and actual; and there is not one circumstance, nor one aggravation, of any of your iniquities, overlooked or forgotten—unless, renouncing all your personal performances, you place your whole reliance on a Saviour's atonement, and a Saviour's righteousness. I think you will not dare to put the issue of your everlasting state upon the former footing, which is not only hazardous, but must be inevitably ruinous. You will infinitely rather choose to acknowledge yourself a poor insolvent, and plead the unsearchable riches of your Redeemer's obedience.

To those who believe, the law, though strict, is not terrible; because, be its precepts of holiness ever so extensive, they have been most completely fulfilled by their glorious Surety. Be its penal sanctions ever so rigorous, they have been satisfied to the utmost by their great Mediator. Believers, therefore, may make their boast of their adorable Sponsor; they "may sit under his shadow with great delight," Cant. ii. 3; while the thunderings of Mount Sinai, and all the terrors of the legal dispensation, tend only to increase and quicken the refreshing sense of their safety. Just as the possessor of a plentiful estate, in some peaceful and prosperous country, reposes himself under the shade of his vine, or the shelter of his fig-tree: and hearing of the wars which embroil, or the plagues which depopulate other nations, tastes, with augmented relish, his own felicity.

Let me close with the affectionate and emphatical wish of an inspired epistolary writer—"That the Lord of peace may give," my dear Theron, "peace—always by all means!" 2 Thess. iii. 16. Then I shall think my wishes are accomplishing, and this blessing is at the door, when he sees the purity of the divine law—sees the depravity of his own nature—and the impossibility of being justified without an interest in the great Mediator's righteousness; that righteousness which, as it is the only hope and the constant joy, is therefore the darling theme, of

Your ever faithful

ASPASIO.

P. S. Shall I abridge the preceding letter, and contract the whole into those two great commandments which made the first awakening impressions on my own mind? "Thou shalt love the Lord thy God with all thy heart; thou shalt love thy neighbour as thyself." Amazing! said your Aspasio. Are these the commands of God? as obligatory as the prohibition of adultery, or the observation of the Sabbath? Then has my whole life been a continual act of disobedience. Not a day, no, nor an hour, in which I have performed my duty. This conviction struck me, as the hand-writing upon the wall struck the presumptuous monarch. It pursued me, as Saul pursued the Christians, not only to my own house, but even to distant cities; nor ever gave up the great controversy, till, under the influences of the Spirit, it brought me "weary and heavy laden to Jesus Christ."

LETTER II.

THERON TO ASPASIO.

DEAR ASPASIO.—MORE than three weeks are elapsed since you favoured me with your improving company, during which interval I have frequently recollecting the most material parts of our late discourses. I have carefully considered both the doctrines you advanced and the answers you returned to my several objections. I have often reviewed your valuable letter, have used it as a touchstone to examine my state, and have with great punctuality observed your parting advice. I have sat every evening for a picture of my mind, and have endeavoured to take a true unflattering draught of all its distinguishing qualities. And if the diary is a faithful mirror, if it does not aggravate the deformity of my features, I shall be absolutely out of conceit with myself; I shall ever entertain the meanest opinion of my own, either moral or religious qualifications.

Where is that intense and supreme love of God, which his transcendent perfections challenge, and his ineffable goodness claims? Where that firm and joyful reliance on Christ Jesus in any degree proportioned to his infinite merits and inviolable promises? Where that cordial and tender affection for my fellow-Christians, which is due to the servants of a divine Redeemer; the people whom he ransomed by his agonies, and purchased with his very blood? Where is the incense of holy contemplation and refined desire? where the flame of fervent devotion and ever-active zeal; such as become the living temple of God, in which his most immaculate and glorious Spirit vouchsafes to reside? These fundamental graces, like the grand organs in the animal system, should impart health to the soul, and spread the beauty of holiness through all the conversation. But these, alas! far from beating with a vigorous and uniform pulse, hardly heave with life; only just struggle, now and then, with some faint, intermitted, uneven throes.

How seldom do my actions spring from gratitude to the everlasting Benefactor, or aim at the glory of his superexcellent majesty! In addressing the King immortal, invisible, how languid are my affections, and how wandering is my attention! how great my unbelief, and how little my reverential awe! I receive innumerable mercies; but where are my returns of correspondent thankfulness? I am visited with many gracious chastisements: but without proper resignation, or due improvement. Alas, for my heartless devotions, my lifeless virtues, and the multitude of my refined iniquities! Hid behind the mask of outward decency, and some customary forms of religion, I was altogether unacquainted with my spiritual state. I fancied myself "rich, and increased with goods, and to have need of nothing;" even while I was "wretched, and miserable, and poor, and blind, and naked," Rev. iii. 17.

If I look back, and review the years of youth and manhood, what has been the tenor, what is the aspect of my life? More like a desolate and horrid wilderness, than a cultivated garden, or a fruitful vineyard. In youth, what sordid gratifications of appetite! In manhood, what base compliances with a wicked world! In both, what shoals of evil inclinations have polluted my heart! what swarms of vain imaginations have debased my thoughts! what frothy and unprofitable words have dropt from my lips! By all which, how have I disobeyed, and how dishonoured God! how have I denied, and how crucified the Lord Jesus Christ!

and yet supposed myself, all the while, to be good enough.

It is something unaccountable, that a person of my inquisitive disposition should, through the course of so many years, be such an utter stranger to himself. I wonder at my own preposterous folly! To travel into foreign countries, and visit the most renowned cities of Europe; yet never step over the threshold, nor look within the apartments of my own breast! To carry on a correspondence with my friends, even in the remotest nations, and never enter upon a conference, nor hold any intelligence with my own heart! To inquire after news from the fleet, news from the army, news from the court; yet exercise neither curiosity nor care with regard to the hope of heaven, and the concerns of eternity! What egregious misconduct is this! A most pernicious error in the economy of religious life!

Sometimes I have cast a transient glance on my outward behaviour, but never extended my search to the delinquent, the traitor, the rebel within. And even my outward behaviour has been surveyed with as much erroneous partiality as superficial levity. It has been compared, not with that exact and sublime standard, the scriptures of truth; but, as in the case of the self-deceiving Pharisee, with the unjust, extortionate, adulterous practices of some other people. From whence I most unwarrantably concluded, that being not quite so abandoned as the most profligate creatures, my character must be good, and my condition safe. But, thanks to your last friendly letter, and the searching expedient it recommended, I am now in a different way of thinking.

It is strange to recollect, and indeed it is shameful to confess, the many artifices which I have used to put a cheat upon myself. Sometimes I have fancied that the divine law could never be so strict as to condemn us inexorably, if we continue not in all its precepts. Sometimes I have pleaded the infirmity of our nature, and endeavoured to make the works of darkness appear only as pitiable failings. Sometimes I have taken refuge in the excellency of our church, and plumed myself with the borrowed feathers of a religious profession. At other times I have soothed my conscience to rest, by a punctuality of attendance on places, or a zealous attachment to forms. And all this to seduce, cajole, and betray myself—betray myself, first into a vain conceit of my own endowments, then into a contemptuous disregard of Christ, and at last into eternal destruction. But now I see my guilt, I apprehend my danger, and feel my helpless condition.

Indeed, my Aspasio, I am now convinced that the darkest colours cannot be too dark for the portrait of my spiritual state. I see myself overspread with an habitual depravity, and cannot forbear crying out, with the abashed leper, "Unclean! Unclean! Lev. xiii. 45. The sacred oracles in no wise misrepresent fallen man, when they describe him as altogether become abominable. Job xv. 16. 'They are far from underrating human works, when they denominate them "filthy rags."* Rags they are, if we consider their great imperfections; filthy rags, if we advert to their manifold defilements. And since the nature of God is so irreconcilably adverse to all contamination, since the law of God requires such unspotted perfection, O! "who can stand before this holy Lord God," 1 Sam. vi. 20; in any accomplishments of their own?

When I farther reflect, that I have only a very obscure glimpse of the divine purity, and am a mere novice in the knowledge of my own heart; how am I amazed at the lofty apprehensions which I once formed concerning the dignity of my nature and the integrity of my conduct! All owing to ignorance, the grossest ignorance of myself and the scriptures. How do I shudder to think,

* Isa. lxiv. 6. Does not Theron misapply this text? Can it be intended to discredit the qualifications of the upright? Is it not rather a brand set upon the works of the wicked; whose very sacrifices are an abomination to the Lord? Or, a rebuke given to the specious performances of the hypocrite: who is precise in the form, but destitute of the power of godliness? Or, may it not refer to ritual observances; in contradistinction to moral duties and spiritual accomplishments?

The disparaging character must not, I think, be confined to ritual observances; because it is expressly said, all our righteousnesses, including every kind of religious duty; Neither can it be appropriated to the formal hypocrite, much less to the notoriously wicked; because, those very persons, who are the subject of this assertion, declare, in the context, "Lord, we are thy people, thou art our Father, we shall be saved." So that it seems intended to stain the pride of all human glory.

Besides, the prophet speaks of himself: We are all as an unclean thing; which, however strange or unreasonable it may seem, is the very same charge to which he pleads guilty in another place; "Woe is me! I am undone! for I am a man of unclean lips!" Not that he was defiled with any gross pollutions; nay, he was a saint of the most distinguished lustre, but his eyes had seen the King, the Lord of hosts. He was under the clear manifestations of a God, glorious in holiness, inflexible in justice, and infinite in all perfections. Amidst these manifestations, the impurity of his heart and nature were not only apparent, but glaring; overwhelmed him with abashment, and, till Christ was applied in a type, (Isa. vi. 7.) filled him with terror.

In such circumstances, and under such views, all our moral virtues and evangelical graces, all our exercises of devotion, and acts of charity, will appear both defective and polluted: by no means proportioned to the demands of the law, nor sufficient for our recommendation to the Supreme Lawgiver; no more than a few tattered rags can claim the character or perform the services of a complete suit; no more than a few filthy rags are fit to dress the bride for her nuptials, or the courtier for a birthnight.

But there is a righteousness—blessed be divine grace!—spotlessly pure and consummately excellent; a righteousness which answers all that the Creator requires, and supplies all that the creature needs. To prove this momentous point, and to display this unspeakable gift, is the design of the following sheets.

that, in expecting justification from the law. I was resting the welfare of my immortal soul, not on the foundation of a rock, but on the point of a dagger. I was going to the decisive tribunal, flushed with the falsest hopes, and charged with a set of glittering sins; going, like poor deluded Uriah, 2 Sam. xi. 14, 15, not with any valid credentials, but with "the ministration of death," 2 Cor. iii. 9, in my hand.

Though I cannot but acknowledge the arrogance of these pretensions, yet loath, very loath, is my pride to renounce the pleasing absurdity. Self-love has searched, and searched again, for something excellent. It would fain make a better appearance, and can hardly brook the humiliation of imploring all sub forma pauperis.* With what reluctance is a sinner brought to confess himself sinful in every duty, sinful in every capacity? Strange perverseness! But the charge is undeniable. However unwilling, I must plead guilty. "Thou art weighed in the balances, and found wanting," Dan. v. 27, is evidently written on all I am, all I have, all I do. And if I am thus defective, even in my own estimation; if I am utterly condemned at the bar of my own conscience, "what then shall I do, when God riseth up? and when he visiteth, what shall I answer him? Job xxxi. 14.

I now see the necessity of an imputed righteousness. Without some such object for my trust, I am undone. I long, therefore, to hear your arguments in its behalf. And I must declare to you, if it can be satisfactorily proved from the scriptures, it is the most comfortable doctrine in the world, and worthy of all acceptance.

A letter upon this subject would be a singular favour, and, I hope, an equal blessing, to your obliged and affectionate

THERON.

LETTER III.

ASPASIO TO THERON.

DEAR THERON,—THOUGH all your letters give me pleasure, none was ever so highly pleasing as your last. I look upon it with the same secret joy, as when a compassionate physician observes some very favourable symptoms in the crisis of a beloved patient's distemper.

What you ask, I shall, without any farther preface, attempt to execute. If my attempt proves satisfactory to your judgment, I am sure it will be the most likely means of healing your conscience, and calming your fears. When we perceive the odious depravity of our nature; when we discern the horrible iniquity of our lives, and are sensible of that tremendous wrath and everlasting vengeance which are due to such guilty creatures; then nothing can be found that will speak effectual peace, nothing that will administer solid comfort, but only the vicarious sufferings and the imputed righteousness of Jesus Christ.

To this purpose speaks one of the wisest and best of spiritual guides; "Has sin abounded?" as undoubtedly it has, in our heart and our life; "grace has much more abounded," in the obedience and the merits of our Redeemer. Nay, "has sin reigned?" exerted its malignant power in the most extensive and most destructive manner, rendering us subject unto death, both temporal and eternal? "Even so has grace reigned;" exerted its benign efficacy, and in a manner yet more triumphant; not only rescuing us from guilt and ruin, but restoring us to everlasting life and glory; and all this through the righteousness, the complete meritorious righteousness, brought in "by Jesus Christ our Lord." Rom. v. 21.

You inquire after the proofs of this imputed righteousness. From a multitude I shall select a few; sufficient, I hope, to make it appear, that this is the declared doctrine of our church, and the avowed belief of her most eminent divines; that it is copiously revealed through the whole Scriptures, revealed in many express passages, and deducible from a variety of instructive similitudes.

Hear the language of our Common Prayer, in a very affecting and solemn address to the Almighty! "We do not presume to come to this thy table, O merciful Lord, trusting in our own righteousness." If we may not, if we dare not, rely on our own righteousness when we approach the eucharistic table, much less may we depend upon it when we are summoned to the decisive tribunal. Should you ask, on what we are to depend? The exhortation to the communion furnishes an answer; "On the meritorious death and passion of Christ, whereby alone we obtain remission of sins, and are made partakers of the kingdom of heaven."

The Collect appointed for the festival of circumcision, has this remarkable introduction; "Almighty God, whose blessed Son was obedient to the law for man." In what sense, or with what propriety, can this be affirmed, unless Christ's perfect obedience be referable to us, and accepted instead of ours? On any other interpretation, I should think he was obedient, not for man, but for himself.

Should the artful critic give some other turn to these passages, it will avail him but little; because the church, her own best expositor, has explained the meaning of such phrases, and put the matter beyond all doubt. In her eleventh article she says, "We are accounted righteous before God, only for the merits of our Lord and Saviour Jesus Christ." The doctrine relating to pardon of sin had been stated in a preceding article. This displays the method whereby sinners may appear righteous in the eye of God and in the court of heaven, so as to recover the divine favour and obtain a title to eternal bliss. This is done, not by any native righteousness, not by any acquired righteousness, but by an imputed righteousness. Were we justified by either of the former methods, it would not have been said, we are accounted, but we are righteous. They are so far from constituting our reconciling and justifying righteousness, that they have no share in it, contribute nothing towards it, are totally excluded from it. We are accounted righteous, and accepted as such, only (mark the expression) only through the meritorious obedience, and propitiating blood of our great Mediator.

The Homilies are, if it be possible, still more explicit and more cogent. In the Homily concerning the salvation of mankind, we read the following words; "The apostle toucheth three things, which must go together in our justification: On God's part, his great mercy and grace: On Christ's part, the satisfaction of God's justice, or the price of our redemption, by the offering of his body, and the shedding of his blood, with fulfilling of the law perfectly: On our part, true and lively faith in the merits of Jesus Christ, which yet is not ours, but by God's working in us." You see, according to the judgment of our venerable reformers, not only the offering of Christ's body, and shedding of Christ's blood, but also his perfect fulfilling of the law, are the adequate price of our redemption. All these act conjointly; they sweetly harmonize in the great and glorious work. To suppose their disunion, is a doctrinal mistake, somewhat like that practical error of the Papists, in severing the sacramental wine from the sacramental bread; administering to the laity the symbols of the slaughtered body, but withholding the symbols of the streaming blood.

There are other clauses in the same Homily, which set the seal of the church to our sentiments. I shall content myself with transcribing one from the conclusion: "Christ," says that form of sound words, "is the righteousness of all them that do truly believe. He, for them, paid their ransom by his death. He, for them, fulfilled the law in his life. So that now, in him, and by him, every true Christian may be called a fulfiller of the law; forasmuch as that which their infirmity lacked, Christ's righteousness hath supplied." This authority is as clear, as the doctrine authorized is comfortable. May the former sway our judgment! may the latter cheer our hearts!

The Homily on Christ's nativity informs the reader, that the design of our Lord's incarnation was—"to give light unto the world, and call sinners to repentance; to fulfil the law for us, and become the propitiation for our sins; to cast out the prince of this world, and destroy the works of the devil." We have all broke the law; we are all unable to keep the law; therefore the blessed Jesus fulfilled the law; fulfilled it in each and every of its demands; fulfilled it in the highest degree of perfection; and what is of all considerations most delightful, fulfilled it for us. His obedience took the place of what we were obliged to perform under the covenant of works; and is not only the meritorious, but also the constituent cause of our justification.

So that, if there be any worthiness in our Lord's most holy nature, any merit in his exercise of the sublimest virtues, completed by his submission to the most ignominious sufferings and tormenting death, then, according to this standard-system of orthodox divinity, these are the ground, these are the substance of a sinner's justification. And, according to the dictates of the most unbiassed reason, they are the best, the surest ground that can either be wished or imagined.

Does it not from the preceding quotations appear, that the doctrine of justification, through the imputed righteousness of our Redeemer, is far from being disclaimed by the established church? I am sorry, but constrained to own, that we rarely find any considerable strictures of this great evangelical peculiarity in our modern theological discourses. Yet there have been preachers of the highest repute for learning, for judgment, and for piety, who professedly maintained this grand truth of the gospel.

The devout Bishop Beveridge, in his "Private Thoughts," has left upon record the following very remarkable acknowledgment, which, if it suited his state of eminent holiness, cannot be too humbling, my dear Theon, for your lips and for mine. "I do not remember, neither do I believe, that I ever prayed, in all my lifetime, with that reverence, or heard with that attention, or received the sacrament with that faith, or did any work with that pure heart and single eye, as I ought to have done. Inasmuch, that I look upon all my righteousness but as filthy rags; and it is in the robes only of the righteousness of the Son of God, that I dare appear before the Majesty of heaven."

The fervent and affectionate Bishop Hopkins* speaks in perfect consonance with his brother of St. Asaph. "The law was given us, not that we should seek justification by the observance of it, but finding it impossible to be justified by fulfilling it, we should thereby be driven to Christ's righteousness, who hath both fulfilled it in himself, and satisfied for our transgressing of it; and therefore saith the apostle, "The law was a schoolmaster to bring us to Christ, that we may be justified by faith." To this end it was promulgated, that seeing the strictness of its precepts, the rigour of its threatenings, and withal being convinced of our impotence to fulfil its commands, we might be urged, by its terrors, to fly to Christ, and find that righteousness in him which may answer all the demands of the law."

Bishop Reynolds,† styled by his contemporaries, and not without reason, "a walking library," bears his testimony in the following words: "Christ as our surety paid our debt, underwent the curse due to our sins, and bare them all in his own body on the tree; became subject to the law for us, and representatively in our stead fulfilled all the righteousness the law required, active and passive. For sin being once committed, there must be a double act of justification; the suffering of the curse, and the fulfilling of righteousness anew. The one, a satisfaction for the injury we have done to God as our Judge; the other, the performance of a service which we owe unto him as our Maker."

To this illustrious triumvirate, let me join Bishop Davenant, who for his great abilities, and unquestionable integrity, was appointed one of our religious plenipotentiaries at the renowned Synod of Dort. In his very valuable exposition of the epistle to the Colossians, he writes to this effect: "Ye are complete in Christ. Ye are furnished, in that all-sufficient Redeemer, with whatever is requisite to everlasting salvation. With wisdom; since it is the consummation of this noble endowment, to know Christ, and him crucified. With righteousness; because he has perfectly satisfied the law,‡ and thoroughly expiated

* See his Sermon on John vii. 19.

† See his treatise, entitled, the Life of Christ, which, as well as all his other works, abound with striking sentiments, have much elegance of diction, a copious variety of learning, and a lively animating spirit of evangelical piety.

‡ In this respect principally (says our author, enlarging upon the text) are believers complete; because, though destitute of any righteousness that may properly be called their own, Christ has graciously enriched them with his. Vid. DAVENANT in epist. ad Coloss. cap. ii. com. 10.

Let me beg leave to intimate, that this exposition of the epistle to the Colossians, for perspicuity of style, and accuracy of method, for judgment in discerning, and fidelity in representing the apostle's meaning, for strength of argument in refuting errors, and felicity of invention in deducing practical doctrines, tending both to the establishment of faith, and the cultivation of holiness—is, I think, inferior to no our guilt. With sanctification; because his Spirit, dwelling in our hearts, mortifies our corrupt affections, and renews the soul after the image of its Creator."

Let me bring up the rear with a testimony, which for clearness, solidity, and a full representation of the evangelical doctrine, might very justly have claimed a place in the van. It is taken from an author, whom the general consent of our nation has distinguished with the title of "judicious." The judicious Hooker, in a treatise on justification, says—"It is a childish cavil our adversaries so greatly please themselves with, exclaiming, that we tread all Christian virtues under our feet, because we teach, that faith alone justifieth. Whereas, by this speech, we never meant to exclude either hope or charity from being always joined as inseparable mates with faith in the man that is justified; or works from being added, as necessary duties, required of every justified man; but to show, that faith is the only hand which putteth on Christ to justification; and Christ the only garment which, being so put on, covereth the shame of our defiled nature, hideth the imperfection of our works, and preserveth us blameless in the sight of God: before whom, otherwise, the weakness of our faith were cause sufficient to make us culpable, yea, to shut us out of the kingdom of heaven, where nothing that is not absolute can enter."

You will allow the sagacious Bishop Sanderson* to sum up the evidence; or rather, to make an important remark on the whole of the controversy. That great light of the church, both in casuistical and practical divinity, observes—"The tidings of a Redeemer must be blessed and welcome news, to those that are sensible of their own poverty, and take it of grace." Our eagle-eyed divine penetrates into the true cause of the prevailing averseness to this evangelical doctrine. It is founded on the state of the heart, more than upon any force of argument. People are but little, if at all, sensible of their spiritual and moral indigence; of the defects which depreciate, and the defilements which sully, whatever they have, and whatever they do. Nay, strongly tinctured with pride, they would be themselves the Alpha, and suffer the blessed Jesus to be no more than the Omega, in procuring their eternal salvation. Therefore they can hardly be reconciled to the humbling character of an eleemosynary; one who lives wholly upon the alms of the gospel, and is dependent upon grace for his all.

Whereas, was this grand obstacle once removed; were men convinced of sin, of exceeding sinfulness in their worst estate, and of remaining sinfulness in their best; they would soon be "convinced of righteousness," John xvi. 8, of the absolute necessity and inestimable worth of a Redeemer's righteousness. They would no longer dispute against it, but cordially receive it; entirely rely on it; and adore the goodness, the transcendent and unutterable goodness of God, in providing it.

I think, in one of our conferences, I undertook to produce my vouchers from the ancient fathers. Let me now subjoin two or three attestations of this kind. From one of which you will perceive, that those early writers had a considerable degree of clearness upon the point. From the other you will see, that far from rejecting the doctrine, they embrace it with delight and rapture.—And if you will admit of the last, you cannot be startled at any thing which I shall advance upon the subject. Let me only premise, in general, that if those authors are not so copious and explicit with regard to the imputation of active righteousness, they abound in passages which evince the substitution of Christ in our stead: passages which disclaim all dependence on any duties of our own, and fix the hopes of a believer entirely upon the merits of his Saviour. When this is the case, I am very little solicitous about any particular forms of expression; and far from being angry, even though the words which I think most significant are not retained.

Clemens—an intimate acquaintance of St. Paul's, and whose "name was in the book of life," Phil iv. 3, in his truly excellent epistle to the Corinthians, assures that people,* we are not, in any respect, or in any degree, justified by ourselves, but wholly by Jesus Christ; "not by our own wisdom or prudence," which could never find out the way; "not by the piety of our hearts, or works of righteousness performed in our lives," which could never be sufficient for the purpose; "but by faith;" the one invariable method, "by which the Almighty Sovereign has justified all" his people, "ever since the world began."

Justin, who was first a Gentile philosopher, then an eminent Christian, and at last a martyr for the truth, speaks more fully to the point; †—"What else could cover our sius, but the righteousness of Jesus Christ? By what possible means could we, unrighteous and unholy creatures, be justified, but only by the interposition of the Son of God in our behalf?"—Having in this clause made a profession of his faith, the good man, on the contemplation of such a privilege, breaks out into a kind of holy transport! "O sweet and delightful exchange! a dispensation unsearchably wise and gracious! benefits quite unexpected, and rich beyond all our hopes! that the sin of many should be hid by one righteous person, and that the righteousness of one should justify many transgressors."

But that every reader may distinguish the text from the paraphrase, the first is printed within inverted commas.

The following words are remarkably strong, and the sentiments peculiarly bold. But they come from the pen of the finest writer in ecclesiastical antiquity. They have the great name and venerable character of St Chrysostom for their recommendatory preface.* "Fear not, says he, on account of any of thy past transgressions of the law, when once thou hast fled by faith to Jesus Christ. The most enormous and the most destructive violation of the law is, to be withheld, by the consciousness of any guilt whatever, from believing on Christ. When thou actest faith on him, thou hast fulfilled, I might say more than fulfilled the law: For thou hast received a better righteousness than it could ever require; thou art possessed of a better obedience than any creature could possibly pay."

Two or three witnesses of distinguished ability, and undoubted veracity, are a sufficient confirmation of any cause. For this reason, and to avoid a tiresome prolixity, I have set aside a multitude of voices, which, from the writings of our own and foreign divines, are ready to pour their united evidence; and lest the business of quotation, though sparingly managed, should seem dry and tedious, I will relieve your weariness, and enliven the collection, by an extract from the prince of English poetry. Michael, the prophetic archangel, mentioning the destructive consequences of that glorious Person who undertook to be the repairer of this deadly breach, adds, θανάτου τῆς ανομίας ἡμῶν καὶ αἰετίαις, ἢ ἐν τῷ ὄνομα Θεοῦ; Ὁ ΤΙΣ, ΓΑΤΚΡΙΑΣ ΚΑΤΑΛΑΛΗΣ, ὡς τῆς ἀνέξιχναστῆ ἠμιοργίας ὡς τῶν ἀπορδοκιστῶν δι' ἐνοῦ πολλῶν; ἀνομίας δικαιοσύνης. Erasm. ad Dionen. Though Du Pin questions the authority of this epistle, he allows it to have been written by an ancient hand. Dr. Cave, as capable a judge, thinks there is no reason to doubt but it is the genuine work of Justin.

* Μη τινὺν φοβῆσθαι, ὡς τὸν νόμον παραβαίνων, ἐπεὶ θανάτου πιστεῖ προσελθόντι· τότε γὰρ αὐτὸν παραβαίνειν ὅτι δι' αὐτοῦ τῷ Χριστῷ μὴ πιστεύουσιν· ὡς ἀνπιστοσύνης αὐτῶν, κακείνων ἐπληρωσῆς καὶ πολλῶν πλὴν ἢ ἐκείνου· πολλῶν γὰρ μετίζονα δικαιοσύνην ἰλαῶσι. Homil. xvii. in x. ad Rom.

Which he, who comes thy Saviour, shall secure, Not by destroying Satan, but his works, In thee and in thy seed. Nor can this be, But by fulfilling (that which thou didst want) Obedience to the law of God, imposed On penalty of death; and suffering death. The penalty to thy transgression due; And due to theirs, which out of thine will grow, So only can high justice rest appead.

Milton, book 12, l. 393.

Here then is the express determination of our Homilies, supported by the authority of our Articles, established by the concurrence of our Liturgy, still farther ratified by the unanimous attestation of several celebrated divines, whose lives were the brightest ornament to our church, and whose writings are the most unexceptionable interpretation of her meaning. As a capital to crown and complete this grand column, supervenes the declaration of the ancient fathers, those who flourished, and with the highest renown, in the first and purest ages of Christianity. So that, if great authorities carry any weight, if illustrious names challenge any regard, this tenet comes attended and dignified with very considerable credentials.

Yet I will venture to affirm, that all these, considerable as they appear, are the least of those testimonials which recommend the doctrine to my Theron's acceptance, and which have gained it admittance into the heart of,

His most affectionate

ASPASIO.

LETTER IV.

ASPASIO TO THERON.

DEAR THERON,—THE family in which I have the satisfaction to reside, though remarkable for their genteel figure and ample fortune, are still more amiably distinguished by their benevolence, hospitality, and charity. As they live at a distance from the market town, the lady has converted one apartment of her house into a little dispensatory, and stocked it with some of the most common, the most needed, and most salutary medicines, which, in cases of ordinary indisposition, she distributes to her indigent neighbours with singular compassion, and with no small success. This fine morning, Emilia has ordered some skilful hands into the fields, to cull their healing simples, and lay up a magazine of health for the afflicted poor. Camillus is withdrawn to receive his rents, and settle accounts with his tenants.

Suppose we act in concert with these valuable persons. Suppose we range the delightful fields of scripture, and form a collection, not of saliferous herbs, but of inestimable texts ; such as may be of sovereign efficacy to assuage the anguish of a guilty conscience, and impart saving health to the distempered soul. Suppose we open the mines of divine inspiration, and enrich ourselves, not with the gold of Ophir, but with the unsearchable treasures of Christ ; or with that perfect righteousness of our Redeemer, which is incomparably more precious than the revenues of a county, or the produce of Peru.

In pleading for imputed righteousness, we have already urged the authority of our established church, and the suffrage of her most eminent divines. The opinion of excellent writers, which has been the result of much learning, great attention, and earnest prayer, is no contemptible evidence. Yet we must always reserve the casting voice for those infallible umpires the prophets and apostles. "If we receive," with a differential regard, "the witness of men ; the witness of God is greater, 1 John v. 9, and challenges the most implicit submission ; which remark naturally leads me to the intended subject of this epistle, or rather calls upon me to fulfil my late engagement, and show that the above-mentioned doctrine is copiously revealed through the whole process of the Scriptures.

Let me detach a very significant portion from the epistle to the Romans ; which, though little inferior to a decisive proof, is produced only as an introduction to others ; "Now the righteousness of God without the law, is manifested, being witnessed by the law and the prophets ; even the righteousness of God, which is by faith of Jesus Christ unto all, and upon all them that believe," Rom. iii. 21, 22. The righteousness of God signifies that righteousness which the incarnate God wrought out in his own all-glorious person.* It is styled the righteousness of God by way of superlative pre-eminence, in opposition to any righteousness of our own, and in contradistinction to the righteousness of all creatures whatever. This righteousness is without the law. Its efficacy has no dependence on, its merit receives no addition from any conformity of our practice to the

* This explication, or something to the same purpose has occurred already. But it is hoped, that the candid reader will not condemn the repetition, as a disagreeable and jejune tautology.—Because it is so consonant to the practice of our great apostle, who repeats the term, re-inculcates the doctrine, and hardly knows how to desist from the favourite topic, like one who was quite enamoured with the subject, who found music in the words, and whose happiness was bound up in the blessing. Because it is conformable to another and a greater example. The Lord Jehovah himself, within the compass of one chapter, once and again, yea, a third and a fourth time, styles this wonderful obedience, my righteousness. As though the God of infinite perfection glorified in it, thought himself most eminently magnified by it, and was jealous to have all the honour resulting from it. See Isaiah ii.

divine law ; being complete, absolutely complete in itself, and altogether sufficient to procure the reconciliation and acceptance of sinners. This righteousness is "witnessed by the law and the prophets ;" receives an uniform attestation from the various writings of the Old Testament. To investigate which attestation, to examine its pertinency, and weigh its sufficiency, is our present pleasing business.

We may begin with that gracious declaration made to the first transgressors ; "The seed of the woman shall bruise the serpent's head," Gen. iii. 15, shall destroy the works of the devil, and retrieve whatever was lost by his malicious artifices.* How could this be effected, but by restoring that righteousness which for a while our first parents possessed : which they ought always to have held fast ; but from which they so soon and so unhappily swerved. Take the position in the right sense, and Christianity is, if not entirely, yet very nearly as old as the creation. It was comprehended in this blessed promise, as the stamina of the largest plants are contained in the substance of their respective seeds : every subsequent revelation being no more than a gradual evolution of this grand evangelical principle ; acting like the vegetative powers of nature, which in rearing an oak, with all its spread of branches, only expand the tunicles, and fill up the vessels of the acorn.

This doctrine seems to have been typically taught by the remarkable manner of clothing our first parents. All they could do for their own recovery was like the patched and beggarly mantle of fig-leaves : This they relinquish, and God himself furnishes them with apparel, Gen. iii. 21. Animals are slain, not for food but sacrifice ; and the naked criminals are arrayed with the skins of those slaughtered beasts. The victims figured the expiation of Christ's death, the clothing typified the imputation of his righteousness. In perfect conformity, perhaps with a reference to the passage thus interpreted, the apostle just now expressed himself : "Even the righteousness of God, which is not only made over to all believers, as a rich portion, but put upon all as a beautiful garment," Rom. iii. 22, † whereby alone their moral deformity can be covered, and their everlasting confusion prevented. Milton, it is certain, speaking of this memorable transaction, considers it in the same spiritual sense :—

* In some such sense, I think, our first parents must understand the promise. Otherwise it could yield them no effectual relief, under the disressing sense of their own misery, and the dismal apprehension of their posterity's ruin.

† ΕΙΣ ΠΑΝΤΑΣ ΕΗΙ ΠΑΥΤ Σ ΤΗΣ ΠΙΣΤΕΥΟΥΣΑΣ.

Not he their outward only with the skins
Of beasts, but inward nakedness, (much more Opprobrious) with his robe of righteousness
Arraying, covered from his Father's sight.

"In thy seed," says the great Jehovah to his servant Abraham, "shall all the nations of the earth be blessed," Gen. xxii. 18. That the seed here mentioned is Christ, the apostle places beyond all doubt.* Both scripture and reason declare that true blessedness must necessarily include the pardon of sins and the favour of God, the sanctification of our souls, and the inheritance of life eternal. None of which are to be acquired by any human performances, but all are to be sought, and all may be found in the root and offspring of Abraham, Jesus Christ; who is therefore most pertinently styled, "The desire of all nations," Hag. ii. 7, the actual desire of every enlightened nation, and the implicit desire of all nations whatever; because all, without any exception, covet what is to be derived only from Jesus Christ the righteous, real happiness.

The patriarchal age, and the legal economy, bore their testimony to this truth, by typical persons, emblematical miracles, and figurative usages. Indeed, the whole ceremonial service was a grand series of types, representing Christ and his everlasting righteousness. In all which this was the unanimous though silent language; "Behold the Lamb of God, that taketh away the sin of the world." These I shall not stay to discuss, because proofs of a more explicit and positive nature wait for our consideration; only I would just make a transient observation, relating to one very remarkable constitution in the Jewish ritual.—The high-priest had on the front of his mitre a plate of pure gold, engraven with that venerable motto, "Holiness to the Lord," Exod. xxviii. 36, 37, which was always to be on his forehead when he performed the solemn ministrations of the sanctuary; and for this important reason, that the people "might be accepted before the Lord." Exod. xxviii. 38. Did not this most clearly foreshow the immaculate holiness of our great High Priest? and with equal clearness imply, that his holiness should procure acceptance for all his followers.

In the book of Job we have several hints of this truth, and one passage very express to our purpose. Elihu describes an unconverted person under the chastising hand of Providence, "whose life," through the extremity of his disease, "drew near to the grave; and his soul," through the multitude of his iniquities, was ready to become a prey "to the destroyers." In this deplorable condition, "if there be present with him the Messenger* of the covenant of peace, that great Interpreter* of the divine councils," who for his superexcellent wisdom is justly deemed "one among a thousand," or rather "the chiefest among ten thousand;" if he, by his enlightening Spirit, vouchsafe to show unto the afflicted man his own perfect righteousness, that most meritorious uprightness on which alone a sinner may depend, both for temporal and eternal salvation; then the poor distressed creature, attentive to this instruction, and applying this righteousness, is made partaker of pardon. God, the sovereign Lord of life and death, is gracious unto him, and saith, in the greatness of his strength, as well as in the multitude of his mercies, "deliver him from going down into the pit" of corruption, as a pledge of his deliverance from the pit of perdition; for "I have found a ransom" sufficient to satisfy my justice: I have received an atonement in behalf of this once obnoxious, now reconciled transgressor.

But why do I select one particular paragraph? It seems to be the main design of the whole book to overthrow all pretensions of any justifying righteousness in man, that the wretched sinner, nay, that the greatest saint, stripped of every personal plea, may rely only on the merits of a Redeemer. This is the final issue of all those warm debates which pass between the afflicted hero and his censorious friends. This is the grand result of Elihu's calm reasoning, and of God Almighty's awful interrogatories. The apparent centre this, (see Job xlii. 6,) in which all the lines terminate; justly therefore to be considered as the principal scope of the whole work.

I must not omit an excellent observation, which I find in some critical and explanatory notes† on the last words of David. The judicious author, proving that this song relates to Christ; that it displays the dignity of our Redeemer, under the character of the "the King," and "the Just One," adds, as an explication of the last amiable and glorious title—"Our Lord Jesus Christ is so called, not so much for having fulfilled all righteousness in his own person, and performed

* See Job xxxiii. 22, &c.—Christ is called מַלְאָךְ the angel of the divine presence, Isa. lxiii. 9. The messenger of the covenant, Mal. iii. 1. He is also, in the most unlimited sense of the phrase, מְלִיץ the interpreter of the divine councils; he to whom the Father hath given the tongue of the learned, and by whom he makes known the otherwise unsearchable mysteries of the gospel.—Should any doubt remain concerning the propriety of applying this passage to our Lord Jesus Christ, the reader, I hope, will give himself the pleasure of perusing the polite Witsius, Econ. lib. 4. chap. iii. xxxi. and Dr. Grey's valuable notes upon the place, in his Liber Jobi.

† By Dr. Grey. See 2 Sam. xxiii. 1, &c.

* See St. Paul's comment upon this invaluable promise, Gal. iii. 3, &c. This commentator, we all allow, was guided by the Spirit, and knew the mind of God. According to his exposition of the text, it is pregnant with the doctrine of justification by faith, and contains an abridgment of the gospel.

an unsmiling obedience to the will of God, as because, by his righteousness imputed to us, we also, upon the terms* of the gospel, are justified, or accounted righteous before God."

I think we may evidently discern the same vein of evangelical doctrine running through many of the psalms. "He shall convert my soul,"† Psal xxiii. 3, turn me not only from sin and ignorance, but from every false confidence, and every deceitful refuge. "He shall bring me forth in paths of righteousness," in those paths of imputed righteousness which are always adorned with the trees of holiness; are always watered with the fountains of consolation: and always terminate in everlasting rest. Some, perhaps, may ask, Why I give this sense to the passage? Why may it not signify the paths of duty; and the way of our own obedience? Because such effects are here mentioned as never have resulted, and never can result from any duties of our own. These are not "green pastures," but a parched and blasted heath. These are not "still waters," but a troubled and disorderly‡ stream. Neither can these speak peace or administer comfort when we pass through the valley and shadow of death. To yield these blessings is the exalted office of Christ, and the sole prerogative of his obedience.

Admitting that this obedience is of sovereign advantage during the years of life, and in the hour of death, it may still occur to the serious and inquisitive mind what will be our safeguard after the great change? When the soul departs, and our place on earth knows us no more; when the body revives, and we shall all stand before the judgment-seat, what will then avail us? The same righteousness of our divine Lord. This, if I mistake not, is displayed in the very next psalm, which begins with a solicitous inquiry; subjoins a satisfactory answer, and closes with a most pertinent but rapturous apostrophe. This is the inquiry, "Who shall ascend into the hill of the Lord! or who shall rise up in his holy place?" This is the answer: "Even he that hath clean hands and a pure heart." He shall receive the blessing* of plenary remission "from the Lord, and righteousness also from the God of his salvation;" even that perfect righteousness, which is not acquired by man, but bestowed by Jehovah; which is not performed by the saint, but received by the sinner; which is the only solid basis, to support our hopes of happiness; the only valid plea for an admission into the mansions of joy. Then follows the apostrophe: The prophet foresees the ascension of Christ and his saints into the kingdom of heaven. He sees his Lord marching at the head of the Redeemed world, and conducting them into regions of honour and joy. Suitably to such a view, and in a most beautiful strain of poetry, he addresses himself to the heavenly portals: "Lift up your heads, O ye gates, and be ye lift up, ye everlasting doors; and the King of glory," with all the heirs of his grace and righteousness, shall make their triumphant entry; "shall enter in," and go out no more.

* That is, freely; or, as the prophet speaks, "without money and without price." For nothing is requisite in order to a participation of Christ and his benefits, but a conviction of our extreme need, and an unfeigned desire to receive them: receive them as gifts of pure grace, vouchsafed to the most undeserving creatures. This point, which is so intimately connected with our comfort and hope, the reader may see more fully stated in Dialogue XV.

† I am sensible the word יְשׁוּבָה may signify to refresh or restore; may answer to the Greek phrase ἀναψύξις, and denote the comforts of the Holy Ghost. This verb may also bear the same signification with the participle ἐπιστρέψας, in our Lord's exhortation to Peter, when thou art converted. Not describing the first grand revolution in the heart, by which a new determination is given to the judgment, and a new bias to the affections: but expressing those subsequent operations of the Divine Spirit, by which we are recovered from our various relapses, and healed of our daily infirmities. And I question whether there is any instance in which we more frequently need these restoring aids, than in the case of adhering to our Redeemer's righteousness. No prone are we to forget our resting place! so liable to fall from our steadfastness in Christ.

‡ Blasted, disorderly.—Let not these words grate on the ear, or, if they grate on the ear, let them humble the heart. What were Job's duties? Zealous and exemplary; practised from his very youth, and neither equalled nor excelled by any person on earth. Yet these, in point of justification, were not a whit better than Aspasio represents. Let us hear the last words of this matchless saint, "I abhor myself, and repent in dust and ashes." From this confession we learn, that, with all his furniture of personal obedience, he had just enough to be ashamed, confounded, and lone.

Having shown the powerful and extensive influence of our Redeemer's righteousness—its efficacy in this world to justify, in the other world to glorify—well may the sweet singer of Israel profess his supreme value for it, and entire dependence on it. "I will go forth in the strength of the Lord God, and will make mention of thy righteousness only."† As though he had said, I will have recourse to no other righteousness for the consolation of my soul. I will plead no other righteousness for the recommendation of my person. I will fly to no other righteousness for my final acceptance, and endless felicity. This is that "raiment of needlework and clothing of wrought gold," Psalm xlv. 13, in which the King's daughter is introduced to Him "who sitteth in the heavens over all." This is that "garment for glory and for beauty," which clothed our great High Priest, and descending to his very

* Psal. xxiv. 4. "Who hath clean hands and a pure heart?" he only whose heart is sprinkled from an evil conscience, by the precious blood of Christ; and who lives by faith in the Son of God. Heb. x. 22. Gal. ii. 20.

† Psalm lxxi. 16. There is, in the Hebrew original and in the new translation, a very emphatical repetition: which adds weight to the sentiment, and demands a peculiar attention from the reader: "Thy righteousness, even thine only."

feet, Rev. i. 13, clothes and adorns the lowest members of his mystical body.

Recollecting all the foregoing particulars, justly, and on the most rational ground, does our royal author declare, "Blessed are the people that know the joyful sound: they shall walk, O Lord, in the light of thy countenance. In thy name shall they rejoice all the day; and in thy righteousness shall they be exalted." Psalm lxxxix. 15, 16. They are truly blessed, they alone are happy, who "know the joyful sound" of the gospel; not only receive it with their ears, but admit it into their very hearts, so as to partake of the sacred peace and spiritual liberty which it proclaims. "They shall walk in the light of thy countenance;" they shall enjoy such communications of thy grace, and such manifestations of thy love, as will constitute the serenity and sunshine of their souls. In thy name, O Lord Jesus Christ, in thy glorious person, and thy infinite merit, "shall they rejoice:" and not occasionally, but habitually; not barely at some distinguished intervals, but "all the day." Their joy shall be as lasting as it is substantial. "And in thy righteousness shall they be exalted," set above the tantalizing power of temporal things; placed beyond the slavish fear of the last enemy; and raised, when time shall be no more, to a state of celestial glory and consummate bliss.

How thoroughly evangelical is this seraphic writer! He has joy, he has blessedness, and he looks for everlasting exaltation; yet not from his faith, his repentance, and his own sincere obedience. According to this, which is the modern scheme, faith, instead of receiving, would supplant the Lord Jesus; repentance, instead of being the gift of Christ, would become his rival; and sincere obedience, which is for the praise and glory of God, would eclipse and impoverish his grace. But David adopts no such sentiments; David maintains no such doctrine. This is the invariable language of his heart: "All my springs of hope, of trust, and consolation, O thou adored Emanuel! are in thee." Psalm lxxxvii. 7.

This sense is the less precarious, I had almost said the more certain, as it exactly corresponds with the analogy of faith, and coincides with the express declarations of other scriptures. Isaiah is styled the evangelist of the Jewish church; because more frequently than any of the prophets he celebrates, and more copiously explains, this and other peculiarities of the gospel. In the very first chapter, he preaches these glad tidings: "Zion shall be redeemed with judgment, and her converts with righteousness." Zion, the gospel church, composed of fallen creatures, sometime disobedient to their God, and enslaved to Satan, shall be redeemed; redeemed, "not with corruptible things, as silver and gold," but by severe judgments executed on their glorious Head, and gracious Representative; and not by these only, but by righteousness also, by the perfect and most meritorious righteousness of the same divinely-excellent Person.

Our sacred author bears his testimony with warmer zeal and brighter evidence as he proceeds in his incomparable discourses. "Surely shall one say," (or, as it may be rendered, only) "in the Lord have I righteousness and strength." Isaiah xlv. 24. Please to observe, Theron, it is not said, in my own works, in my own repentance, no, nor in my own faith, "but in the Lord Jesus have I righteousness;" righteousness for justification, and strength for sanctification; an imputed righteousness, to procure my acceptance; an imparted strength, to produce my holiness: the first constituting my title to the everlasting inheritance, the last forming my personal preparation for its enjoyment. "Surely," which expresses a firm persuasion, and an unshaken alliance. "Only," which denotes an utter renunciation of all other confidence, and excludes every other ground of hope. "Righteousnesses,"* the original is in the plural number; which seems to be used, not without an important design, to enlarge the signification of the word, and make it correspond with the richness of the blessing; so that it may imply the fulness and the supereminent excellency of this gift of grace; as comprehending whatever, either of suffering or obedience, is requisite to the justification of sinners. Inasmuch that, in the Lord Jesus Christ, and his all-perfect righteousness, the seed of Israel shall not only be justified, but rejoice; and not only confide, but glory, Isa. xlv. 25.

What he had just now asserted, he exemplifies in his own, and in the person of every true believer. "I will greatly rejoice in the Lord, my soul shall be joyful in my God; for he hath clothed me with the garments of salvation, he hath covered me with the robe of righteousness, Isa. lxi. 10. True believers are compared, in one of our sacred eclogues, to "a company of horses in Pharaoh's chariot;" Cant. i. 9; to horses, than which no animal is more stately and graceful; to Egyptian horses, which were the best and completest then in the world; to those in Pharaoh's chariot, which doubtless were a choice set, selected from thousands, and finest where all were fine. Here, methinks, I see the comparison realized. Christians, endued with such a spirit as breathes in this animated text, are like a collection of those gullant and majestic steeds—not destined to low drudgery, but appointed to run in the royal chariot; all life, full of fire, champing the bit, and eager for the chase. Nothing can more beautifully describe a state of exultation and ardour, than the preceding similitude, or the following words: “I will rejoice; I will greatly rejoice; my very soul, and all that is within me, shall be joyful in my God.” Wherefore? Because he hath clothed me, undone sinner as I am, with the garments of salvation; because he hath covered me, defective as all my services are, with the robe of righteousness; a robe, which hides every sin that, in thought, word, or deed, I have committed; a robe, which screens from the sword of justice, the curse of the law, and all the vengeance my iniquities have deserved; a robe, which adorns and dignifies my soul, renders it fairer than the moon, clear as the sun, and meet for the inheritance of saints in light.

Having represented this righteousness, in a variety of grand and charming views, the prophet farther characterises it, as the unalterable and never-failing origin of our justification and happiness. This he displays by a train of images, bold and sublime to the last degree. “Lift up your eyes to the heavens, and look upon the earth beneath; for the heavens shall vanish away like smoke, and the earth shall wax old like a garment; but my salvation shall be for ever, and my righteousness shall not be abolished.” Isa. li. 6. Observe the vast dimensions, and the firm foundations, both of the upper and the lower world, how strong, how steadfast they all appear! Yet these, indissoluble as they may seem, shall perish. This majestic globe, on which mountains rise, and oceans roll, shall lose its beautiful gloss; and be laid aside, like a decayed useless garment. Even that more majestic concave, in which stars are fixed, and planets revolve, shall be deprived of its very superior lustre; and vanish away like the dissolving smoke. Whereas, “my salvation,” with all the spiritual and heavenly blessings included in it, shall subsist and flourish for ever: “And my righteousness,” which is the meritorious cause of all, shall be an immoveable foundation for repose and happiness. In short, whether there be moral virtues, they shall be found wanting; whether there be Christian graces, they shall prove ineffectual; but my conformity to the law, and my obedience unto death, neither need addition, nor admit of change: they are all-sufficient in their merit, and in their virtue everlasting.

When day arises on our benighted hemisphere, it breaks and spreads by a gradual increase—forming, first the grey twilight, next the blushing morn, then the shining light, till all is heightened into the blaze and glow of noon. When spring revisits our wintry clime, she also advances by gentle degrees; first swells the bud and protrudes the gem, then expands the leaf, and unfolds the blossom: the face of things is continually changing for the better, and nature shows herself, almost every hour, in some new and more engaging dress. This leisurely process renders the strong effulgence of the celestial orb more supportable, and the lovely expansions of the vegetable creation more observable.

So progressive and increasing are the displays of Jesus Christ exhibited in the Scriptures, whose appearance is unspeakably more delightful to the soul than the emanations of orient light are to the eye, or the entertainments of the vernal season to our other senses. The gloom of fallen Adam was alleviated by a ray from this Sun of Righteousness. Abraham and the patriarchs saw afar off the blessed Jesus, “as the morning spread upon the mountains, Joel ii. 2. The psalmist and the prophets beheld his nearer approaches, like the sun upon the point of rising. To the apostles and evangelists, he arose in perfect lustre and complete beauty. The grace and the privileges which dawned under other dispensations of religion, are brought even to meridian light by the gospel. This I mention, just to intimate what you may expect from a following letter.

In the mean time, let us attend to the prophet Daniel. He records a message from heaven, which is more clearly descriptive of this great evangelical blessing than all the foregoing texts. He had been under much distress, and in great perplexity; afflicted for his own and his countrymen’s sins; anxious for the welfare of the chosen nation, and the prosperity of true religion; when an angel was despatched to the holy mourner with this most cheering news, which, received by faith, is the richest balm to a wounded conscience, and the only remedy for a guilty world: “Seventy weeks are determined upon thy people, and upon thy holy city; to finish the transgression, and make an end of sin; to make reconciliation for iniquity, and to bring in everlasting righteousness.” Dan. ix. 24. This prophecy relates to the Messiah. It foretells that, in the fulness of time, he should “finish the transgression;” restrain and suppress the power of corruption, by purifying to himself a peculiar people;—should “make an end of sin;” by sealing up or secreting its guilt, and totally abolishing its condemning power;—should “make reconciliation for iniquity,” by sustaining the vengeance due to sinners, and fully satisfying the divine justice for all their offences;—should not barely publish, but accomplish and “bring in righteousness;”^{*} that it may be presented both to God and man : to God, for the reparation of his violated law ; to man, for the justification of his obnoxious person :—That this righteousness should be everlasting ; not such as may be compared to the morning-cloud, which passeth away ; or to the early dew, which is soon dried up ; but such as will outlast the hills, on which the latter shines ; and outlast the skies through which the former sails : A righteousness, whose merits extend to every period, and every action of our lives ; and when once made ours by imputation, remains, and will remain our unalienable property. To this all the saints, who in ancient generations pleased God, owe their acceptance ; on this, all the children of men who in future ages hope for his mercy, must rely ; by this the whole assembly of the blessed will be invariably and eternally precious in his sight. Exalted character ! Can it be applicable to any thing less than the righteousness of the incarnate God ? Surely none can imagine that Daniel would speak in such a magnificent strain of any human righteousness, since, in this very chapter, he professedly depreciates himself, his fellow-saints, and all human performances whatever.

I forgot, in the proper place, to consult the prophet Jeremiah. Let us now refer ourselves to his determination. Celebrating the Saviour of Judah and Israel, he says, “This is his name, whereby he shall be called, The Lord our Righteousness ;” a determination so clear and satisfactory, as not to leave, one would almost conclude, any room for appeal. Should the sense of the passage be questioned, I think there cannot be a more authentic explication, than the preceding extracts from Isaiah and Daniel. And having the unanimous attestation of two inspired penmen, we may venture to abide by such authority, even in opposition to some respectable names. In the verse immediately foregoing, the essential holiness of the Redeemer is displayed, under the character of the righteous branch. The sanctity which he will impart to his subjects, is intimated by his “executing judgment and justice in the earth.” In the clause we have quoted, his imputed righteousness is foretold and promised. Thus the several sentences are distinct ; the description of the Saviour is complete ; and he appears perfectly suited to the exigencies of a wretched world ; in their worst estate enslaved to Satan, and in their best falling short of the glory of God. This, therefore, I take to be the grand and extensive meaning of the prophet : the righteous Lord ; not barely, the Lord who infuses righteousness into sinful souls ; but the incarnate Jehovah,* Jer. xxiii. 5, 6, whose mediatorial righteousness is, by an act of gracious imputation, ours, to all the intents of justification and salvation ; ours, as much ours, for these blessed purposes, as if we had wrought it out each in his own person.

Foreseeing and contemplating these blessings, the enraptured Zechariah cries out, “Rejoice greatly, O daughter of Zion ; shout, O daughter of Jerusalem ; behold, thy King cometh unto thee ; he is just and having salvation, lowly and riding upon an ass, and upon a colt, the foal of an ass,” Zechar. ix. 9. He addresses himself to Zion and Jerusalem, to the ecclesiastical and civil community. Persons of all ranks, and of every character, are exhorted to “rejoice ;” to rejoice “greatly ;” may, to express the joy of their heart, by loud hallelujahs, and triumphant exclamations. What is the cause of this general delight ? what can fill both church and state with such high satisfaction ? “Thy King cometh unto thee ;” even that glorious King who rules in heaven, and rules in the heart ; whose service is freedom, and whose laws are love. “He is just,” divinely righteous in his nature, and he cometh to fulfil all righteousness in thy stead. “Having salvation ;” hereby procuring salvation for his people ; deliverance from sin, from death and hell ; from every evil thou deservest, and from every misery thou fearest. That none may be discouraged, and none deterred, from applying to this Prince of Peace, he is, amidst all the honours of his sovereignty, “lowly ; does not abhor the basest, will not despise the meanest ; to the poor his gospel is preached, and for the guilty his benefits are intended. As an emblem, as a proof of this most amiable and condescending goodness, “he will ride ;” not like the conquerors of old, in a triumphal chariot, or on a richly caparisoned steed ; but upon the most mean and despicable of all animals, “an ass ;” may, what is still more despicable, on a rude undisciplined “colt, the” wayward “foal of an ass.”†

In these golden, infinitely better than golden verses, are characterised the divine and human natures of Christ, together with his mediatorial office. The divine nature, in that he enjoys the honours of the Godhead, and possesses the incommunicable name Jehovah. The human nature, in that he was to be raised up unto David, and spring as a branch from his root. The mediatorial office, in that he is the righteousness of his people, and the salvation of sinners.

† Because profane scoffers have presumed to ridicule this very remarkable incident of our Lord’s life, some interpreters of note have endeavoured to rescue it from their abusive attempts, by observing, “That the eastern asses are much larger and mora

* לְחַכְּמָה, I think, must signify more than to publish or preach. Had this been all that the angel was commissioned to declare, לְחַכְּמָה, or לְבַרְרָה, would probably have been used. The word implies such a bringing in, (the original is the same) as when Abel brought his sacrifice to the altar for the divine acceptance, and Esau brought his venison into the chamber, for his father’s use. Gen. iv. 4, xxvii. 31.

And now, since my Theron confesses himself to be miserable, and poor and naked; since the eyes of his understanding are enlightened to see the impurity of his heart, the imperfection of his righteousness, and that he is in himself a lost undone sinner; what advice, cheering and salutary, shall I suggest? O! let him listen to an Adviser infinitely more able and compassionate; listen to Him who is the Ancient of days, and the wisdom of God: "I counsel thee," says the blessed Jesus, "to buy of me gold tried in the fire, that thou mayest be rich: and white raiment, that thou mayest be clothed." Rev. iii. 18. Gold! what can this denote, but all those spiritual treasures which are hid in Christ? which are in measure unsearchable, in value inestimable, in duration eternal. "White raiment!" Surely this must signify the righteousness of our Redeemer, which is all purity, and all perfection; which clothes the soul, as a most suitable and commodious garment; which covers every deformity and every sin; and presents the believer, free from shame and free from blemish, before the throne of the Majesty in the heavens.

This, to use the delicate language and amiable images of Isaiah—this doctrine, embraced by a realizing faith, is the only pillow of rest, "wherewith we may cause the weary and heavy laden soul to find repose;" and this is the sovereign cordial prepared by infinite mercy for the refreshment of anxious and desponding transgressors.

graceful than ours; that patriarchs and judges thought it no disgrace to ride upon them. This observation has, I fear, more of false delicacy, than of real truth, or Christian simplicity. In the patriarchal ages, I acknowledge, persons of high distinction thought it no dishonour in their journeys and processions, to appear on this animal. But I very much question, whether the same fashion subsisted, or the same way of thinking prevailed, in the reign of Tiberius Cæsar. See James iii. 3. Nay, I am strongly inclined to suspect, that this plain primitive custom was superseded, even in the days of Zechariah. For long before this time I find, that Solomon had four thousand stalls of horses for his chariots, and two thousand and horsemen; and that horses were brought to him out of Egypt, and divers other countries, 1 Kings iv. 26, x. 26, 29. From this period, it is probable, none but the poor and inferior sort of people rode upon asses. When Isaiah prophesied, the land was full of horses, Isaiah ii. 7. Under the Persian monarchy, when Zechariah flourished, horses were in still greater repute. Well, therefore, might the prophet say, with wonder and delight, lowly, and riding upon an ass!

Was it a mean attitude? exceedingly mean, mean even to contempt, I make no scruple to grant it: nay, I make my boast of it! It is for the honour of our Lord's condescension, it is for the utter confusion of all worldly pomp and grandeur, and it is for the unspeakable comfort of my sinful soul. Most charming humility, most endearing gentleness! "He who rideth upon the heavens as it were upon a horse, and maketh the clouds his chariot, to atone for my pride, and to encourage my hope, disdained not in the days of his flesh, to ride upon an ass.

"They who would dignify this action, any otherwise than from its ever-to-be-remembered abasement, seem to have forgot, on the stable and the manger. They who are offended at this circumstance, and ashamed to own their Lord in his deep humiliation, have but very imperfectly learned the apostle's lesson, "God forbid that I should glory, save in the cross of Christ Jesus, my Lord."

O! let us not be in the number of those proud and refractory creatures, who, though they infinitely need, "yet would not hear" the gracious news, Isaiah xxviii. 12, nor receive the unspeakable benefit. In this respect, and in this most eminently, is that other saying of the sublime teacher true; "The Lord of hosts shall be for a crown of glory, and for a diadem of beauty, to the residue of his people. Isa. xxviii. 5. Shall we tear from our temples, or reject with disdain, this unfading and heavenly ornament, in order to substitute a mean and tawdry chaplet of our own.

Let me add a pertinent passage from one of our celebrated dramatic writers, which, if proper in his sense, will be incomparably more so, according to our manner of application:

—It were contemning,
With impious self-sufficient arrogance,
This bounty of our God, not to accept,
With every mark of honour, such a gift.

I might proceed to urge this expostulation of the poet, as I might easily have multiplied my quotations from holy writ. But, studious of brevity, I leave both, without further enlargement, to your own meditation. Yet, more studious of my friend's happiness, I cannot conclude without wishing him an interest, a clear and established interest, in this everlasting righteousness of Christ. For so, and so only, can he have "everlasting consolation, and good hope through grace."—I am, my dear Theron,

Inviolably yours,

ASPASIO.

P. S.—Opposite to the room in which I write, is a most agreeable prospect of the gardens and the fields; these, covered with herbage, and loaded with corn; those, adorned with flowers and abounding with esculents; all appearing with so florid and so beautiful an aspect, that they really seem, in conformity to the Psalmist's description, even to "laugh and sing." Let me just observe, that all these fine scenes, all these rich productions, sprung—from what? From the dissolution of the respective seeds. The seeds planted by the gardener, and the grain sowed by the husbandman, first perished in the ground, and then the copious increase arose.

Much in the same manner a true faith in Christ and his righteousness arises—from what? From the ruins of self-sufficiency, and the death of personal excellency. Let me therefore entreat my Theron still to take the diary for his counsellor; still to keep an eye on the depravity of his nature, and the miscarriages of his life. The more clearly we see, the more deeply we feel our guilt and our misery, the more highly shall we value the obedience of our blessed Surety. In such a heart faith will flourish as a rose, and lift up its head like a cedar in Lebanon. To such a soul the great Redeemer's righteousness will be welcome, as waters to the thirsty soil, or as rivers in the sandy desert.

LETTER V.

ASPASIO TO THERON.

DEAR THERON,—GIVE me leave to relate an uncommon accident which happened a little while ago in this neighbourhood, and of which I myself was a spectator. The day was the Sabbath; the place appropriated to divine worship was the scene of this remarkable affair.

A boy came running into the church breathless and trembling. He told, but in a low voice, those who stood near, that a press-gang* was advancing to besiege the doors, and arrest the sailors. An alarm was immediately taken. The seamen, with much hurry, and no less anxiety, began to shift for themselves. The rest of the congregation, perceiving an unusual stir, were struck with surprise. A whisper of inquiry ran from seat to seat, which increased by degrees into a confused murmur. No one could inform his neighbour, therefore every one was left to solve the appearance from the suggestions of a timorous imagination. Some suspected the town was on fire: some were apprehensive of an invasion from the Spaniards: others looked up, and looked round, to see if the walls were not giving way, and the roof falling upon their heads. In a few moments the consternation became general. The men stood like statues, in silent amazement, and unavailing perplexity. The women shrieked aloud; fell into fits; sunk to the ground in a swoon. Nothing was seen but wild disorder; nothing heard but tumultuous clamour. Drowned was the preacher's voice. Had he spoke in thunder, his message would scarce have been regarded. To have gone on with his work, amidst such a prodigious ferment, had been like arguing with a whirlwind, or talking to a tempest.

This brought to my mind that great tremendous day, when the heavens will pass away, when the earth will be dissolved, and all its inhabitants receive their final doom. If at such incidents of very inferior dread our hearts are ready to fail, what unknown and inconceivable astonishment must seize the guilty conscience, when the hand of the Almighty shall open those unparalleled scenes of wonder, desolation, and horror! when the trumpet shall sound—the dead arise—the world be in flames—the Judge on the throne—and all mankind at the bar!

* The reader, it is hoped, will excuse whatever may appear low, or savour of the plebeian, in any of these circumstances. If Aspasio had set himself to invent the description of a panic, he would probably have formed it upon some more raised and dignified incident. But as this was a real matter of fact, which lately happened in one of our sea-port towns, truth, even in a plain dress, may possibly be no less acceptable than fiction tricked up with the most splendid embellishments.

“The trumpet shall sound,” 1 Cor. xv. 52, says the prophetic teacher. And how startling, how stupendous the summons! Nothing equal to it, nothing like it, was ever heard through all the regions of the universe, or all the revolutions of time. When conflicting armies have discharged the bellowing artillery of war, or when victorious armies have shouted for joy of the conquest, the seas and shores have rung, the mountains and plains have echoed. But the shout of the archangel and the trump of God will resound from pole to pole; will pierce the centre, and shake the pillars of heaven. Stronger, stranger still! it will penetrate even the deepest recesses of the tomb. It will pour its amazing thunder into all those abodes of silence. The dead, the very dead, shall hear.

When the trumpet has sounded, “the dead shall arise.” In a moment, in the twinkling of an eye, the graves open, the monumental piles are cleft asunder, and the nations under ground start into day. What an immense harvest of men and women, springing up from the caverns of the earth, and the depths of the sea! Stand awhile, my soul, and consider the wonderful spectacle.—Adam formed in Paradise, and the babe born but yesterday; the earliest ages and latest generations, meet upon the same level. Jews and Gentiles, Greeks and Barbarians, people of all climes and languages, unite in the promiscuous throng. Here, those vast armies, which like swarms of locusts covered countries, which with an irresistible sweep overrun empires—hear they all appear, and here they all are lost—lost like the small drop of a bucket, when plunged into the unfathomable and boundless ocean. O the multitudes! the multitudes which these eyes shall survey, when God “calleth the heavens from above, and the earth, that he may judge his people!” What shame must flush the guilty cheek! what anguish wound the polluted breast! to have all their filthy practices, and infamous tempers, exposed before this innumerable crowd of witnesses!—Fly, my Theron; and fly, my soul; instantly let us fly, earnestly let us fly, to the purifying blood of Jesus; that all our sins may be blotted out; that we may be found “unblamable and unreprouable” in the presence of the assembled world, and what is infinitely more to be revered, in the sight of the omnipotent God.

When the swarm issues, the hive will burn: There is no more need of this habitable globe. The elect have fought the good fight, and finished their course: The wicked have been tried, and found incorrigible. The important drama is ended, every actor has performed his part; now, therefore, the scenes are taken down, and the stage is demolished. "Wo be to the earth, and to the works thereof!" Its streams are turned into pitch, its dust into brimstone, and the breath of the Almighty, like a torrent of fire, enkindles the whole. See! see how the conflagration rages, spreads, prevails over all! The forests are in a blaze, and the mountains are wrapt in flame. Cities, kingdoms, continents sink in the burning deluge. London, Britain, Europe, are no more. Through all the receptacles of water, through all the tracts of land, through the whole extent of air, nothing is discernible, but one vast, prodigious, fiery ruin.—Where now are the treasures of the covetous? where the possessions of the mighty? where the delights of the voluptuary?—How wise, how happy are they, whose portion is lodged in heavenly mansions! their "inheritance is incorruptible and undefiled;" such as the last fire cannot reach, nor the dissolution of nature impair.

But see! the azure vault cleaves; the expanse of heaven is rolled back like a scroll; and the Judge, the Judge appears! "He cometh," cries a mighty seraph, the herald of his approach, "he cometh to judge the world in righteousness, and minister true judgment unto the people!" He cometh, not as formerly in the habit of a servant, but clad with uncreated glory, and magnificently attended with the armies of heaven. Angels and archangels stand before him, and ten thousand times ten thousand of those celestial spirits minister unto him. Behold him, ye faithful followers of the Lamb; and wonder and love! This is he who bore all your iniquities on the ignominious cross: This is he who fulfilled all righteousness for the justification of your persons.—Behold him, ye despisers of his grace, and wonder, and perish! This is he whose merciful overtures you have contemned, and on whose precious blood you have trampled.

The great white throne, Rev. xx. 11, beyond description august and formidable, is erected. The King of heaven, the Lord of glory, takes his seat on the dreadful tribunal. Mercy on his right hand displays the olive-branch of peace, and holds forth the crown of righteousness: Justice on his left poises the impartial scale, and unsheaths the sword of vengeance: while wisdom and holiness, brighter than ten thousand suns, beam in his divine aspect. What are all the preceding events to this new scene of dignity and awe? The peals of thunder, sounding in the archangel's trumpet; the blaze of a burning world, and the strong convulsions of expiring nature; the unnumbered myriads of human creatures, starting into instantaneous existence, and thronging the astonished skies; all these seem familiar incidents, compared with the appearance of the incarnate Jehovah. Amazement, more than amazement, is all around. Terror and glory unite in their extremes. From the sight of his majestic eye, from the insupportable splendours of his face, the earth itself, and the very "heavens flee away." Rev. xx. 11. How then? Oh, how shall the ungodly stand? stand in his angry presence, and draw near to this consuming fire!

Yet draw near they must, and take their trial, their decisive trial, at his righteous bar. Every action comes under examination; for each idle word they must give account. Not so much as a secret thought escapes this exact scrutiny. How shall the criminals, the impenitent criminals, either conceal their guilt or elude the sentence? They have to do with a sagacity too keen to be deceived, with a power too strong to be resisted, and (O! terrible, terrible consideration!) with a severity of most just displeasure, that will never relent, never be entreated more. What ghastly despair lowers on their pale looks! What racking agonies rend their distracted hearts! The bloody axe and the torturing wheel are ease, are down, compared with their prodigious wo. And (O holy God!) wonderful in thy doings! fearful in thy judgments, even this prodigious wo is the gentlest of visitations, compared with that indignation and wrath which are hanging over their guilty heads, which are even now falling on all the sons of rebellion, which will plunge them deep in aggravated and endless destruction.

And is there a last day? and must there come
A sure, a fix'd irrevocable doom?

Surely then, to use the words of a pious prelate,* it should be "the main care of our lives and deaths, what shall give us peace and acceptance before the dreadful tribunal of God. What but righteousness? What righteousness, or whose? Ours, or Christ's? Ours, in the inherent graces wrought in us, in the holy works wrought by us? or Christ's, in his most perfect obedience and meritorious satisfaction, wrought for us, and applied to us? The Popish faction is for the former: we Protestants are for the latter. God is as direct on our side as his word can make him; everywhere blazoning the defects of our own righteousness, everywhere extolling the perfect obedience of our Redeemer's."

"Behold!" says the everlasting King,
"I lay in Zion for a foundation, a stone;
a tried stone, a precious corner-stone, a sure foundation: he that believeth, shall not make haste," Isa. xxviii. 16. As this text contains so noble a display of our Saviour's consummate ability for his great work; as it is admirably calculated to preserve the mind from distressing fears, and to settle it in a steady tranquillity; you will give me leave to touch it cursorily with my pen, just as I should descant upon it in conversation, was I now sitting in one of your agreeable arbours, and enjoying your more agreeable company.

How beautiful the gradation! how lively the description! and how very important the practical improvement; or, I might say, the inscription, which is engraven on this wonderful stone.—"Behold!" Intended to rouse and fix our most attentive regard. The God of heaven speaks. He speaks, and every syllable is balm; every sentence is rich with consolation. If ever, therefore, we have ears to hear, let it be to this Speaker, and on this occasion.

"A stone."—Every thing else is sliding sand, is yielding air, is a breaking bubble. Wealth will prove a vain shadow, honour an empty breath, pleasure a delusory dream, our own righteousness a spider's web. If on these we rely, disappointment must ensue, and shame be inevitable. Nothing but Christ, nothing but Christ, can stably support our spiritual interests, and realize our expectations of true happiness. And, blessed be the divine goodness! he is, for this purpose, not a stone only, but "A tried stone."—Tried, in the days of his humanity, by all the vehemence of temptations, and all the weight of afflictions; yet, like gold from the furnace, rendered more shining and illustrious by the fiery scrutiny. Tried, under the capacity of a Saviour, by millions and millions of depraved, wretched, and ruined creatures, who have always found him perfectly able, and as perfectly willing, to expiate the most enormous guilt—to deliver from the most inveterate corruptions—and save, to the very uttermost, all that come unto God through him.

"A corner stone."—Which not only sustains, but unites the edifice, incorporating both Jews and Gentiles, believers of various languages, and manifold denominations—here, in one harmonious bond of brotherly love—hereafter, in one common participation of eternal joy.

"A precious stone."—More precious than rubies; the pearl of great price, and the desire of all nations.—Precious, with regard to the divine dignity of his person, and the unequalled excellency of his mediatorial offices. In these, and in all respects, greater than Jonah—wiser than Solomon—chiefest among ten thousand—and to the awakened sinner, or enlightened believer, "altogether lovely." Cant. v. 16.

"A sure foundation."—Such as no pressure can shake; equal, more than equal to every weight, even to sin, the heaviest load in the world. "The Rock of Ages," such as never has failed, never will fail, those humble penitents who cast their burden upon the Lord Redeemer! who roll* all their guilt, and fix their whole hopes, on this immovable basis; or, as the original words may be rendered, "a foundation! a foundation!" There is a fine spirit of vehemency in the sentence, thus understood. It speaks the language of exultation, and expresses an important discovery. That which mankind infinitely want; that which multitudes seek, and find not; it is here! it is here! This, this is the foundation for their pardon, their peace, their eternal felicity.

"Whosoever believeth," though pressed with adversities, or surrounded by dangers, "shall not make haste:"† but, free from tumultuous and perplexing thoughts, preserved from rash and precipitate steps, he shall possess his soul in patience; knowing the sufficiency of those merits, and the fidelity of that grace, on which he has reposed his confidence, shall quietly, and without perturbation, wait for an expected end. And not only amidst the perilous or disastrous changes of life, but even in the day of everlasting judgment, such persons shall stand with boldness. They shall look up to the grand Arbitrator—look round on all the solemnity of his appearance—look forward to the unalterable sentence—and neither feel anxiety, nor fear damnation.

Such, in that day of terrors, shall be seen
To face the thunders with a godlike mien.

* Roll.—This is the exact sense of the sacred phrase, כֹּל אֵיךְ יִדְוֶה, Psal. xxii. 8; xxxvii. 5. Prov. xvi. 3. I am not ignorant, that some people have presumed to censure, and many have been shy of using this bold and vigorous metaphor; which nevertheless appears to me, of all others, the most just, the most significant, and therefore the most truly beautiful.

† "Shall not make haste." This metaphorical expression, though it might be very intelligible to a Hebrew, is, to an English reader, like some fine picture placed in a disadvantageous light. We may possibly illustrate the prophet's meaning, and exemplify his assertion, if we compare the conduct of Moses with that of the Israelites, on viewing the fatal catastrophe of Dathan and Abiram. When the earth trembled under their feet, when the ground opened its horrid jaws, when the presumptuous sinners went down alive into the pit, when the tremendous chasm closed upon the screaming wretches; the children of Israel, it is written, "fled at the cry of them, fled in wild and hasty confusion; for they said, lest the earth swallow us up also." But Moses, who denounced the dreadful doom, Moses, who was sure of the divine protection! Moses made no such precipitate or disorderly haste. He stood calm and composed; saw the whole alarming transaction, without any uneasy emotions of fear, or any unnecessary attempts to escape. So that his behaviour seems to be a clear and apposite comment on Isaiah's phrase. See Numb. xvi.

The planets drop; their thoughts are fix'd above:
The centre shakes; their hearts disdain to move.

This portion of Scripture, which I hope will both delight and edify my friend, recalls our attention to the subject of my present letter—to those propitiatory sufferings, and that justifying righteousness, which, imputed to sinners, are the ground of their comfort, and the bulwark of their security. And what say the writers of the New Testament upon this point? they, whose understandings were opened by the "Wonderful Counsellor," to discern the meaning of the ancient oracles; who must therefore be the most competent judges of their true import, and our surest guides in settling their sense. Do they patronize our interpretation of the prophets? do they set their seal to the authenticity of our doctrine?

St. Luke, in his ecclesiastical history, has preserved this weighty declaration of the apostles: "We believe, that through the grace of our Lord Jesus Christ, we shall be saved even as they. Acts. xv. 11. Here the thing is implied.—St. Peter, in the introduction to one of his theological epistles, thus addresses his happy correspondents: "To them that have obtained like precious faith, in the righteousness* of our God and Saviour Jesus Christ." 2 Pet. i. 1. Here the point is expressly asserted.—With equal clearness is the doctrine delivered by Matthew the evangelist: "Seek ye first the kingdom of God and his righteousness." Matt. vi. 33. What can the "kingdom of God" mean? An experience of the power, and an enjoyment of the privileges of the gospel. What are we to understand by "his righteousness?" Surely, the righteousness which is worthy of this grand appellation, and peculiar to that blessed institution.

Would we learn what is the great and distinguishing peculiarity of the gospel? St. Paul informs us: "Therein the righteousness of God is revealed, from faith to faith." As this text leads us into the Epistle to the Romans; as this epistle is, for the propriety of its method, as well as for the importance of its doctrine, singularly excellent; it may not be amiss to examine its structure, and inquire into its design.

The apostle writes to a promiscuous people, who had been converted, partly from Judaism, partly from Gentilism. His aim is, to strike at the very root of their former errors respectively—to turn them wholly to the superabundant grace of God, and estalish them solely on the all-sufficient merits of Christ.

The Gentiles were, for the most part, grossly ignorant of God, and stupidly negligent of invisible interests. If any among them had a sense of religion, their virtues, they imagined, were meritorious of all that the Deity could bestow. If they fell into sin, sin they supposed might easily be obliterated by repentance, or compensated by a train of sacrifices.* A few of their judicious sages taught, that the most probable means of securing the divine favour, was a sincere reformation of life.

The Jews, it is well known, placed a mighty dependence on their affinity to Abraham, and the covenant made with their fathers, on their adherence to the letter of the moral law, and their scrupulous performance of ceremonial institutions; Gentiles and Jews agreeing in this mistake, that they looked for the pardon of guilt, and the attainment of happiness, from some services done, or some qualities acquired by themselves.

Against these errors the zealous apostle draws his pen. He enters the lists like a true champion of Christ, in the most spirited and heroic manner imaginable. "I am not ashamed of the gospel of Christ;" for, however it may be deemed foolishness by the polite Greeks, or prove a stumbling-block to the carnal Jews, "it is the power of God unto salvation." Rom. i. 16, it is the grand instrument, which he has ordained for 'his blessed purpose, and which he will certainly crown with the desired success. Whence has the gospel this very peculiar power? because therein a righteousness is revealed, a true and perfect righteousness, which obliterates all guilt, and furnishes a solid title to eternal life. What righteousness is this? the righteousness, not of man but of God; which was promised by God in the scriptures, was introduced by God in the person of his Son, and on account of its

* See Witsii Animadversiones Irenææ, cap. 7—A choice little piece of polemical divinity; perhaps the very best that is extant; in which the most important controversies are fairly stated, accurately discussed, and judiciously determined, with a perspicuity of sense, and a solidity of reasoning, exceeded by nothing but the remarkable conciseness, and the still more remarkable candour of the sentiments.

The Oeconomia Fæderum, written by the same hand, is a body of divinity, in its method so well digested, in its doctrines so truly evangelical, and (what is not very usual with our systematic writers,) in its language so refined and elegant, in its manner so affectionate and animating, that I would venture to recommend it to every young student of divinity. I would not scruple to risk all my reputation upon the merits of this performance; and I cannot but lament it, as one of my greatest losses, that I was not sooner acquainted with this most excellent author. All whose works have such a delicacy of composition, and such a sweet savour of holiness, that I know not any comparison more proper to represent their true character, than the golden pot which had manna; and was outwardly, bright with burnished gold, inwardly rich with heavenly food.

* The phrase is πίστιν ἐν δικαιοσύνῃ. If we retain the common translation, it proves another very momentous truth: "that the righteousness of our God, even of our Saviour Jesus Christ," is the one meritorious procuring cause of all spiritual blessings; of faith, as well as of fruition: of grace, as well as of glory.

consummate excellency, is both acceptable and available in his sight!.

This righteousness is "from faith to faith," Rom. i. 17; held forth, as it were, by a promising God, and apprehended by a believing soul, who first gives a firm assent to the gospel—then cordially accepts its blessings, from a conviction that the doctrine is true, passes to a persuasion that the privileges are his own. When this is effected, a foundation is laid for all happiness, a principle is wrought, to produce all holiness.

But why was it requisite that such a righteousness should be provided by God, and revealed in the gospel? Because both Gentile and Jew neither possessed, nor could attain, any righteousness of their own; and this righteousness, though so absolutely necessary for their fallen state, was infinitely remote from all human apprehensions. The latter assertion is self-evident; the former is particularly demonstrated.—First, with regard to the Gentiles; the generality of whom were abandoned to the most scandalous excesses; and they who had escaped the grosser pollutions, fell short in the duties of natural religion. Next, with regard to the Jews; many of whom lived in open violation of the external commandment; and not one of them acted up to the internal purity required by the Mosaic precepts. From which premises this conclusion is deduced—that each of them had transgressed even their own rule of action; that all of them were, on this account, utterly inexcusable: therefore by the works of the law, whether dictated by reason or delivered by Moses, "no mortal can be justified," Rom. iii. 20, in the sight of God.

Lest any should imagine, that righteousness may be obtained, if not by a conformity to the law of nature, or the law of Moses, yet by an observation of evangelical ordinances, he farther declares, that sinners are justified freely, without any regard to their own endowments, "through the redemption, the complete redemption of Jesus Christ, Rom. iii. 24, after such a manner, as may lay them low in humiliation, even while it exalts them to the kingdom of heaven; after such a manner, as may bring life and salvation to their souls, while all the glory reverts to God the Father, and his Son Jesus Christ.

In the prosecution of this very momentous subject, our sacred disputant removes an objection which is as common as it is plausible. "Do we make void the law through faith?" Do we render it a vain institution, such as never has been, never will be fulfilled? "God forbid!" This were a flagrant dishonour to the divine Legislator and his holy commandments; such as we would abhor, rather than countenance. On the contrary, "we establish the law,"* Rom. iii. 31; not only as we receive it for a rule of life, but as we expect no salvation without a proper, without a perfect conformity to its injunctions. How can this be effected? by qualifying its sense, and softening it into an easier system? This were to vacate the law, to deprive it of its honours; and hinder it from attaining the due end, either of obedience or condemnation. No; but we establish the law, by believing in that great Mediator, who has obeyed its every precept, sustained its whole penalty, and satisfied all its requirements in their utmost extent.

Farther to corroborate his scheme, he proves it from the renowned examples of Abraham and David. The instance of Abraham is so clear, that it wants no comment: Any paraphrase would rather obscure, than illustrate it. The other, derived from the testimony of the Psalmist, may admit the commentator's tool; yet not to hammer it into a new form, but only to clear away the rubbish; to rescue it from misrepresentation, and place it in a true light. "Even as David describeth the blessedness of the man, to whom God imputeth righteousness without works, saying, Blessed are they, whose unrighteousness is forgiven, and whose sins are covered: Blessed is the man to whom the Lord will not impute sin." Rom. iv. 6. 7. Here is imputation asserted—the imputation of righteousness—of righteousness without works; without any respect to, or any co-operation from any kind of human works. It is a blessing vouchsafed to the ungodly; not founded on a freedom from sin, but procuring a remission of its guilt.

Some, I know, have attempted to resolve all the force of this passage into an argument for the sameness of pardon and justification; whereas the apostle undertakes to prove, not that forgiveness and justification are identically the same, but that both are absolutely free. To maintain which position he argues: "This doctrine is as true, as it is comfortable. It agrees with the experience, and has received the attestation of David. When he speaks of the blessed and happy man, he describes him, not as an innocent, but guilty person; not as having any claim to the divine favour, on account of deserving performances, or recommending properties; but as owing all his acceptance to that sovereign grace, which forgives iniquities and blots out sin. Such is the case with regard to that evangelical justification which we preach; even as it is, in the manner of its vouchsafement perfectly similar to the blessedness celebrated by the Psalmist." The apostle's eye is not so directly upon the nature of the privilege, as upon the freeness with which it is granted:

* An incontestible proof that the apostle treats of the moral law.

Nor can any infer from the tenor of his reasoning, that to be forgiven, is the same as to be justified; only that both are acts of infinitely rich mercy, designed for sinners; promised to sinners, bestowed on sinners; who have nothing, nothing of their own, either to boast or to plead.

In the fifth chapter, from verse the twelfth to the end, the sacred penman points out the cause, and explains the method of justification: Of which this is the sum—That Christ, in pursuance of the covenant of grace, fulfilled all righteousness in the stead of his people: That this righteousness being performed for them, is imputed to them: That by virtue of this gracious imputation they are absolved from guilt and entitled to bliss; as thoroughly absolved, and as fully entitled, as if in their own persons they had undergone the expiatory sufferings and yielded the meritorious obedience. Lest it should seem strange in the opinion of a Jew or a Gentile, to hear of being justified by the righteousness of another, the wary apostle urges a parallel case, recorded in the Jewish revelation, but ratified by universal experience;* namely, our being condemned for the unrighteousness of another. In this respect, he observes, Adam was a type of our Lord, or “a figure of him that was to come.” Rom. v. 14. The relation is the same, but the effect is happily reversed. Adam the head of his posterity; Christ the head of his people. Adam’s sin was imputed to all his natural descendants; Christ’s righteousness is imputed to all his spiritual offspring. Adam’s transgression brought death into the world, and all our wo; Christ’s obedience brings life, and all our happiness.† The whole closes with this very obvious and no less weighty inference: “Therefore, as by the offence of one, judgment came upon all men to condemnation; even so, by the righteousness of one, the free gift came upon all men unto justification of life.” Rom. v. 18.

I do not recollect any other similitude which the apostle so minutely sifts, and so copiously unfolds. He explains it, he applies it, he resumes it, he dwells upon it, and scarcely knows how to desist from it. I am sure you will not blame me if I imitate the sacred author, revert to the subject, and quote another passage from the same paragraph. “Much more shall they who receive abundance of grace, and of the gift of righteousness, reign in life by one, Jesus Christ. Rom. v. 17. Here I am ready to think, the inspired writer puts a difference between the two grand blessings purchased by Emanuel—remission and righteousness. For who are the persons which receive abundance of grace? They, I apprehend, that, having sinned much, have much forgiven. Who are the persons which receive abundance of the gift of righteousness? They that, having in their own conduct wrought out none which will bear the test of God’s impartial scrutiny, have one placed to their account which the all-seeing eye of heaven approves. However, whether the distinction I have ventured to propose be fanciful or substantial, of this I am persuaded, that the gift of righteousness* must signify a righteousness not originally their own, but another’s; not what they themselves have acquired, but what was fulfilled by their Surety; and is, by an act of heavenly indulgence, consigned over to them. Accordingly it is represented, not as a work, but as a gift; and those who are interested in it are styled, not workers, but receivers.

I should but faintly copy the apostolic example, if I did not once again avail myself of this important topic. Suffer me, therefore, to transcribe one more verse from this admirable chapter. “As by the disobedience of one man, many were made sinners; so by the obedience of one, shall many be made righteous.” Rom. v. 19. The “disobedience of one,” is the disobedience of Adam, his actual transgression of the divine law. Hereby “many were made sinners;” sinners in such a sense as to become obnoxious unto condemnation and death. All this, I think, is, from the apostle’s own words, indisputable. And if we would preserve the propriety of his antithesis, or the force of his reasoning, we must allow, that the obedience of one is the obedience of Christ; his actual and complete performance of the whole law. Hereby “many are made righteous;” righteous in such a sense, as to be released from condemnation, and vested with a title to life eternal. How clear and easy is this meaning! how just and regular this argumentation! What subtlety of evasion must be used, to give a different turn to the instructive text!

This is the most consistent sense in which I can understand Rom. viii. 5. “That the righteousness of the law might be fulfilled in us, who walk not after the flesh, but after the Spirit:” That the righteousness required by the holy, but broken law, might be thoroughly accomplished; accomplished by our public Representative, and in our human nature ; so as to be deemed, in point of legal estimation, fulfilled for us and by us.* This, I say, is most consistent with the tenor of St. Paul's arguing, and with the exact import of his language.—With the tenor of his arguing ; for he undertakes to demonstrate the impossibility of our justification by any personal conformity to the law ; whereas, if we could satisfy its penalty, and obey its precepts, or, in other words, fulfil its righteousness, this impossibility would cease.—With the exact import of his language ; for the original phrase denotes not a sincere, but a complete obedience ; not what we are enabled to perform, but what the law has a right to demand ; which every one must acknowledge, is not fulfilled in any mere man since the fall, but was fulfilled by Jesus Christ for our good and in our stead. This interpretation preserves the sentences distinct, and makes a very natural introduction for the following clause, where the persons interested in this privilege are described by their fruits, “who walk not after the flesh, but after the Spirit ;” implying, that justification and sanctification are like the ever-corresponding motion of our eyes, inseparable concomitants ; and we vainly pretend to the former, if we continue destitute of the latter.

* By the pains and death which infants in every nation endure, which are unquestionably punishments, and to which they are doomed by the righteous judgment of God.

† “As the sin of Adam,” says Bengelius, “without any concurrence of the sins which we ourselves respectively commit, occasioned our ruin; so the righteousness of Christ, abstracted from all consideration of our personal obedience, procures our recovery.”

* I cannot but wonder at the assertion of a late writer, who roundly declares, “That there is not one word in this whole chapter relating to the antecedent obedience of Christ’s life, but expressing only his passive obedience.” Must then this group of expressions — δικαιοσύνην—δικαιοσύνην—σπασθήν—be confined barely to the sufferings of our Lord? To put such a sense upon the words of the apostle, is, according to my apprehension, not to hear his voice, but to gag his mouth; not to acquiesce in the sacred oracles, but to make them speak our own meaning.

We have produced positive proofs of our doctrine : we have heard an apostle declaring the assured happiness and complete justification of true believers. Let us now observe the same sagacious judge of men and things discovering the danger of those self-judicialists who reject the Redeemer's righteousness.

He is filled with the darkest apprehensions, concerning his brethren the Jews. He is impressed with melancholy presages, relating to their eternal state. Rom. ix. 2. What was the cause of this tender solicitude ? Had they cast off all religion, and given themselves over to gross immoralities ? On the contrary, they were worshippers of the true God ; and had, in their way, not only a regard, but a zeal for his honour. Rom. x. 2. Wherefore, then, does this compassionate father in Israel feel the same trembling uneasiness for his kinsmen according to the flesh, as Eli felt for the endangered ark ? Himself assigns the reason : Because “they, being ignorant of God's righteousness, and going about to establish their own righteousness, have not submitted themselves to the righteousness of God,” Rom. x. 3. Not knowing that immaculate holiness, which the perfect nature, and equally perfect law of the most high God require ; being wilfully ignorant of that consummate obedience, which an incarnate God vouchsafed to perform for the justification of his people ; they sedulously, but foolishly endeavoured to establish their own righteousness ; to make it, scanty and decrepit as it was, the basis of their hopes. Thus were they resting their everlasting all on a bottom, not precarious only, but irreparably ruinous. A boundless eternity the fabric : yet they build (wonder, O heavens !) on the foam of the waters ! and (which added stubbornness to their folly) in avowed contempt of that strong and sure foundation, laid by God's own hand in Zion. For this the good apostle was afflicted with “great heaviness and continual sorrow.” For this he made the prophet's pathetic complaint his own : “O that my head were waters, and my eyes a fountain of tears, that I might bewail day and night,” Jer. ix. 1, the incorrigible perverseness of my people ! “For my people have committed two evils,” in not thankfully submitting to the righteousness of God, “they have forsaken the fountain of living waters,” in attempting to establish their own righteousness, “they have hewed themselves out cisterns, broken cisterns, that can hold no water.” Jer. ii. 13.

Having showed their fatal error, he strengthens his representation by displaying the happy success of the Gentiles. “What shall we say then ?” This, however improbable it may seem, we confidently affirm, “That the Gentiles, who followed not after righteousness,” who had no knowledge of it, and no concern about it ; even “they have attained to righteousness.”* Strange assertion ! how is this possible ? Doubtless, the righteousness which they attained, could not be any personal righteousness ; of this they were totally destitute. Instead of practising moral virtues, or religious duties, they were immersed in sensuality, and abandoned to idolatry. It must therefore be the evangelical, the imputed righteousness, “even that which was wrought by Christ, and is received by faith.”†

Israel, in the mean time, the nominal Israel, who with great pretensions to sanctity, and many costly oblations, “followed after

* Surely, this must signify more than “attaining to the profession of a religion, whereby they may be justified and saved. To this multitude attain, who continue as the prophet speaks, “stout hearted and far from righteousness; who derive no real benefit from their profession : but are rendered utterly excusable, and liable to more aggravated condemnation.”

† Surely the righteousness, which is by faith, cannot consist, “in humbly committing the soul to Christ in the way that he hath appointed.” According to this notion, the justifying righteousness would spring from ourselves—would be constituted by an act of our own, and not by the perfect obedience of our Lord.

I am sorry to see this, and the preceding interpretation, in the works of an expositor, whose learning I admire, whose piety I reverence, and whose memory I honour. Yet I must say on this occasion, with one of the ancient philosophers, “Amicus, Plato, amicus Socrates, sed magis amica, Veritas.”

* It is remarked by a judicious critic and very valuable expositor, that the preposition εἰς sometimes signifies by or for, and is so translated. Matt. v. 24 ; Heb. i. 1. See Dr. Guyc's Exposition of the New Testament.

the law of righteousness, hath not attained to the law of righteousness." "Attained!" they have done nothing less. They are fallen vastly short of it; they are pronounced guilty by it; they stand condemned before it.* Wherefore did they so grossly mistake, and so grievously miscarry? Because they forsook the good old way, in which Abraham, David, and their pious ancestors walked. They adopted a new scheme; and would fain have substituted their own, instead of relying on a Saviour's righteousness. They sought for justification, not "by faith," but as it were "by the works of the law," Rom. ix. 30, 31, 32. A method which their fathers knew not; which their God ordained not; and which proved, as it always will prove, not only abortive but destructive. At this stone they stumbled, on this rock they split. Let their ruin be a way-mark, and the apostle's observation a light-house to my Theron.

Our zealous writer tries every expedient: He mingles hope with terror. Having pointed out the rock on which the Israelites suffered shipwreck, he directs us to the haven in which sinners may cast anchor and find safety. He gives us a fine descriptive view of the Christian's complete happiness. He opens (if I may continue the metaphor) a free and ample port for perishing souls; not formed by a neck of land or a ridge of mountains, but by a magnificent chain of spiritual blessings; all proceeding from, and terminating in, that precious corner-stone, Jesus Christ, "who of God is made unto us wisdom and righteousness, and sanctification, and redemption," I Cor. i. 30; "wisdom," to enlighten our ignorant minds; "righteousness,"† to justify our guilty persons; "sanctification,"† to renew our depraved natures; "redemption," to rescue us from all evil, and render us, both in body and soul, perfectly and eternally happy. Let it be remarked, how carefully our inspired writer sets aside all sufficiency, as well as all merit, in man.

* This, I apprehend, is the purport of the apostle's speech, when he tells us, that his countrymen "had not attained unto the law of righteousness." He uses the figure metonymy, and means more than he expresses. Somewhat like the prophet in the close of this chapter who assures the believers in Jesus, "they shall not be ashamed," that is, "they shall be encouraged, emboldened, established."

† "Righteousness and sanctification;" the former imputed, the latter inherent. This preserves a distinction between the noble articles, and assigns to each a grand share in the economy of salvation. To say, that if one of the blessings is communicated in the same manner, seems to be cavilling, rather than arguing; because the subjects are of a different nature, and therefore must be enjoyed in a different way. The cocoa tree is, to the American, food and clothing, a habitation and domestic utensils; but must we suppose it administering to all those uses in one and the same unvaried method? Because in one respect it is eaten, in another it is wore, must it be thus applied in all? I believe, the illiterate savage who enjoys the several gifts, need not be taught the absurdity of such a supposition.

He represents the whole of our salvation, both in its procurement and application, as a work of freest grace. Christ is, and not we ourselves, the author of this glorious restoration, the cause of this great felicity. He is made all this unto us. How? Not by our own resolution and strength; but by God, by the agency of his mighty power and blessed Spirit. He shows us the all-sufficient fulness of Christ. He brings us by ardent longings to Christ. He implants us into Christ, and makes us partakers of his merits.

In the process of the same epistle, the sacred penman enumerates the constituent parts of that great salvation which the Son of God has procured for ruined sinners. "But ye are washed, but ye are sanctified, but ye are justified, in the name of the Lord Jesus, and by the Spirit of our God," I Cor. vi. 11. "Ye are washed;" cleansed from the filth, and discharged from the guilt of all your iniquities. "Ye are sanctified;" delivered from the death of sin, and endued with a living principle of holiness. "Ye are justified;" restored to a state of acceptance with God, and invested with a title to eternal glory. All which inestimable prerogatives are conferred upon the true believer, "in the name of our Lord Jesus Christ," in consideration of his atoning blood and meritorious righteousness. "By the Spirit of our God;" through the efficacy of his operation, revealing Christ, and working faith in the heart.

Some gentlemen have talked of a new remedial law; whereas the apostle declares, "that Christ is the end of the" old, the unalterable, the Mosaic "law, for righteousness to every one that believeth," Rom. x. 4. Follow the course of a river, it will constantly lead you to the ocean. Trace the veins of the body, they invariably unite in the heart. Mark likewise the tendency of the law, it no less constantly and invariably conducts you to Christ, as the centre of its views, and the consummation of its demands. The moral law aims at discovering our guilt, and demonstrating our inexpressible need of a Saviour. The ceremonial points him out as suffering in our stead, making reconciliation for iniquity, and purging away every defilement with his blood. They both direct the wretched transgressor to renounce himself, and fly to the Redeemer, who alone has paid that perfect obedience, and brought in that everlasting righteousness, which the sinner wants, and the law exacts; who is therefore the only proper accomplishment of the one, and the only suitable supply for the other.

What is the grand design of the whole scriptures? St. Paul, displaying their sublime origin, and enumerating the gracious purposes they are intended to serve, writes thus : " All scripture is given by inspiration of God ; and is profitable for doctrine," to declare and establish religious truth ; " for reproof," to convince of sin, and to refute error ; " for correction," or renovation of the heart and reformation of the life ; " for instruction in righteousness," in that righteousness which could never have been learned from any other book, and in which alone sinful men may appear with comfort before their God.

We have seen the principal scope of the law and the leading design of the scriptures ; let us add one inquiry more. What is the chief office of the Spirit ? If all these coincide, and uniformly terminate in the imputed righteousness of Christ, we have a confirmation of its reality and excellence, great as man can desire, I had almost said, great as God can impart. What says our Lord upon this point ? " When he, the Spirit of truth, is come, he shall convince the world of sin, of righteousness, and of judgment. Of sin, because they believe not on me ; of righteousness, because I go to my Father, and ye see me no more ; of judgment, because the prince of this world is judged," John xvi. 8—11. Is it possible for words to be more weighty and comprehensive ? Here is a summary of Christian faith, and of Christian holiness. Not that superficial holiness which is patched up of devotional forms, and goes no farther than external performances ; but that which is vital, and springs from the heart ; consists in power, not in mere profession ; whose praise, if not of men who are smitten with pompous outsides, is sure to be of God, who distinguishes the things which are excellent.

" He shall convince the world of sin," of original and actual sin, the sin of their nature, as well as the sin of their life, the sin of their best deeds, no less than the sin of their criminal commissions and blamable omissions. Above all, of their sinning against the sovereign, the only remedy, by unbelief, " because they believe not on me." He shall convince " of righteousness," of the divine Redeemer's righteousness, which the foregoing conviction must render peculiarly welcome ; convince them, that it was wrought out in behalf of disobedient and defective mortals ; that it is absolutely perfect, and sufficient to justify even the most ungodly. Of all which, an incontestible proof is given, by his resurrection from the dead, his triumphant ascension into heaven, and sitting at the right hand of his Father : " Because I go to my Father, and ye see me no more."* He shall convince " of judgment." Those who are humbled under a sense of guilt, and justified through an imputed righteousness, shall be taught by happy experience, that the prince of this world is condemned and dethroned in their hearts, that their souls are rescued from the tyranny of Satan, are made victorious over their corruptions, and restored to the liberty, the glorious liberty, of the children of God.

You wonder, perhaps, that I have not strengthened my cause by any quotation from the Epistle to the Galatians. What I design, my dear Theron, is not to accumulate, but to select arguments. However, that I may not disappoint an expectation so reasonable, I proceed to lay before you a very nervous passage from that masterful piece of sacred controversy. Only let me just observe, that the epistle was written to persons who had embraced Christianity, and professed an alliance in Christ ; but would fain have joined circumcision, would fain have superadded their own religious duties to the merits of their Saviour, in order to constitute, at least, some part of their justifying righteousness. Against which error, the vigilant and indefatigable assessor of " the truth as it is in Jesus," remonstrates : " We who are Jews by nature, and not sinners of the Gentiles, knowing that a man is not justified by the works of the law,† but by the faith of Jesus Christ, even we have believed in Jesus Christ, that we might be justified by the faith of Christ, and not by the works of the law ; for by the works of the law shall no flesh be justified," Gal. ii. 15. 16. " We who are Jews by nature," the descendants of Abraham, and God's peculiar people, have the tables of his law, and the ordinances of his worship ; we who in point of privileges are greatly superior to the Gentile nations, and have all possible advantages for establishing (if such a thing were practicable) a righteousness of our own, what have we done ? " We have believed on Jesus Christ ;" we have renounced ourselves, disclaimed whatever is our own, and depended wholly on the righteousness of Christ. For what end ? That by this " faith in Christ," which receives his righteousness, pleads his righte-

* For if the work had been imperfect in any degree, our Redeemer, instead of taking up his stated and final residence in the regions of glory, must have descended again into this inferior world, to complete what was deficient.

† Observable, very observable, is the zeal of our apostle in this determined stand against the most suspicious, and therefore the most dangerous encroachments of error. To express his ardent concern for the truth and purity of the gospel, the works of the law are mentioned no less than three times, by the apostle, and as often excluded from the affair of justification. The faith of Christ likewise is thrice inculcated, and as often asserted to be the only method of becoming righteous before God.

* 2 Tim. iii. 16. Ἡσὺς ἐκπαιθεῖσθαι.

† " He shall convince," seems to be the most proper translation of ἐκτιθεῖσθαι, as it implies the sure success which attends the operation of the divine Spirit. Men may reprove, and no conviction ensue : whereas that Almighty Agent not only reproveth, but reproveth with power ; so as to determine the judgment, and sway the affection.

ousness, and presents nothing but his righteousness before the throne, "we might be justified." What motive has induced us to this practice? A firm persuasion, that by "the works of the law," by sincere obedience, or personal holiness, "no man living has been, and no man living can be, justified before God."

Are you tired, Theron? have I fatigued your attention, instead of convincing your judgment? I will not harbour such a suspicion. It is pleasing to converse with those who have travelled into foreign countries, and seen the wonders of creation. We hearken to their narratives with delight. Every new adventure whets our curiosity, rather than palls our appetite. Must it not then afford a more sublime satisfaction to be entertained with the discourses of a person, who had not, indeed, sailed round the world, but made a journey to the third heavens? who had been admitted into the paradise of God, and heard things of infinite importance, and unutterable dignity? This was the privilege of that incomparable man, whose observations and discoveries I have been presenting to my friend. And I promise myself, he will not complain of weariness, if I enrich my epistle with one or two more of those glorious truths.

"God hath made him to be sin for us who knew no sin, that we might," not be put into a capacity of acquiring a righteousness of our own, but "he made the righteousness of God in him," 2 Cor. v. 21. In this text the double imputation of our sin to Christ, and of Christ's righteousness to us, is most emphatically taught and most charmingly contrasted. Most emphatically taught: For we are said, not barely to be righteous, but to be made righteousness itself; and not righteousness only, but (which is the utmost that language can reach) the righteousness of God. Most charmingly contrasted: For one cannot but ask, in what manner Christ was made sin? In the very same manner we are made righteousness. Christ knew no actual sin; yet upon his mediatorial interposition on our behalf, he was treated by divine justice as a sinful person. We likewise are destitute of all legal righteousness, yet upon our receiving Christ, and believing in his name, we are regarded by the divine Majesty as righteous creatures. This, therefore, cannot, in either case, be intrinsically, but must be, in both instances, imputatively. Gracious, divinely-gracious exchange! pregnant with amazing goodness, and rich with inestimable benefits. The incessant triumph of the strong and sovereign consolation of the weak believer.

Cease your exultation, cries one, and come down from your altitudes. The term used in this verse denotes, not so properly sin, as an offering for sin.—This is a mere supposal, which I may as reasonably deny as another affirm. Since the word occurs much more frequently in the former signification than in the latter; and since, by giving it the latter signification in the passage before us, we very much impair, if not totally destroy, the apostle's beautiful antithesis.

However, not to contend, but to allow the remark; I borrow my reply from a brave old champion* for the truths of the gospel: "This text," says he, "invincibly proveth, that we are not justified in God's sight by righteousness inherent in us, but by the righteousness of Christ imputed to us through faith." After which he adds, what I make my answer to the objection, "that Christ was made sin for us, because he was a sacrifice for sin, we must confess; but therefore was he a sacrifice for sin, because our sin was imputed to him, and punished in him." The poor delinquents under the Mosaic dispensation, who brought their sin-offering to the altar of the Lord, were directed to lay their hand on the devoted beast; signifying, by this usage, the transferring of guilt from the offerer to the sacrifice. Conformably to the import of this ceremony, Christ assumed our demerit; like a true peculiar victim, suffered the punishment which we had deserved; and which, without such a commutation, we must have undergone. So that our Lord's being made a sin-offering for us, does by no means invalidate, but very much confirm our doctrine. It necessarily implies the translation of our iniquity to his person; and, on the principles of analogy, must infer the imputation of his righteousness to our souls.

One passage more permit me to transcribe into my paper, and, at the same time to wish that it may be written on both our hearts; written not with ink and pen, no, nor with the point of a diamond, but with the finger of the living God. "Yea, doubtless, and I count all things but loss for the excellency of the knowledge of Christ Jesus my Lord; for whom I have suffered the loss of all things, and do count them but dung, that I may win Christ, and be found in him; not having mine own righteousness, which is of the law, but that which is through the faith of Christ, the righteousness which is of God through faith." Phil. iii. 8. 9.

Be pleased to observe, that in this confession of faith, and with reference to the case of justification, the apostle renounces all

* See Dr. Fulk's annotation on the place, in that valuable piece of ancient controversy and criticism, "The Examination of the Rhemish Testament." Which, though not altogether so elegant and refined in the language, nor so delicate and genteel in the manner, as might be wished, is nevertheless full of sound divinity, weighty arguments, and important observations.—Would the young student be taught to discover the very sinews of Popery, and be enabled to give an effectual blow to that complication of errors, I scarce know a treatise better calculated for the purpose.

those acts of supposed righteousness which were antecedent to his conversion. Nor does he repudiate them only, but all those more excellent services by which he was so eminently distinguished, even after his attachment to Christ, and engagement in the Christian ministry. As though he should say, "The privilege of being a Hebrew by birth; the prerogative of being a Pharisee by profession; together with a behaviour exemplary, and a reputation unblamable; all these, which were once reckoned my highest gain, as soon as I became acquainted with the glorious perfections of Christ, 'I counted' loss for him." And now, though I have been a disciple many years; have walked in all holy conversation and godliness; have endured for my divine Master's name tribulations above measure; have laboured more abundantly, and more successfully, than all the apostles; yet even these, and all other attainments, of what kind or of what date soever, I count † but loss, for the transcendent excellency of Christ Jesus my Lord. 'Yea doubtless; ‡ it is my deliberate and steadfast resolution; and do publicly avow, that, specious as all these acquirements may seem, and valuable as they may be in other respects, I reckon them but dung, that I may win Christ. § They fade into nothing, they dwindle into less than nothing, if set in competition with his matchless obedience; and were they to supersede my application to his merits, or weaken my reliance on his mediation, they would not be contemptible only, but injurious—irreparably injurious—lose itself."

You will ask, If he rejects all his own righteousness, on what are his hopes fixed? On a foundation, extensive as the obedience of the Redeemer's life and death, unshaken

* Ἦγημαι, "I have counted."

† Ἦγημαι, relates to the present time, and comprehends present attainments, "I do count."—Not some, or the greatest part, but "all things." What? Is a course of sobriety, and the exercise of morality, to be reckoned as dung? All things, says the apostle. What? Is our most elevated devotion, and enlarged obedience to be degraded at this monstrous rate? All things, says the apostle. This is his unvariable reply. And we may venture to affirm, that he had the mind of Christ.

‡ Perhaps ἀλλὰ μὲν οὐν γὰρ may be translated, "but truly." As if he had said, "But why should I mention any more particulars? In truth, I count all things," &c.

§ Διὰ Χριστοῦ—διὰ τοῦ πνεύματος—διὰ τῶν ἐργῶν—plainly imply this comparative or relative sense. Virtues, which are the fruits of the Spirit, and labours, which are a blessing to mankind, must not be reckoned absolutely or in all respects despicable; but only in a limited and qualified acceptance; despicable not in themselves, but as compared with the divinely perfect righteousness of Christ, or as referred to the infinitely important article of justification.

That Aspasio, in this whole paragraph, speaks the sense of our church, will appear from the following extract—"For the apostle, St. Paul, saith, He doth glory in what? In the contempt of his own righteousness, and that he looketh for the righteousness of God by faith."—Homily of Salvation, part 2.

as the dignity of his eternal power and God-head. They are fixed on "the righteousness which is of God;" the righteousness which God the Father, in unsearchable wisdom, provided; and which God the Son, in unutterable goodness wrought. Do you inquire how he came to be invested with this righteousness? The answer is ready and satisfactory. It was by the application of the divine Spirit, and the instrumentality of faith. Lest any should imagine that this faith might be substituted instead of his own obedience to the law, he puts an apparent difference between the righteousness which justifies, and the faith by which it is received; not the righteousness which consists in, but is "through the faith of Christ." To show the great importance of this distinction, how earnestly he insisted upon it as a preacher, how much it tended to his consolation as a Christian, he repeats the sentiment, he re-inkulates the doctrine, "the righteousness which is of God by faith."

Will you now, Theron, or shall I, poor unprofitable creatures, presume to rely on any performances or any accomplishments of our own, when that distinguished saint,—a perfect prodigy of gifts, of graces, and of zeal,—indefatigable in labours, unconquerable by afflictions, and of whose usefulness there is neither measure nor end;—when he denies himself in every view, depreciates all, disavows all, and makes mention of nothing but the incomparable righteousness of his "obedient, dying, interceding Saviour?"

What shall I say more? Shall I attempt to play the rhetorician, and borrow the insinuating arts of persuasion? This, after all the cogent testimonies produced, and all the great authorities urged, would be a needless parade. When our pen is a sunbeam, there is but little occasion to dip it in oil.

Instead of such an attempt, give me leave to make a frank and honest confession. I would conceal nothing from my friend. He should have a sash to my breast: throw it up at his pleasure; and see all that passes within.—Though I never had any temptation to that pernicious set of errors, which passes under the character of Socinianism, yet I had many searchings of heart, and much solicitous inquiry, how far we are indebted to Christ's active righteousness.

Thoroughly persuaded, that "other foundation can no man lay, save that which is laid, even Jesus Christ," 1 Cor. iii. 11, and that "there is no other name given under heaven, whereby men can be saved" Acts iv. 12, yet, whether we were not to confine our believing regards to a dying Saviour, was matter of considerable doubt. At first, I was inclined to acquiesce in the affirmative. After long consideration and many prayers, my faith fixed upon the whole of Christ's mediatorial undertaking; which begun in his spontaneous submission to the law, was carried on through all his meritorious life, and issued in his atoning death. This is now the basis of my confidence, and the bulwark of my happiness. Hither I fly; here I rest; as the dove, after her wearisome and fruitless roivings, returned to Noah, and rested in the ark.

This scheme first recommended itself to my affections, as making the most ample provision for the security and repose of a guilty conscience; which, when alarmed by the accusations of sin, is very apprehensive of its condition; and will not be comforted, till every scruple is satisfied, and all the obstructions to its peace are removed. Thus I reasoned with myself: "Though there is undoubtedly something to be said for the other side of the question, yet this is evidently the safest method. And, in an affair of infinite consequence, who would not prefer the safest expedient? Should the righteousness of Jesus Christ be indispensably requisite as a wedding-garment, what will they do, when the great immortal King appears, who have refused to accept it? whereas, should it not prove so absolutely necessary, yet such a dependence can never obstruct our salvation. It can never be charged upon us as an article of contumacy or perverseness, that we thought too meanly of our own, too magnificently of our Lord's obedience. So that, let the die turn either way, we are exposed to no hazard. This scheme takes in all that the other systems comprehend, and abundantly more. In this I find no defect, no flaw, no shadow of insufficiency. It is somewhat like the perfect cube, which, wherever it may be thrown, or however it may fall, is sure to settle upon its base. Supposing, therefore, the important beam should hang in equilibrium with respect to argument, these circumstances cast into the scale may very justly be allowed to turn the balance."

Upon a more attentive examination of the subject, I perceived, that this is the doctrine of our national church; is enforced by the attestation of our ablest divines; and has been in all ages the consolation of the most eminent saints: That it is the genuine sense of scripture, and not some inferior or subordinate point, incidentally touched upon by the inspired writers, but the sum and substance* of their heavenly message; that which constitutes the vitals of their system, and is the very soul of their religion. On which account, the whole gospel is denominated from it, and styled "the ministration of righteousness." I was farther convinced, that this way of salvation magnifies, beyond compare, the divine law; is no less honourable to all the divine attributes; and exhibits the ever-blessed Mediator in the most illustrious and the most delightful view. All these considerations, under the influence of the eternal Spirit, have determined my judgment, and established my faith. So that, I trust, neither the subtilities of wit, nor the sneers of ridicule, nor any other artifice, shall ever be able to separate me from the grace and righteousness which are in Jesus Christ.

Let me now, by way of conclusion, review that awful subject which introduced the letter. Let me suppose the Judge, who "is at the door," actually come; the great and terrible day, which is hastening forward, really commenced.—Hark! the trumpet sounds the universal summons. The living are struck with a death-like astonishment; the dead start from their silent abodes. See, the whole earth takes fire; the sun is turned into darkness; and the stars fall from their spheres! Behold, the Lord Jesus comes with myriads of his angels! The judgment is set, and the books are opened.

Observe those exemplary Christians, whose sentiments I have been collecting. They renounce themselves, and rely on their glorious Surety. Methinks I hear them say, each as they quit their beds of dust: "I will go forth from the grave in thy strength, O blessed Jesus; and at the decisive tribunal will make mention of thy righteousness only." At the same time will you, Theron, or shall I, stand forth and declare, before the innumerable multitude of anxious sinners and adoring seraphs, "Let those pusillanimous creatures fly for refuge to their Saviour's righteousness. We will confide in works, in accomplishments of our own. We are the men who have personally kept the divine law, and want no supposititious obedience from another. Let the eye that glances through immensity, and penetrates the recesses of the heart; let that holy and omniscient eye, examine our temper, and sift our conduct. We are bold to risk our souls, and all their immortal interests, on the issue of such a scrutiny."

Perhaps, your mind is impressed with this solemn scene, and your thoughts recoil at such daring presumption. If so, it will be proper for me to withdraw, and leave you to your own meditations. At such mo-

ASPASIO.

LETTER VI.

THERON TO ASPASIO.

DEAR ASPASIO.—THE last evening was one of the finest I ever saw. According to my custom, I made an excursion into the open fields, and wanted nothing to complete the satisfaction, but my friend's company. I could not but observe how much your improving conversation heightened the charms of nature. When religion applied philosophy, every thing was instructive, as well as pleasing. Not a breeze swept over the plains, to clear the sky and cool the air, but it tended also to disperse our doubts, and enliven our faith in the supreme all-sufficient good. Not a cloud tinged the firmament with radiant colours, or amused the sight with romantic shapes, but we beheld a picture of the present world—of its fading acquisitions and fantastic joys—in the mimic forms and the transitory scene. Even the weakest of the insect tribe, that skim the air in sportive silence, addressed us with the strongest incitements, and gave us the loudest calls to be active in our day, and useful in our generation. They cried, at least when you lent them your tongue,

Such is vain life, an idle flight of days,
A still delusive round of sickly joys;
A scene of little cares, and trifling passions,
If not ennobled by the deeds of virtue.

How often, at the approach of sober eve, have we stole along the cloisters of a sequestered hower, attentive to the tale of some querulous current, that seemed to be struck with horror at the awful gloom, and complained with heavier murmurs, as it passed under the blackening shades, and along the root-obstructed channel! Or else, far from the babbling brook, and softly treading the grassy path, we listened to the nightingale's song; while every gale held its breath, and all the leaves forbore their motion, that they might neither drown nor interrupt the melodious wo. From both which pensive strains, you endeavoured to temper and chastise the exuberant gaiety of my spirits. You convinced me, that true joy is a serious thing, is the child of sedate thought, not the spawn of intemperate mirth; nursed, not by the sallies of dissolute merriment, but by the exercise of serene contemplation.

Sometimes, at the gladsome return of morn, we have ascended an airy eminence, and hailed the new-born day; and followed with our delighted eye, the mazes of some glittering stream. Here, rushing with impetuous fury from the mountain's side, foaming over the rifted rocks, and roaring down the craggy steep; impatient, as it were, to get free from such rugged paths, and mingle with the beauties of the lower vale: There, slackening its headlong career, and smoothing its eddies into an even flow: While, deep embosomed in the verdant mead, it glides through the cherished and smiling herbage; sometimes lost amidst closing willows; sometimes emerging with fresh beauty from the leafy covert; always roving with an air of amorous complacency, as though it would caress the fringed banks, and flowery glebe. Reminded by this watery monitor, of that constancy and vigour with which the affections should move towards the great centre of happiness. Christ Jesus; of that determined ardour with which we should break through the entanglements of temptation, and obstacles of the world, in order to reach our everlasting rest; and of the mighty difference between the turbulent, the frothy, the precipitate gratifications of vice, and the calm, the substantial, the permanent delights of religion.

Or else, with eager view, we have surveyed the extensive prospect, and wandered over all the magnificence of things—an endless variety of graceful objects and delightful scenes! each soliciting our chief regard; every one worthy of our whole attention; all conspiring to touch the heart with a mingled transport of wonder, of gratitude, and of joy. So that we have returned from our rural expedition, not as the spendthrift from the gaming table, cursing his stars, and raving at his ill luck, gulled out of his money, and the derided dupe of sharpers; not as the libertine from the house of wantonness, surfeited with a rank debauch, dogged by shame, goaded by remorse, with a thousand recent poisons tingling in his veins. But we returned as ships of commerce from the golden continent, or the spicy islands, with new accessions of sublime improvement and solid pleasure; with a deeper veneration for the Almighty Creator; with a warmer sense of his unspeakable favours; and with a more intamed desire “to know him now by faith, and after this life to have the fruition of his glorious Godhead.”

Sometimes, with an agreeable relaxation, we have transferred our cares from the welfare of the nation to the flourishing of the farm; and instead of enacting regulations for the civil community, we have planned schemes for the cultivation of our ground and the prosperity of our cattle. Instead of attending to the course of fleets, and the destination of armies, we have directed the plough where to rend the grassy turf, or taught the honeysuckle to wind round the arbour, and the jessamine to climb upon the wall. Instead of interposing our friendly offices to reconcile contending kingdoms, we have formed a treaty of coalition between the stranger scion, and the adopting tree; and, by the remarkable melioration of the ensuing fruit, demonstrated (would contending empires regard the precedent!) what advantages flow from pacific measures and an amicable union. Instead of unravelling the labyrinths of state, and tracing the finesses of foreign courts, we have made ourselves acquainted with the politics of nature, and observed how wonderfully, how mysteriously, that great projectress acts. In this place she rears a vast trunk, and unfolds a multiplicity of branches from one small berry. She qualifies, by her amazing operations, a few contemptible acorns, that were formerly carried in a child's lap, to bear the British thunder round the globe, and secure to our island the sovereignty of the ocean. In another place she produces, from a dry grain, "first the green blade; then the turgid ear; afterwards the full grown and ripened corn in the ear," Mark iv. 28; repaying, with exact punctuality, and with lavish usury, the husbandman's toil, and the husbandman's loan; causing, by a most surprising resurrection, the death of one seed to be fruitful in the birth of hundreds.

But I forget your caution, Aspasio; forget how kindly you have checked me, when I have been haranguing upon, I know not what, powers and works of nature; whereas it is God who "worketh hitherto," John v. 17, who to this day exerts, and to the end of time will exert, that secret but unremitting energy, which is the life of this majestic system, and the cause of all its stupendous operations. Let this show you how much I want my guide, my philosopher, and friend. Without his prompting aid, my genius is dull, my reflections are awkward; and my religious improvements jejune; somewhat like the bungling imitations of the tool, compared with the masterly effects of vegetation. However, I will proceed; yet not from any view of informing my Aspasio, but only to draw a bill upon his pen, and lay him under an obligation to enrich me with another letter upon the grand and excellent subject of his last.

Art is dim-sighted in her plans, and defective even in her most elaborate essays. But Nature, or rather Nature's sublime Author, is indeed a designer, and "a workman that need not be ashamed." 2 Tim. ii. 15. His eye strikes out ten thousand elegant models, and his touch executes all with inimitable perfection. What an admirable specimen is here of the divine skill and of the divine goodness! This terraqueous globe is intended not only for a place of habitation, but for a storehouse of conveniences. If we examine the several apartments of our great abode, if we take a general inventory of our common goods, we shall find the utmost reason to be charmed with the displays, both of nice economy, and of boundless profusion.

Observe the surface of this universal message. The ground, coarse as it may seem, and trodden by every foot, is nevertheless the laboratory where the most exquisite operations are performed; the shop, if I may so speak, where the finest manufactures are wrought. Though a multitude of generations have always been accommodated, and though a multitude of nations are daily supplied by its liberalities, it still continues inexhausted—is a resource that never fails, a magazine never to be drained.

The unevenness of the ground, far from being a blemish or a defect, heightens its beauty, and augments its usefulness. Here it is scooped into deep and sheltered vales, almost constantly covered with a spontaneous growth of verdure, which, all tender and succulent, composes an easy couch, and yields the most agreeable fodder for the various tribes of cattle. There it is extended into a wide, open, champaign country, which, annually replenished with the husbandman's seed, shoots into a copious harvest; a harvest, not only of that principal wheat which is the staff of our life, and strengthens our heart, but of the "appointed barley," Isaiah xxviii. 25, and various other sorts of grain, which yield an excellent food for our animals, and either enable them to despatch our drudgery, or else fatten their flesh for our tables.

The furrows, obedient to the will of man, vary their produce. They bring forth a crop of tall, flexible, slender plants,* whose thin filmy coat, dried, attenuated, and skillfully manufactured, transforms itself into some of the most necessary accommodations of life, and genteel embellishments of society. It is wove into ample volumes of cloth, which, fixed to the mast, gives wings to our ships, and wafts them to the extremities of the ocean. It is twisted into vast lengths of cordage, which add nerves to the crane, and lend sinews to the pulley; or else, adhering to the anchor, they fasten the vessel even on the fluctuating element, and secure its station even amidst driving tempests. It furnishes the duchess with her costly head-dress, and delicately fine ruffles. No less strong than neat, it supplies the ploughman with his coarse frock, and the sailor with his clumsy trowsers. Its fibres, artfully arranged by the operations of the loom, cover our tables with a graceful elegance, and surround our bodies with a cherishing warmth. On this the painter spreads the colours which enchant the eye; in this the merchant packs the wares which enrich the world.

Yonder the hills, like a grand amphitheatre, arise. Amphitheatre! All the pompous works of Roman magnificence are less than mole-banks, are mere cockle-shells, compared with those majestic elevations of the earth. Some clad with mantling vines; some crowned with towering cedars; some ragged with misshapen rocks, or yawning with subterraneous dens, whose rough and inaccessible crags, whose hideous and gloomy cavities, are not only a continual refuge for the wild goats, but have often proved an asylum to persecuted merit,* and a safeguard to the most valuable lives.

At a greater distance, the mountains lift their frozen brows, or penetrate the clouds with their aspiring peaks. Their frozen brows arrest the roving, and condense the rarified vapours. Their caverned bowels collect the dripping treasures, and send them abroad in gradual communications by trickling springs; while their steep sides precipitate the watery stores, rolling them on with such a forcible impulse,† that they never intermit their unwearied course till they have swept through the most extensive elines, and regained their native seas.

The vineyard swells into a profusion of clusters, some tinged with the deepest purple, and delicately clouded with azure; some clad with a whitish transparent skin, which shows the tempting kernels, lodged in luscious nectar. The vine requires a strong reflection of the sunbeams, and a very large proportion of warmth. How commodiously do the hills and mountains minister to this purpose! May we not call those vast declivities the garden-walls of nature? which, far more effectually than the most costly glasses, or most artful green-houses, concentrate the solar heat, and complete the maturity of the grape, distending it with liquor

† It is observed, that the largest rivers in the world, those which roll the heaviest burden of waters, and perform the most extensive circuit through the nations, generally take their rise from the mountains. The Rhine, the Rhone, and the Po, all descend from the Alps. The Tigris derives its rapid flow from the everlasting snows and steep ridges of Niphates. And to mention no more instances, the river Amazonas, which pours itself through a multitude of provinces, and waters near eighteen hundred leagues of land, has its urn in the caverns, and its impetus from the precipices of that immense range of hills, the Andes.

If the reader is inclined to see the origin and formation of rivers described in all the sublimity of diction, and with all the graces of poetry, he may find this entertainment in Mr. Thomson's autumn, line 781, last edit.

Amazing Scene! behold the glooms disclose,

I see the rivers in their infant beds!

Deep, deep I hear them, lab'ring to get free, &c.

of the finest scent, the most agreeable relish, and the most exalted qualities! such as dissipate sadness, and inspire vivacity; such as make glad the heart of man, and most sweetly prompt both his gratitude and his duty to the munificent Giver. I grieve and I blush for my fellow-creatures, that any should abuse this indulgence of heaven, that any should turn so valuable a gift of God into an instrument of sin—turn the most exhilarating of cordials into poison, madness, and death.

The kitchen-garden presents us with a new train of benefits. In its blooming ornaments, what unaffected beauty! In its culinary productions, what diversified riches! It ripens a multitude of nutrimental essences, and almost an equal abundance of medicinal herbs, distributing refreshments to the healthy and administering remedies to the sick. The orchard, all fair and ruddy, and bowing down beneath its own delicious burden, gives us a fresh demonstration of our Creator's kindness; regales us first with all the delicacies of summer-fruits; next, with the more lasting succession of autumnal dainties.

What is nature but a series of wonders, and a fund of delights! That such a variety of fruits, so beautifully coloured, so elegantly shaped, and so charmingly flavoured, should arise from the earth, than which nothing is more insipid, sordid, and despicable, I am struck with pleasing astonishment at the cause of these fine effects, and no less surprised at the manner of bringing them into existence. I take a walk in my garden, or a turn through my orchard, in the month of December: There stand several logs of wood fastened to the ground. They are erect, indeed, and shapely, but without either sense or motion: No human hand will touch them, no human aid will succour them; yet, in a little time they are beautified with blossoms, they are covered with leaves, and at last are loaded with mellow treasures, with the downy peach and the polished plumb; with the musky apicot, and the juicy pear, with the cherry, and its coral pendants, glowing through lattices of green;

— and dark

Beneath her ample leaf, the luscious fig.

I have wondered at the structure of my watch; wondered more at the description of the silk-mills; most of all at the account of those prodigious engines invented by Archimedes. But what are all the inventions of all the geometricians and mechanics in the world, compared with these inconceivably nice automata* of nature! These self-operating machines despatch their business with a punctuality that never mistakes, with a dexterity that cannot be equalled. In spring they clothe themselves with such unstudied, but exquisite finery, as far exceeds the embroidery of the needle, or the labours of the loom. In autumn, they present us with such a collation of sweetmeats, and such blandishments of taste, as surpass all that the most critical luxury could prepare, or the most lavish fancy imagine. So that those coarse and senseless logs first decorate the divine creation, then perform the honours of the table.

* Automata, or self-operating machines; not meant to set aside the superintendency of Providence, but only to exclude the co-operation of man.

If, amidst these ordinary productions of the earth, God appears so "great in counsel, and mighty in work," Jer. xxxii. 19, what may we expect to see in the palaces of heaven, in the hierarchies of angels, and in that wonderful Redeemer who is, beyond all other objects, beyond all other manifestations, the "wisdom of God, and the power of God?" 1 Cor. i. 24.

The forest rears myriads of massy bodies, which, though neither gay with blossoms, nor rich with fruit, supply us with timber of various kinds, and of every desirable quality. But who shall cultivate such huge trees, diffused over so vast a space? The toil were endless. See, therefore, the all-wise and ever-gracious ordination of Providence. They are so constituted, that they have no need of the spade and the pruning-knife. Nay, the little cares of man would diminish, rather than augment their dignity and their usefulness. The more they are neglected, the better they thrive, the more wildly grand and magnificent they grow.

When felled by the axe, they are sawed into beams, and sustain the roofs of our houses; they are fashioned into carriages, and serve for the conveyance of the heaviest loads. Their substance so pliant, that they yield to the chisel of the turner, and are smoothed by the plane of the joiner; are wrought into the nicest diminutions of shape, and compose some of the finest branches of household furniture. Their texture so solid, that they form the most important parts of those mighty engines which, adapting themselves to the play of mechanic powers, despatch more work in a single hour than could otherwise be accomplished in many days. At the same time, their pressure is so light that they float upon the waters, and glide along the surface, almost with as much agility as the finny fry glance through the deep. Thus, while they impart magnificence to architecture, and bestow numberless conveniences on the family, they constitute the very basis of navigation, and give expedition, give being, to commerce.

Amidst the inaccessible depths of the forests, a habitation is assigned for those ravenous beasts, whose appearance would be frightful, and their neighbourhood dangerous to mankind. Here the sternly majestic lion rouses himself from his den, stalks through the midnight shades, and awes the savage herd with his roar. Here the fiery tiger springs upon his prey, and the gloomy bear trains up her whelps. Here the swift leopard ranges, and the grim wolf prowls, and both in quest of murder and blood. Were these horrid animals to dwell in our fields, what havoc would they make? what consternation would they spread? But they voluntarily bury themselves in the deepest recesses of the desert; while the ox, the horse, and the serviceable quadrupeds, live under our inspection, and keep within our call; profiting us as much by their presence, as the others oblige us by their absence.

If at any time those shaggy monsters make an excursion into the habitable world, it is when man retires to his chamber, and sleeps in security. The sun, which invites other creatures abroad, gives them the signal to retreat. "The sun ariseth, and they get them away, and lay them down in their dens." Psalm civ. 22. Strange! that the orient light, which is so pleasing to us, should strike such terror on them! should, more effectually than a legion of guards, put them all to flight, and clear the country of those formidable enemies!

If we turn our thoughts to the atmosphere, we find a most curious and exquisite apparatus of air, which, because no object of our sight, is seldom observed, and little regarded; yet is a source of innumerable advantages; and all these advantages (which is almost incredible) are fetched from the very jaws of ruin. My meaning may be obscure, therefore I explain myself.

We live plunged, if I may so speak, in an ocean of air, whose pressure, upon a person of moderate size, is equal to the weight of twenty thousand pounds. Tremendous consideration! Should the ceiling of a room, or the roof of a house, fall upon us with half that force, what destructive effects must ensue! Such a force would infallibly drive the breath from our lungs, or break every bone in our bodies. Yet so admirably has the divine wisdom contrived this aerial fluid, and so nicely counterpoised its dreadful power, that we receive not the slightest hurt—we suffer no manner of inconvenience—we even enjoy the load. Instead of being as a mountain on our loins, it is like wings to our feet, or like sinews to our limbs. Is not this common ordination of Providence, thus considered, somewhat like the miracle of the burning bush, whose tender and combustible substance, though in the midst of flames, was neither consumed nor injured? Exod. iii. 2. Is it not almost as marvellous as the prodigy of the three Hebrew youths, who walked in the fiery furnace without having a hair of their heads singed, or so much as the smell of fire passing on their garments? Dan. iii. 27. Surely we have reason to say unto God, "O! how terrible," yet how beneficent, "art thou in thy works."

The air, though too weak to support our flight, is a thoroughfare for innumerable wings. Here the whole commonwealth of birds take up their abode. Here they lodge and expatiate beyond the reach of their adversaries. Were they to run upon the earth, they would be exposed to ten thousand dangers, without proper strength to resist them, or sufficient speed to escape them; whereas, by mounting the skies, and "lifting themselves up on high, they are secure from peril; they scorn the horse and his rider." Job xxxix. 18. Some of them perching upon the boughs, others soaring amidst the firmament, entertain us with their notes; which are musical and agreeable when heard at this convenient distance, but would be noisy and importunate, if brought nearer to our ears. Here many of those feathered families reside, which yield us a delicious treat, yet give us no trouble, put us to no expense, and, till the moment we want them, are wholly out of our way.

The air, commissioned by its all-bountiful Author, charges itself with the administration of several offices, which are perfectly obliging, and no less serviceable to mankind. Co-operating with our lungs, it ventilates the blood, and refines our fluids. It qualifies and attempers the vital warmth, promotes and exalts the animal secretions. Many days we might live, or even whole months, without the light of the sun, or the glimmering of a star; whereas, if we are deprived, only for a few minutes, of this aerial support, we sicken, we faint, we die. The same universal nurse has a considerable share in cherishing the several tribes of plants. It helps to transfuse vegetable vigour into the trunk of the oak, and a blooming gaiety into the spread of the rose.

The air undertakes to convey to our nostrils the extremely subtle effluvia which transpire from odoriferous bodies. Those detached particles are so imperceptibly small, that they would elude the most careful hand, or escape the nicest eye. But this trusty depository receives and escorts the invisible vagrants, without losing so much as a single atom: entertaining us, by this means, with the delightful sensations which arise from the fragrance of flowers; and admonishing us, by the transmission of the offensive smells, to withdraw from an unwholesome situation, or beware of any pernicious food.

The air, by its undulating motion, conducts to our ear all the diversities of sound, and thereby discharges the duty of a most seasonable and faithful monitor. As I walk across the streets of London, with my eye engaged on other objects, a dray, perhaps, with all its load, is driving down directly upon me; or, as I ride along the road, musing and unapprehensive, a chariot and six is whirling on, with a rapid career, at the heels of my horse. The air, like a vigilant friend in pain for my welfare, immediately takes the alarm; and, while the danger is at a considerable distance, despatches a courier to advertise me of the approaching mischief. It even thunders in my ear; and with a clamorous but kind importunity, urges to be upon my guard, and provide for my safety.

The air wafts to our sense the modulations of music, and the more agreeable entertainments of refined conversation. When Myrtilla strikes the silver strings, and teaches the willing harpsicord to warble with her Creator's praise; when her sacred sonata warms the heart with devotion, and wings our desire to heaven:—when Cleora tunes her song, or the nightingale imitates her enchanting voice; when she heightens every melodious note with her adored Redeemer's name; and so smooths her charming tones, so breathes her rapturous soul, "that God's own ear listens delighted:" when wisdom takes its seat on Mitio's tongue, and flows in perspicuous periods and instructive truths, amidst the chosen circle of his acquaintance;—when benevolence, associated with persuasion, dwell on Nicander's lips, and plead the cause of injured innocence or oppressed virtue:—when goodness, leagued with happiness, accompany Eusebius into the pulpit, and reclaim the libertine from the slavery of his vices, disengage the infidel from the fascination of his prejudices, and so affectionately, so pathetically invite the whole audience to partake the unequalled joys of pure religion;—in all these cases, the air distributes every musical variation with the utmost exactness, and delivers the speaker's message with the most punctual fidelity! Whereas without this intermuncio, all would be sullen and unmeaning silence. We should lose both the pleasure and the profit; neither be charmed with the harmonious, nor improved by the articulate accents.

The breezes of the air, when vague and unconfined, are so very gentle, that they sport with the most inoffensive wantonness amidst Ophelia's locks, and scarce disajust a single curl. But, when collected and applied by the contrivance of man, they act with such prodigious force, as is sufficient to whirl round the hugest wheels, though clogged with the most encumbering loads; They make the ponderous millstones move as swiftly as the dancer's heel, and the massy beams play as nimbly as the musician's finger.

If we climb in speculation the higher regions, we find an endless succession of clouds, fed by evaporations from the ocean. The clouds themselves are a kind of ocean, suspended in the air with amazing skill. They travel in detached parties, and in the quality of itinerant cisterns, round all the terrestrial globe. They fructify, by proper communications of moisture, the spacious pastures of the wealthy, and gladden, with no less liberal showers, the cottager's little spot. Nay, so condescending is the benignity of their great Proprietor, that they "satisfy the desolate and waste ground; and cause, even in the most uncultivated wilds, the bud of the tender herb to spring forth," Job xxxviii. 27, that the natives of the lonely desert, those savage herds which know no master's stall, may nevertheless experience the care, and rejoice in the bounty of an all-supporting parent.

‡ How wonderful! that the water, which is much denser and far heavier than the air, should rise into it, make its way through it, and take a station in the very uppermost regions of it! This, one would imagine, were almost as impossible as for the rivers to run back to their source. Yet Providence has contrived a way to render it not only practicable, but matter of continual occurrence.

How wonderful! that pendent lakes should be diffused, or fluent mountains heaped over our heads; and both sustained in the thinnest parts of the atmosphere? We little think of that surprising expedient, which, without conduits of stone, or vessels of brass, keeps such loads of water in a buoyant state. Job and Elihu considered this, and were struck with holy admiration. "Dost thou know the balancings of the clouds?" how such ponderous bodies are made to hang with an even poise, and hover like the lightest down? "These are the wondrous works of him who is perfect in knowledge," Job xxxvii. 16. "He bindeth up the waters in his thick clouds, and the cloud," though nothing is more loose and fluid, becomes, by his almighty order, strong and tenacious as casks of iron: it "is not rent," Job xxvi. 8, under all the weight.

When the sluices are opened, and the waters descend, we might reasonably suspect that they should burst forth in cataracts, or pour out themselves in torrents. Whereas, instead of such a disorderly and precipitate effusion, which would be infinitely pernicious, they coalesce into globules, and are dispensed in gentle showers. They are often attenuated into the smallness of a hair,* they spread themselves, as if they were strained through the orifices of the finest watering-pot, and form those "small drops of rain, which the clouds distil upon man abundantly," Job xxxvi. 28. Thus, instead of drowning the earth, and sweeping away its fruits, they cherish universal nature, and in conformity to the practice of their great Master, distribute their humid stores to men, to animals and vegetables, "as they are able to bear them," Mark iv. 33.

Besides the reservoirs of water, here are cantoned various parts of winds, mild or fierce, gentle or boisterous, furnished with breezy wings, to fan the glowing firmament, and diffuse refreshment on a fainting world; or else fitted to act as an universal besom, and, by sweeping the chambers of the atmosphere, to preserve the fine aerial fluid free from feculencies. Without this wholesome agency of the winds, the air would stagnate, become putrid, and surround us, in the literal sense of the words, "with darkness that might be felt." Exod. x. 21. London, Paris, and all the great cities in the world, instead of being the seats of elegance, would degenerate into sinks of corruption.

At sea, the winds swell the mariner's sails, and speed his course along the watery way; speed it far more effectually than a thousand rowers, bending to their strokes, and tugging at the oar. By land, they perform the office of an immense seedman, and scatter abroad the reproductive principles of a multitude of plants, which, though the staff of life to many animals, are too small for the management, or too mean for the attention of man. "He bringeth the winds out of his treasures," Psalm cxxxv. 7, is a very just observation, whether it relate to God's absolute and uncontrollable dominion over this most potent meteor, or to its welcome and salutary influence on all the face of nature.

Here are lightnings stationed. Though dormant at present, they are in act to spring, and launch the livid flame, whenever their piercing flash is necessary to destroy the sulphureous vapours, or dislodge any other noxious matter which might be prejudicial to the delicate temperature of the ether, and obscure its more crystalline transparency.

Above all is situate a radiant and majestic orb, which enlightens the tracts, cheers the inhabitants, and colours all the productions of this habitable globe. While the air, by a singular address in managing the rays, amplifies their usefulness, its reflecting power* augments that heat, which is the life of additional warmth to our bodies. Whereas, when the aerial veſtment grows thin, or, to ſpeak more philoſophically, when the air becomes leſs in quantity, and more attenuated in quality, the ſolar warmth is very ſenſibly diminiſhed. Travellers on the lofty mountains of America ſometimes experience, to their terrible coſt, the truth of this obſervation. Though the climate, at the foot of thoſe prodigious hills, is hot and ſultry, yet, on their ſummits, the cold rages with ſuch exceſſive ſeverity, that it is no unuſual calamity for the horſe and his rider to be frozen to death. We have, therefore, great reaſon to bleſs the Supreme Diſpoſer of things, for placing us in the commodious concavity, or rather, under the cheriſhing wings of an atmosphere.

* This, I believe, ſuggests the true ſenſe of thoſe noble metaphors uſed by the divine ſpeaker: "It is turned as clay to the ſeal, and they ſtand as a garment;"—I, the earth and all its productions, receive from the riſing ſun both colour and beauty; juſt as the ſoft clay and the melting wax receive an elegant impreſſion from the ſeal.—"They (the morning and the day-ſpring, mentioned in a preceding verſe,) ſtand as a garment;" they act the part of a magnificent and univerſal clothing; give all viſible objects their comely aſpect and graceful diſtinctions. Job xxxviii. 14.

What bold and fine images are here. The ſea had been deſcribed as an infant, changeable, froward, and impetuous, with thick darkneſs for its ſwaddling-band. The light is represented as an handmaid, attending to dreſs the creation; and executing the Creator's orders, with a punctuality that never fails, with a ſpeed that cannot be equalled.

We have cursorily ſurveyed the upper rooms of our great habitation, and taken a turn along the ground-floor; if we deſcend into the ſubterranean lodgments, the cellars of the ſtately ſtructure, we ſhall there alſo find the moſt exquisite contrivance acting in concert with the moſt profuſe goodneſs. Here are various minerals of ſovereign efficacy in medicine, which rectify the vitiated blood, and quicken the languid ſpirits; which often rekindle the fading bloom in the virgin's complexion, and re-invigorate the enfeebled arm of manhood. Here are beds fraught with metals of the richeſt value: From hence come the golden treaſures, from hence the ſilver ores, which are the very life of traffic, and circulate through the body politic as the vital fluid through the animal frame, which, in the refining hand of charity, are feet to the lame, and eyes to the blind, and make the widow's heart ſing for joy. Here are mines, which yield a metal of meaner aſpect, but of a firmer cohesion, and of ſuperior uſefulneſs: A metal that conſtitutes almoſt all the implements with which art executes her various deſigns. Without the aſſiſtance of iron, trade would be reduced to the loweſt ebb; commerce would feel her wings clipped, and every ſpecies of mechanic ſkill either utterly fail, or be miſerably baffled. Without the aſſiſtance of iron, it would be almoſt impoſſible to rear the ſteady maſt, to diſplay the daring canvaſs, or drop the faithful anchor. Deſtitute of this ever-needful commodity, we ſhould have no plough to furrow the ſoil, no ſhuttle to traverse the loom, ſcarce any ornament for polite, or any utenſil for ordinary life.

Here is an inexhauſtible fund of combuſtible materials,* which ſupply the whole nation with fuel. Theſe preſent their miniſtrations in the kitchen; and yielding themſelves as aliment to the flame, render our food both palatable and healthy. Theſe offer their ſervice at the forge, and with their piercing heat molify the moſt ſtubborn bars, till they become pliant to the ſtroke of the hammer. The coals pour themſelves likewiſe into the glaſs-houſes: They rage, amidſt thoſe aſtoniſhing furnaces with irreſiſtible but uſeful fierceneſs. They liquefy even the obdurate flint, and make the moſt rigid ſubſtances far more ductile than the ſoſteſt clay, or the melting wax; make them obſequious, not only to the lighteſt touch, but to the impreſſions of our very breath.

By this means we are furniſhed, and from

* As for the earth, ſays Job, out of it cometh bread: corn, vegetables, and whatever is good for food, ſpring from its ſurface. While under it is turned up as it were fire; its lower parts, its deeper ſtrata, yield combuſtible materials, which are eaſily enkindled into fire, and adminiſter the moſt ſubſtantial fuel for the flame. Job xxviii. 5.

the coarsest ingredients, with the most curious, beautiful, and serviceable manufacture in the world: A manufacture which transmits the light and warmth of the sun into our houses; yet excludes the annoyance of the rains, and violence of the winds. Which gives new eyes to decrepit age, and vastly more enlarged views to philosophy and science; which leads up the astronomer's discernment even to the satellites of Saturn, and carries down the naturalist's observation as far as the animalcule race; bringing near what is immensely remote, and making visible what, to our unassisted sight, would be absolutely imperceptible.

We have also, when the sun withdraws his shining, an expedient to supply his place. We can create an artificial day in our rooms, and prolong our studies, or pursue our business, under its cheering influence. With beaming tapers and ruddy fires, we chase the darkness, and mitigate the cold; we cherish conversation, and cultivate the social spirit. We render those very intervals of time some of the most delightful portions of our life, which otherwise would be a joyless and unimproving void.

These obscure caverns are the birth-place of the most sparkling gems; which, when nicely polished, and prodigal of their lustre, stand candidates for a place on the royal crown, or a seat on the virtuous fair one's breast; and, I will not with our men of gallantry say, emulate the living brilliancy of her eyes, but serve as a foil to set off the loveliness and excellency of her accomplished mind, and amiable conversation; "whose price," according to the unerring estimate of inspiration, is superior to sapphires, "is far above rubies," Prov. xxxi. 10.

Here are quarries stocked with stones, inferior in beauty to the jeweller's ware, but much more eminently beneficial; which, when properly ranged, and cemented with a tenacious mortar, form the convenient abodes of peace, and build the strongest fortifications of war; defending us from the inelencencies of the weather, and the more formidable assaults of our enemies. These constitute the arches of the bridge which convey the traveller, with perfect security, over the deep and rapid stream. These strengthen the arms, the stupendous arms, of the mole; which stretch themselves far into the ocean, break the impetuosity of the surge, and screen the bark from tempestuous seas. These stony treasures are comparatively soft, while they continue in the bowels of the earth, but acquire an increasing hardness when exposed to the open air. Was this remarkable peculiarity reversed, what difficulties would attend the labours of the mason? His materials could not be extracted from their bed, nor fashioned for his purpose, without infinite toil. Were his work completed, it could not long withstand the fury of the elements; but, insensibly mouldering, or incessantly decaying, would elude the expectations of the owner; perhaps might prove an immature grave, instead of a durable dwelling.

Here are various assortments or vast layers of clay; which, however contemptible in its appearance, is abundantly more advantageous than the rocks of diamond, or the veins of gold. This is moulded, with great expedition and ease, into vessels of any shape, and of almost every size. Some so delicately fine, that they compose the most elegant and ornamental furniture for the tea-table of a princess. Others so remarkably cheap, that they are ranged on the shelves, and minister at the meals of the poorest peasant. All so perfectly neat, that no liquid takes the least taint, nor the nicest palate any disgust, from their cleanly services.

A multiplicity of other valuable stores are locked up by Providence, in those ample vaults. The key of all is committed to the management of industry; with free permission to produce each particular species, as necessity shall demand, or prudence direct.

Which shall we most admire—the bountiful heart, the liberal hand, or the all-discerning eye of our great Creator? How observable and admirable is his precaution, in removing these useful but cumbrous wares from the superficies; and stowing them in proper repositories, beneath the ground? Were they scattered over the surface of the soil, the earth would be embarrassed with the enormous load; our roads would be blocked up, and scarce any portion left free for the operations of husbandry. Were they buried extremely deep, or sunk to the centre of the globe, it would cost us immense pains to procure them; or rather they would be quite inaccessible. Were they uniformly spread into a pavement for nature, the trees could not strike their roots, nor the herbs shoot their blades, but universal sterility must ensue. Whereas, by their present disposition, they furnish us with a magazine of metallic, without causing any diminution of our vegetable, treasures. Fossils of every splendid and serviceable kind enrich the bowels, while bloom and verdure embellish the face of the earth.

So judicious is the arrangement of this grand edifice; so beneficent the destination of its whole furniture!* in which all is regulated with consummate skill, and touched into the highest perfection! All most exactly adapted to the various intentions of Providence, and the manifold exigencies of mankind; to supply every want we can feel, and gratify every wish we can form.

Insomuch that the whole system affords a favourite and exalted topic of praise, even to those distinguished beings who "stand on the sea of glass, and have the harps of God in their hands." They lift up their voice and sing, "Great and marvellous are thy works, O Lord God Almighty,"* Rev. xv. 3. And is there not reason, my Aspasio would say, infinite reason for us to join this triumphant choir, and add gratitude to our wonder, love to our hallelujahs; since all these things are to us, not merely objects of contemplation, but sources of accommodation; not only a majestic spectacle, bright with the display of our Creator's wisdom, but an inestimable gift, rich with the emanations of his goodness? The earth hath he set before the inhabitants of glory, "but the earth hath he given to the children of men," Psal. cxv. 16. Having given us ourselves, given us a world; has he not a right, most unquestionable and unrivalled right, to make that tender demand, "My son, give me thy heart? Prov. xxiii. 26.

Shall I add another passage, which, viewed with any but the last paragraph, will be like the head of gold, eminent and conspicuous, on feet of iron and clay? It is taken from the finest philosophical oration that ever was made. I never read it but with a glow of delight, and with impressions of awe. It is, in short, imitatively spirited and sublime. You think, perhaps, I act an impolitic part in being so lavish of my praise; and that the quotation must suffer by such an aggrandizing introduction. But I am under no apprehensions of this kind: Forbear to be delighted, if you can; cease to admire, if you can; when you hear Omniscience itself declaring, that on the sight of this universal fabric emerging out of nothing, "the morning stars sang together, and all the sons of God shouted for joy," Job xxxviii. 7. The system was so graceful, so magnificent, and in all respects so exquisitely finished, that the most exalted intelligences were charmed, were transported. They knew not how to express themselves on the great occasion, but in shouts of exultation and songs of praise. Is it possible

* "Great and marvellous are thy works, O Lord God Almighty! just and true are thy ways, thou King of saints!"—The first part seems to mean, what the inspired writer calls, The song of Moses. The second contains what he styles, The song of the Lamb. The first, I should imagine, relates to the stupendous works of creation. The second alludes to the far more wonderful scheme of redemption. The former, describing the system of nature, is recorded by Moses; the latter, comprehending the salvation of the saints, is accomplished by Christ.
